'Oh, look at those soldiers!' exclaimed a little boy, who was gazing from his nursery window, at a troop of the military who were passing. 'They prance along so famously on their fine horses, and their swords looks so handsome. O see, see! what beautiful feathers they have in their caps, and hark! at the fine music. Oh! if I live to be a man, I am determined to be a soldier!'

No watchful mother was near him, listening to her child, or she would have tried to correct his errors of judgment, by showing him that the life of a soldier is far from being so desirable as he supposed. Instead of her, there sat by him a youthful nurse, whose eye was as much as his, taken by the dashing appearance of the soldiery.—She had come from a foreign land, and she had many anecdotes to tell the little boy, about military scenes, in which her relatives and friends or the families with whom she had lived were concerned. She had seen nothing of the horrors of war, but her young and ardent imagination had been caught by its pomp and pageantry.

The conversation and scenes of that day, made a strong impression on the young and excitable Arthur, and from that time, the desire to be 'a gay soldier,' fastened on his mind, and his thoughts, even while he was apparently engaged at play, would continually recur to the brilliant military procession, and to his nurse's animated accounts of her early life. Whenever his indulgent father offered him new playthings, and Arthur was allowed the privilege of selecting them, he never failed to beg for a toy a sword, or drum, or other implement of war, and with these he would employ his play hours in exercising himself in mimic warlike sports.

Months rolled on, and the bent of the little boy's mind, was becoming more and more confirmed toward war and warlike things, and as yet, no eye had detected the evil that was lurking in his path; no heart had become alarmed on account of dangers that menaced him. His mother was too indolent or inattentive, to give heed to the thoughts which filled the minds of her children, or to be alarmed by propensities which they exhibited, unless they were actually vicious. His father was an ambitious and worldly-minded man, and if his child's spirit excited him to any emotion, it was that of pride, at seeing him so bold and manly.

But happily, or I should say, providentially, not long since, there came to visit the parents of Arthur, his father's sister.—This lady was a pious and intelligent woman, and being, moreover, very fond of children, she soon contracted great affection for her nephew, who was in his appearance and manners very attractive to strangers. She noticed him so kindly—was so patient with him, and exerted herself so much to make him happy, that she won wonderfully upon Arthur, and he soon opened his little heart freely to her. His aunt was surprised and alarmed to find the passionate desire for military life which had been growing unchecked in his young heart, and she seized every opportunity to try to correct his opinions. Whenever she met with anecdotes calculated to show forth, another side to the picture of war, she never failed to read or relate them to Arthur, until at length, the little boy woke from his dream of fancied happiness, and learned to view a soldier's life and a soldiers occupations in a very different light. One evening she was reading Miss Sedgwick's Letters from Abroad, and she stopped a moment to look at Arthur. She wanted to ascertain whether he was in a state of mind to give attention to a passage in that lady's work, which is calculated to leave upon the mind a lively impression of the horrors of war. Finding Arthur favorably disposed, both to listen to her reading, and to reflect upon what he might hear, she explained to him briefly the history of Waterloo, and of the leading men who were concerned in the bloody tragedy, which has rendered its name so memorable. She then read to him the following passage:

'We drove round the rich wheat fields to La Haye Sainte. There is no ground so rich as this battle field. In the spring, the darkest and thickest corn tells where the dead were buried! The German legion, slaughtered at La Haye Sainte, are buried on the opposite side of the road, where there is a simple monument over them.

"Set where thou wilt, thy foot, thou scarce can tread,

'La Belle Alliance, where Wellington and Blucher met after the battle, was pointed out to us; and Napoleon's positions, the very spot where he stood when he first descried Blucher, and his heart for the last time swelled with anticipated triumph.

'We were shown the places where Gordon, Pickton, and others of note fell; and there, where the masses lay weltering in blood, the unknown, unhonored, unrecorded, there was,

'It was a piteous sight,' said our guide, 'to see the next day the men, with clasped hands, begging for a glass of water. Some had lost one side of the face with a sabre cut; others had their bowels laid open!—They prayed us to put an end to their miseries, and said, 'surely God would forgive us.' All the peasants, men, women and children, that had not been driven clear away, came in to serve them; but there was not enough; and they died burned with thirst, and their wounds gangrened, for there were not surgeons for the half of them. They would crawl down to those pools of water and wash their wounds; the water was red and clotted with blood!—Oh, c'est un grand malheur, la guerre, mes dames!' (Oh ladies, war is a great evil,) he concluded.'

'Oh! please don't read any more, dear aunt,' said Arthur, while his eyes filled with tears. 'I shall not soon forget that terrible account of the sufferings of the poor soldiers. Never! never! shall I wish to be a soldier again, if it makes me liable to see such distressing sights. Indeed you were right when you told me there were 'two sides to the picture of war.' The one that I, foolish boy that was, have been looking at so long, had nothing terrible about it; that which you have now shown me, is all horrible!'

'Yes, my love, it is indeed,' said his aunt. Especially is it so, when we think of each of those slaughtered myriads, having had a soul, which by the event of that day, had been driven suddenly before its Maker, there to give an account of the deeds done by it in the body. War when viewed in this light, becomes truly awful, and Christians may well look forward to the time, when its horrors shall no longer be known in our world; and when in its stead, peace and love shall reign every where!'—Chris. Observer.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, October 26, 1842.

ALONZO H. BURDICK, of this office, will visit, this month, the friends of the paper in Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, and Eastern New York, to settle up the unsettled accounts of the Register, and obtain new subscribers. Will the friends of the press aid him as much as possible?

Infidel's Concessions.

Despite the infidel's determination to do or say nothing that shall give the least credit to christianity, he frequently and unwittingly awards it all that it claims. It is not uncommon for such to express admiration of the character of christians, and the good influence of christianity over individuals and communities where it is possessed. He likewise is more willing to trust his interests in the hands of a religious man, than in one of his own sentiments.

All their concessions are due to Christianity, and not to the persons professing it, for it is the divine principle of christianity that makes them thus worthy of admiration and confidence. If all professors are not worthy of this award, it is because they are not governed by the principles of the religion they profess. These are competent to make the man of God perfect. Thus the infidelity of christians gives strength to the professed infidels.

The infidel's system looks to death as the extinction of being, but every feeling of soul, and every wish he breathes, is for immortality, and he can never confine all his desires and aspirations this side the grave. Beside, the idea of annihilation finds not a lodgment in his heart. From this he turns away with inward horror, while he clings to it with outward profession. Thus does he virtually acknowledge the immortality of the soul, and, by consequence, the whole christian doctrine.

He acknowledges a perfect contrast in his feelings, andthe christian's. Christianity inspires its possessor with the joyful hope that "though a man die, he shall live again," and "bloom in eternal youth," while death with all its darkness and dread, hangs like an incubus upon the infidel's soul, taking away even the pleasures of this life. We can heartily adopt the language of another, "if the infidel's system be true, let me live and die with the christian's hope, and never awake from death to discover my mistake."

Geology and the Mosaic Account of Creation.

Infidelity has seized upon the supposed difference between the Mosaic account of the creation of the world, and its origin as proven by Geology, as an argument against the truth of the scriptures. Many christians, likewise, have refused to believe the developements of this science as to the age of the world, for the same reason. Both have been hasty in their conclusions, and both may be in error.

Geology does establish the fact of the existence of the earth for a long period before the six days of creation. Whether this period was millions of years or not, it matters not. Geologists are at liberty to imagine as long periods as they please. And if they can show that the matter of which the earth is composed, or that the earth itself had existed millions on millions of years, before the six days of creative operations as recorded by Moses, it in no wise contradicts Moses' account. And if believers in the inspiration of the Bible deny the developements of science on the account of their apparent contradiction of the scriptures, still men will believe in the developments of science, or deny the evidence of their senses.

A careful examination of the account of creation as given by Moses, will at once reconcile this matter. There is not, necessarily, a connection between the first and succeeding verses of the first chapter of Genesis. The first verse declares simply the fact that, "in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." When the beginning was, whether just previous to the creation of light, or any indefinite period before, can not be ascertained from the scriptures. The mind is left free to fix upon any period that science, or any circumstances may dictate. The simple object of Moses in the first verse seems to have been to settle this point, that God created the earth, and that it did not come into existence by chance. And in the second verse he describes the state in which matter was, when the six days of labor commenced.

Each days work is prefaced with the declaration, "God said," &c., thus making it evident that the creation of the first day commenced with the creation of light, as seen in the third verse, thus leaving the first and second verses unconnected with the following. Some old editions of the English bible have a "break" at what is now the end of the second verse, thus rendering the evidence still stronger that those verses should be separated as relating to different times.

This view of the subject is not new, nor has it been resorted to, simply to meet the argument of Geologists. Some of the Fathers had this opinion, such as Augustine, and Theodoret. And in modern times the same idea has been taught by critics as being consistent with the language of Moses. The most important of these are Buckland, Pusey, Chalmers, and Petavius.

"Give account of thy stewardship."

The christian, with all his abilities, mental, moral, and physical, and his time and substance are God's, over which he is placed as steward, and commanded to occupy until Christ shall come. Being thus placed, he cannot, without sacrilege, use any thing he possesses otherwise than for the promotion of God's glory. He needs only so much of earthly treasures as best to qualify him for his labor in God's vineyard. Whatever he has more than this, or that he turns to another purpose, operates directly against his spiritual interests, and the advancement of Christ's kingdom. Whether a man have little or much, it should be held in trust for God, and made to yield a constant revenue. Could the steward know at what precise time he would be called to account, he would prepare himself to give a faithful account.—But inasmuch as that time is in the knowledge of God only, it is the part of wisdom to be always ready. If Miller's doctrine of the end of the world in April, 1843, be true, then there remains but little time for christians to occupy. But should Miller be mistaken as to the time, yet very many will be called from their stewardship ere his appointed time arrives.

He that is a faithful steward will always be found waiting for the coming of his master. Blessed will those be whom the Lord, when he calls, shall find thus waiting.

Almanac and Baptist Register for 1843, published by the American Baptist Publication and S. School Society. Philadelphia.

Besides the usual matter of an Almanac, it contains a table of Baptist Associations in the U. S. and British Possessions—a list of Baptist Periodicals, and Baptist Institutions, Religious and Literary. The following is the general summary of Churches, Ministers, and Members reported in the Register, viz: Churches, 8,383; Ministers, 5,398; Members 611,527. The statistics of the S. D. Baptists have been published in the former numbers, but have been omitted in this. They have 1 Quarterly Magazine, 7 Monthlies, 1 Semi-Weekly, and sixteen weekly papers, including the Morning Star, (Free-will,) and Seventh-Day Baptist Register.

"WESTERN SCHOOL JOURNAL."—One number of the above paper, published at Louisville, Ky., has come to our table. It is published under the auspices of the college of professional teachers, and is devoted entirely to the interests of education. From the specimen before us, we judge that it will be invaluable to those who may patronize it. We are glad to see journals of this sort multiplying.

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

MR. EDITOR,—Since reading the communication in the Register in relation to the Western mission, over the signature W. D. C., I have thought best to send for publication the following statement.

Anticipating, what proved to be the result, that the Missionary Society would not be in a situation at its annual session to appoint Missionaries for the ensuing year, and finding that there was a deep interest felt in the Western Mission by many of the friends in Shiloh, and that they were anxious that Elder Scott should be continued as a Missionary the coming year, I concluded to test their liberality by circulating a subscription to raise the means for his support. Having secured for this object, in our society, a little more than $100, I resolved on spending a week prior to the sitting of Conference in presenting the subject to the brethren in East Jersey, in New York, and in Rensselaer Co. Being with the friends in East Jersey one day, the subject was presented to a few of the brethren and $17 added to the subscription. Leaving New Jersey, I visited the brethren in New York, and although they were deeply engaged in the Tract enterprise, they, together with the friends in Brooklyn, pledged $14 for the object. Arriving in Berlin, I presented the subject to the friends in that place, and individuals there, in Stephentown, and in Petersburgh, augmented the subscription more than $60. Thus it will be seen during a short voluntary agency, I obtained by subscription more than $200 for the Missionary cause.

At my last interview with Elder Scott, I understood him he would be willing to engage as our Missionary in the spring, should his health and other circumstances permit. He did not think that the present state of his health would warrant him to engage in the work this winter. As we have not for the present, in consequence of the peculiar circumstances of the Missionary Society, "a regular medium of united efforts," let us not fold our hands and do nothing, but let us endeavor to devise some means of responding to the loud and repeated calls for Missionary labor which are so frequently saluting our ears, until an efficient organization for Missionary purposes, shall be consummated. Br. Church, Tyler, Coon, and others of our ministering brethren, are residing in the far West, some of whom, perhaps, might be employed as Missionaries if they could be sustained. I trust our ministering brethren will be willing to engage in Missionary labor, and I most sincerely hope that the churches will not be negligent in furnishing the means to sustain them in the work.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA.

Fifteen days later from Europe.

We are under renewed obligation to Messrs. Harnden, for the Liverpool European of the 4th inst., brought by the steamship Britannia at Boston. The vessel was boarded early yesterday morning, by Messrs H. & Co.'s newsman four miles below the Castle. By this attention we are enabled to lay a synopsis of the news before our readers 24 hours in advance of the Boston mail.—Daily Adv.

The Britannia brings 97 passengers.

The partial improvement which had taken place in the articles of wheat and flour previous to the sailing of the packet of the 19th ult. has relapsed and every thing become dull. This is accounted for by the continued fine weather for getting in the harvest in the northern sections of the country and the failure of many houses, extensive speculators in the market. Canadian flour is quoted at 26 a 27s. per bll. Canadian wheat 6s. 6d. a 7s. U. S. do. 7s. a 7s. 6d. Canadian and States flour had been forced off at still more reduced rates within the last few days.

H. B. M. ship Warspite, on board of which Lord Ashburton sailed from this country, arrived at Deal on the 23d of September.

The American tariff is unfavorably received in England. Birmingham and other seats of British manufacture will suffer severely by its operation. The French do not view it so unfavorably.

The Ashburton treaty has been the theme of much discussion in England, and many of the papers there affirm that that country has the worst of the bargain.

Failures of the houses of several prominent corn factors are announced in consequence of the serious decline in the price of wheat.

The operation of the new British tariff is sensibly felt in various portions of the kingdom. Foreign competition is invited from all quarters, particularly with the home agriculturists.

The difficulties in the condition of credit has raised the rate of money somewhat in extensive transactions.

A decided improvement has taken place in the manufacturing districts. Many of the hands have returned to work, but some are still discontented and hold out a more formidable strike at a future time.

The Marquis of Wellesley, eldest brother of the Duke of Wellington, is dead. He had been Gov. General of India and twice Viceroy of Ireland. He was in his 82d year.

There is nothing later from India or China.

Letters from Paris state that the frequent conferences between Lord Cowley, the British Minister, and M. Guizot are likely to result in the adoption of a commercial treaty, to be followed by the ratification, on the part of France, of the hitherto repudiated convention for extending the limits within which a mutual right of search shall be in force.

ARRIVAL OF THE INDEPENDENCE.

From the N. Y. Com. Advertiser.

The packet ship Independence, Captain Nye, has just arrived from Liverpool, whence she sailed on Sunday, the 25th of September. The most important item of intelligence is the account of a destructive fire at Liverpool, by which several lives were lost, and property to an immense amount destroyed.

It will be seen by our correspondent's letter that the estimated loss of cotton, when that was written, was fifty thousand bales. In the detailed account from the Liverpool papers it is put down at sixty thousand.

The disturbed districts were more quiet at the last advices. Some two or three persons who had been wounded at Manchester, Staley, Brook, &c. had died of their wounds.

The weather still continued favorable, and rapid progress had been made in securing the crops in the backward districts.

Correspondence Commercial Advertiser.

LIVERPOOL 24th.

It is with much regret we have to mention that early yesterday morning this town was visited by a most extensive and calamitous fire, by which much property was destroyed.

The total quantity of cotton consumed is estimated at present at 50,000 bales, but it is supposed that the number will be increased when the exact quantity is ascertained.

It is also estimated that about 15,000 barrels of turpentine have been consumed by the fire, besides a large quantity of produce of various other descriptions.

[Our files not having come to hand we are indebted to the editors of the American for the use of their papers.]

LATEST PARTICULARS.

Twelve o'clock last night.

The fire is fast exhausting itself. Three engines are directing their energies to Grayson and Bannister's yards, and the fire proof warehouses.

Upward of 3,000 bags of rice, the cargo of the Bland, were saved from Mr. M'Knight's warehouse in Neptune street. It was during the removal of the rice that the two men lost their lives by the falling of the gable end.

The fire was distinctly seen for thirty or forty miles by vessels working up the channel, as well as by the guard on the mail train from Birmingham.

The following is an account of the buildings destroyed, furnished by Mr. Samuel Holme:—Four warehouses (Gray's) burnt; one do. (Taylor's) do.; two do. (Rayner's) do.; two do. (Poole's) do; four do. (Maw's) do.; one do. (Roger's) fire proof, partially on fire, but subsequently extinguished; two do. (Reyner's) south burnt; one shed (Reyner's) do.

Two sheds (Horseley's), Neptune street, do.; one large shed (McKnight's), west of the above, do.; Taylor's cooperage, Molyneux's lumber yard, cart houses, stables, a row of 16 houses and a large mass of property of various descriptions burnt.

Another account gives the following probable results as to the actual loss—Rayners A 309, B 315; do. C 309, D 315; Maw's four warehouses, no numbers; Grey's E 228; Grey's C 229; Taylor's 232; Rodgers' 256, two; Rayner's shed, 252; Gregson's 219, two; Horsley's two sheds; M'Knight's one do.; Poole's two sheds; Taylor's cooperages and other timber yards.

The whole is assessed at an annual value of £3,500. The value of the buildings exclusive of the land, probably from £35,000 to £40,000. The property which they contained may be estimated at the value of £300,000 to £400,000.

The principal contents are cotton, turpentine, flour, &c. The brokers can add up to 35,000 bales, but there must be more. The following is an estimate:—£250,000 in cotton—£150,000 in other goods—£35,000 in buildings—total £435,000.

We subjoin a list of the various sums which the Insurance Offices are said to have suffered by this calamity; but, of course, we cannot pledge ourselves for its accuracy:

The Sun,	£30,000
Globe,	35,000
West of England,	10,000
London,	30,000
Liverpool,	25,000
Phœnix,	40,000
Royal Exchange,	50,000
Manchester,	30,000
Imperial,	20,000

PORTSMOUTH, Friday Evening.

Her Majesty's frigate Warspite, 50, Captain Lord John Hay, C. B., anchored at Spithead this day, precisely at noon, bringing home Lord Ashburton from his mission in America. His Lordship left the Warspite at 2 o'clock and landed at Gosport, the ship saluting him when he left her, and the batteries upon his landing.

The Warspite has been 17 days from New-York, having left on the morning of the 5th inst. She was becalmed two days, or she would have made the run in 15 days.

The Warspite, being a government vessel on an extraordinary service, has brought no papers or letter-bags, and therefore, though she left New-York four days later than the Cambridge packet ship (noticed in the Standard of yesterday afternoon) yet we are, in consequence, without any further political intelligence from the United States.

News of the Day.

Outrage on the Millerites.—A camp meeting came off at Claremont, N. H., last week. Certain individuals of the baser sort, and disbelievers in Miller's doctrine, (and a contemporary supposes from their conduct that they thought the world was never coming to an end,) moistened the ropes of the big tent that covered the ground with sulphuric acid. One of them was arrested by the sheriff, and an attempt having been made by his associates to rescue him, a fight ensued, and some severe wounds were inflicted.

A Thousand Miles in a Thousand Hours.—Thomas Ellworth, the pedestrian, completed his feat of walking one thousand miles in a thousand consecutive hours, at Cambridge, near Boston, yesterday morning at 4 o'clock, and still continued walking his mile an hour, with the intention of not stopping till 5 o'clock in the evening. This is the second time, we believe, that this feat has been accomplished.—Com. Adv.

Texas.—We learn from Mr. Lewis, who has just returned from a visit to Texas, that the government of that country is about effecting a treaty of peace with the whole number of Indian tribes who inhabit the frontiers, including the Cumanche tribe, which has always been so formidable and destructive to the citizens of the outer settlements. He says that a few days before he started in, Capt. Durst, Col. Stroud and Mr. Williams, Commissioners appointed to treat with the Indians, returned from their mission having seen nearly all the chiefs of the different tribes, from whom they received promises to meet in council on the 24th of October, at the falls of the Brasos. The commissioners have great faith in their doing so.

If a treaty of peace be consummated, the Government will establish three trading houses for them to trade at—one on the Trinity river, one on the Brasos, and another on the Colorado below which points it will be stipulated the Indians are not to come. He thinks that if the Government establishes this treaty with the Indians, it will be of infinite advantage to it; next, in fact, to the recognition of its independence by Mexico, as it will keep the Indians from committing depredations, and elicit their friendly feelings, secure their neutrality, or lead them to lend their aid in case the Mexicans should try to invade Texas again, in helping to repel them.

He says that the cotton and corn crops in the eastern portion of the country have not been so good any year heretofore as they are this season, and that the health of the country has never been better than it is at present.

Annual statement of Commerce and Navigation.—We have received from Washington the Annual Statement of the Commerce and Navigation of the United States for the year ending 30th Sept., 1841, the printing of which is but recently completed. It makes a volume of 370 pages, large 8 vo.

The imports of the year amounted to $127,946,177; of which in American vessels, $113,221,877, and in foreign, $14,721,300. Exports $121,851,803; of which $106,382,722 were of domestic origin, and $15,469,081 foreign. Of the domestic articles, $82,569,389 were exported in American vessels, and $23,813,333 in foreign. Of the foreign articles, $12,239,319 in American vessels, and $3,229,832 in foreign.

The registered tonnage of the United States on the 30th Sept., 1841,

Enrolled and licensed,	1,107,068
Fishing vessels,	77,873
Total tons,	2,130,744

Of the registered and enrolled tonnage there was employed in the whale fishery, 157,405 tons.

Of the enrolled and licensed tonnage, 174,342 tons were employed in steam navigation.

There was built during the same year, registered tonnage to the amount of 64,302 tons; enrolled, 54,491. Total, 118,893 tons.

MOBILE, Oct. 1.

Atrocious Murder.—One of the most cold blooded, unprovoked murders we have ever known, occurred upon the steamboat Canebrake, on her last trip from Montgomery. An Italian by the name of John Mark, deliberately drew a pistol, walked up to Mr. W. A. Clark, a gentleman from Greene Co. and shot him dead. Not a word had passed between them on the boat, and no cause is known, or has been given by Mr. Mark, for the horrid deed. Mr. Clark died instantly. Mark afterwards attempted to shoot the bar-keeper of the boat, who escaped by locking himself up in one of the state-rooms. On arriving at Cahawba the remains of Mr. Clark were interred, and Mark delivered up by Capt. Adams to the sheriff of Dallas county. He will have his trial in Lowndes county, where the murder was committed, at the next term of Court, which commences its session next Monday.

Later from Yucatan.—The schooner Ann Maria, Capt. Peters, arrived yesterday in eight days from Sisal. We have conversed with a passenger, from whom we learn that the Mexicans had not made their appearance off their coast. It is believed that the Mexican fleet had gone to Vera Cruz, but they were expected to return and visit Campeachy, and the troops at that port were busily employed in putting the fortifications in a complete state of repair. The regular force there amounted to about 5,000 men, and the militia that could be called in, on an emergency, at five times that number. The people were full of enthusiasm, and determined to repel any invasion the Mexicans might attempt.

We learn from the same gentleman that the three Yucatan vessels at Laguna were not captured, but were treacherously delivered to the Mexicans by their commanders, on the payment of the sum of $13,000 in specie. This fact was leaking out among the Yucatecos, and it was supposed that the culpable persons would be arrested, and tried and punished.

We learn from Capt. Peters that the Yucatan Government were anxious to renew the previous arrangement with the Texian navy, and that the money necessary to effect that object was appropriated and ready to be paid over. A. M., it is understood, brought communications to Com. Moore on the subject.—N. O. Bulletin, Sep. 29.

Martyrs.—According to the calculations of some, about 200,000 Christian Protestants suffered death, in seven years, under Pope Julian; no less than 100,000 were massacred by the French, in the space of three months; Waldenses who perished amounted to 1,000,000; within thirty years the Jesuits destroyed 900,000; under the Duke of Alva 36,000 were executed by the hangman; 159,000 by the Irish massacre, besides the vast multitude of whom the world could never be particularly informed, who were proscribed, starved, burnt, assassinated—chained to the galleys for life, immured within the walls of the Bastile, or others of their church and state prisons. According to some, the whole number of persons massacred since the rise of papacy, including the space of 1,400 years, amounts to 50,000,000.

Extension of Protestanism in France.—Few persons are aware of a fact we are about to mention on the authority of a friend, who has resided much abroad, and who possesses extensive opportunities of arriving at the truth—viz: that Protestanism is making rapid strides in France. In some localities the advance is marvellous; and if the movement continues to progress with its present steadiness, a great change will ultimately be effected in the religious character of the French people. When we consider the very important position which France occupies, it is difficult to over-estimate the importance of such a result. The peace and happiness of the civilized world may be materially involved in it. A strong Protestant party would form the break-water against revolution—the best safeguard for the preservation of the peace of Europe. There exists in Paris a central 'Societe Evangelique,' which has extensive ratifications, and possesses much influence, and we believe, considerable means. A large number of Protestant clergymen have been sent out by this institution, and the report for 1842, which we have recently seen, is full of facts which illustrate our friend's statement.—Gloucestshire Chron.

Dreadful collision at Sea.—A vessel sunk and all on board lost.—A letter from Capt. James Codman, Jr. of the ship Sarah Parker, at New-York, from Singapore, to the owners in Boston, gives the frightful intelligence of having come in contact with a brig, on her passage home, which is supposed to have occasioned her immediate loss, with all on board. We copy below the details of the disaster, from the Boston Atlas. The Sarah Parker had her starboard bow completely stove, from the rail to below the water mark, and it was only with infinite difficulty and exertion that the ship was saved from the untimely fate which befel the vessel with which she came in contact. She leaked considerably for some time, which injured her cargo—amount not ascertained. Another letter received at Boston, contains a supposition that the brig was a foreign vessel, as the exclamations of her crew were heard in foreign language. We annex the extract from the letter, and it will be seen that the exertions made to rescue the sufferers were ineffectual:

The collision took place on the 13th Sept. in lat. 14 17, N. lon. 19 02, W. during the night, in one of those tremendous squalls which happen in the variables.—The ship was going about ten knots at the time, and the darkness so great that I could not see the brig at the instant of striking, though I had been looking to leeward but an instant before, and was then standing by the main rigging, and all the watch at stations, to clew down the fore and main topsails, if necessary. I had already clewed down the mizzen topsail, the squall being very violent from W. by S. and the ship steering N. N. W. The brig must have been going very rapidly also. She showed no light, and I think that had not the rain made it so Egyptian dark, they might have seen ours which is constantly burning in the night, and shines from the deck house windows. Poor fellows! they must have sunk, as they were seen very near about 20 minutes after, and at daylight nothing could be seen, though we lay by and it became nearly calm soon after losing sight of the brig. I could render no assistance, as we had to strain every nerve to keep afloat, which we only accomplished by the quiet and at the same time energetic behavior of the men who kept their stations and obeyed my orders with as little confusion as if they were practising evolutions for amusement, and after getting clear, as I have said above, worked well and quick. Much credit is due to the chief officer and carpenter (in fact they are both carpenters,) for their indefatigable exertions in repairing, as well as their hands; for in 36 hours we had 18 new timbers in and 3 streaks planked up and chimed, and made some sail on our course with a light breeze. It was however, a long time before the ship was safe from bad weather, as every beam, timber and knee, and breasthook, and deck plank forward of the fore swifter, was stove.

Fountains.—New-York, while its business cognomen is the commercial emporium, may well be also named the Fountain city. No city in the world can have such fountains as we. No one has such a head or such an abundance of water. The fountains of Paris, and Europe generally, are played by machinery, and at great expense; but with us, the water leaps forth with its own joy of liberty. We have a river to sport with,—to us profusely,—to let flow without measure. There is nothing in the whole world to compare with our Croton water.—Jour. Com.

Melancholy Accident.—A most melancholy accident occurred on Thursday last, near Broken Sword post office, Crawford county, Ohio. Mr. Augustus Machold, late resident of Columbus, descended into a well which he had been digging, and before he had reached the bottom he fell senseless, from the effects of what are called the damps. His wife immediately ran to a neighbor's about 50 rods distant, and procured the assistance of Mr. C. Jacod, who immediately went into the well, when he became affected in the same manner.—Mr. Charles Scheller next descended and experienced the same effects. His father, Mr. George Scheller, then went to their assistance, and met the fate of the others. The well was then cleared of the noxious gas by means of fire, and the bodies taken out. Vigorous efforts were made to resuscitate them, but they were all dead except the younger Scheller, who had recovered.—Ohio State Journal.

State Loan.—We understand that all of the State loan advertised for by the Comptroller, $250,000, bearing interest at 7 per cent. per annum, redeemable in 1849, has been disposed of at par. The Bank of the State of New-York, and the Manhattan Company received the subscriptions.—Com. Adv.

Longevity—Remarkable Case.—A most remarkable case of longevity in cold rigid New England, is that of John Gilley, of Augusta, Me., who died a short time since, at the venerable age of 124. He married at the age of 80, a girl of 18 years old, by whom he had ten children, the youngest of whom at his death was more than 100 years younger than his father. He was of Irish origin, but a native of Maine. His hair was of a pure silver white, a small lock of which was exhibited to us, a day or two since, by a gentleman of this city, who had it from his physician. A short time before his death it turned black. His teeth were perfect and sound to within a short period of his death. So remarkable a man was he in his day, that he was a subject of curiosity to all who visited that section of the country where he resided. The late Dr. Harris, was of that number. The late Gov. Gore of this Commonwealth, while on a tour to Maine, paid him a visit, and gave him a dollar for every year of his life.—Boston Trans.

Squirrels and a sign of a hard winter.—The Detroit Advertiser says a squirrel hunt took place near that city last week Tuesday. The total killed was 3360. Other papers notice like wholesale slaughters. The squirrels seem to abound this fall in unusual profusion all over the country. For some weeks past the woods in the neighborhood of Fort Erie, across the river have literally swarmed with them. Within the past week or two they have crossed the Niagara to this side in immense numbers. The rapidity and width of the river have, of course, proved fatal to many of them, but little armies of them have nevertheless succeeded in gaining our shore, whence they pushed off south. On the Allegany river, we are told they are so numerous, that it is not deemed worth while to waste powder and shot in killing them. Those wishing a squirrel pie stand on the banks of the stream and knock the little 'varmint' on the head with a stick as they swim across.—This apparently general emigration of the squirrels to the south, is held by the Indians, and others knowing in such matters, to betoken a hard winter.—Buffalo Com. Adv.

Tariff.—The girls who, a few weeks ago, fled from Lowell, Nassau, Manchester, Exeter, Dover, Great Falls, and other manufacturing villages in New England, to their many and scattered homes, are beginning to find their way back at the call of the manufacturers, to the villages they had deserted.—Newburyport Herald.

Something new—More of the Welland Canal.—A schooner came into our port on Wednesday, from St. Josephs, on Lake Michigan, with 5000 bushels of wheat for Charles J. Hill. This is a rare event, but it is important. We are assured, by a gentleman acquainted with the forwarding business, in all its branches, that if there was a good McAdam road made to the river, opposite Carthage, he could land wheat at the mills in Rochester at from 2 to 5 cts. a bushels cheaper than if brought down the Erie Canal!—Roch. Dem.

The Post Office Department has issued a regulation requiring that no person under the age of 16 years be employed as a mail carrier on any post route, or a clerk in any post office in the United States. The better to enforce this regulation, it is required, that the ages of the carriers and clerks be entered upon the oaths of offices which they respectively take, before they are transmitted by the contractor or post master to the Department for file.

Portland, Me., was the scene of a destructive conflagration on the 12th ult., at about half past 10 o'clock. It commenced in the cabinet warehouse of Mr. George Clark on Congress street, and destroyed 11 houses and stores. The American estimates the amount of property destroyed at $30,000.—The space burnt over was three acres.

The grand jury at Rochester have indicted Mr. Bissel, the canal commissioner, for obstructing the highway. The step has been taken for the purpose of bringing a disputed question about bridges to a focus.

The steamboat Great Western, freighted with cotton, from Columbia, Arkansas, for New Orleans, ran on a sand bar about twenty-two miles below Natchez, ran on a sand bar about twenty-two miles below Natchez, on the 5th inst., and careened over. About five hundred bales of the cotton went floating in the Mississippi. The captain, clerk, and a passenger were also thrown overboard, but they saved themselves.

A Mr. Stearns, of Sacketts' Harbor, disappeared several weeks since, and serious fears were entertained for him. It appears, however, that he is safe. He traveled from his home to Iowa Territory, without being conscious of his wandering. His derangement is supposed to have proceeded from a blow, which he received on the head last winter.

The Supreme Court of Connecticut commenced its session at New Haven on the 11th inst., and in three days granted divorces to four dissatisfied wives.

The American Temperance Union says that the proprietor of the Schenectady Temperance House says he has averaged $2,08 cents per day more than when he sold rum; while a fashionable drinking house in Harrisburg, Pa., which, three years ago, took $430 on the 4th of July, this year received at the bar only $2,50.

To be Hung.—At the late Common Pleas in Sandusky County, Ohio, Joseph Sperry was convicted of the murder of his wife, and sentenced to be hung on the 2d of November next.

An Old Time Speculator.—The debts due by the estate of John Nicholson, once the partner of Robert Morris, of Revolutionary memory, are said to amount to twelve million dallars! He was Comptroller General of Pennsylvania, from 1782 to 1795, and in some way used the public funds to carry on his speculations.

French Charitable Statistics.—There are in France 1,329 public hospitals and houses of succor, giving aid to 152,830 poor patients and 6,275 bureaux of charity, succoring 695,975 poor persons. The female religious establishments give aid to 1,200,000 sick persons, and instruction, by means of 10,371 teachers, 620,950 children. The Brothers of the Christian Doctrine, in number 2,136, instruct 150,000. The number of teachers in the primary schools amounts to 62,859. There are 15 deaf and dumb schools, and the number of blind provided for is estimated at 20,000.

Three ships of the line, 6 frigates, 1 corvette, 10 brigs, 9 schooners, 4 armed steamers, 3 armed sailing packets, and 2 small vessels of war. The ships of the line are at present not in a state for service, but one, the Soberauo, is fitting out, but one is getting ready at Ferrol, and another will soon be ready for sea.

An Englishman, who had been to this country, was asked on his return home, what he thought of the Falls of Niagara. He said—"they were rather prettyish, but not so great a natural curiosity as a horse race at Newmarket!"

Distress in Washington.—There appears to be no provision for the poor at the capitol of the nation. The Intelligencer says: Instances have not unfrequently occurred, within the last twelve months, of persons being found going about the streets, of this metropolis bereft of reason, home, shelter, protection, friends, or any means whatever to procure them food or raiment which they absolutely needed.

A Competitor for Mons. Paul.—A young man of this city for several days been practising the Herculean feats of Mons. Paul, and in private given proofs of his astonishing strength. In addition to the usual feats of breaking the rope, a pair of Miller's best horses were attached to him but failed to pull him from his hold upon the ladder. It is confidently believed that the French "MONSTRE" is eclipsed by a native.—Buffalo Com.

We learn from Col. Hatch that during the three last terms of the Court of Common Pleas, in the counties of Barnstable, Nantucket, and Dukes, which contain a population of between 40 and 50,000 inhabitants, not a single bill of indictment has been found by the Grand Jary.—Transcript.

At Greenwood, in Oxford county Me., a bear weighing 400 pounds, which had been committing depredations on the corn for several weeks, was caught in the act, and summarily killed a few days since.

The number of church members in the Sandwich Islands is 19,210, being nearly one fifth of the population. The number admitted during the year ending 1st of June last, was 2443. Number of children in the schools, 18000 to 19,000. The King has lately joined the Temperance cociety.

A Robber Shot by a Woman.—The Pittsburgh sun of the 3d inst., states that on Friday evening the family of Mr. Wilson, who lives in Pride's fields, a short distance from the city, were alarmed when about retiring to bed, by hearing a noise in the lower part of the dwelling. Mr. W. being absent, his wife taking a loaded pistol with her, descended to the lower rooms, and just as she got down, she observed a person passing through a door in front of her. She at once presented the pistol and fired, and from the blood discovered round the premises, there is no doubt but the shot took effect. Immediately after the discharge of the pistol a man was seen rushing from the house, and a third was observed in the garden.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and traveling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, trouble and expense. The principal advantage to be derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inksand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents—Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

CASH paid for Sheep and Lamb's Pelts with the Wool on. HART, ACKLEY & CO.
October 4, 1842.

To Families and Invalids.

THE following indispensable family remedies may be found at the village drug stores, and soon at every country store in the state. Remember and never get them unless they have the fac simile signature of Comstock & Co. on the wrappers, as all others by the same names are base impositions and counterfeits. If the merchant nearest you has them not, urge him to procure them at 71 Maiden-lane, the next time he visits New York, or to write for them. No family should be a week without these remedies.

BALDNESS.

Balm of Columbia, for the hair, which will stop it from falling out, or restore it on bald places; and on children make it grow rapidly, or on those who have lost their hair from any cause. All vermin that infest the heads of children in schools, are prevented or killed at once. Find the name of Comstock & Co. on it, or never try it. Remember this always.

RHEUMATISM AND LAMENESS

Positvely cured, and all shrivelled muscles and limbs are restored, in the old or young, by the Indian Vegetable Elixir and Nerve and Bone Liniment, but never without the name of comstock & Co. on it.

PILES &c.

Are wholly prevented, or governed if the attack has come on, if you use the only true Hay's Liniment, from Comstock & Co. All sores and every thing relieved by it that admits of an outward application. It acts like a charm. Use it.

HORSES that have Ring-Bone, Spavin, Wind-Galls, &c., are cured by Roofs' Specific; and Foundered horses entirely cured by Roofs' Founder Ointment. Mark this, all horsemen.

DALLEY'S
MAGICAL PAIN EXTRACTOR SALVE—

The most extraordinary remedy ever invented for all new or old Burns and Scalds and sore Eyes. It has delighted thousands. It will take out all pain in ten minutes, and no failure. It will cure the Piles.

LIN'S SPREAD PLASTERS.

A better and more nice and useful article never was made. All should wear them regularly.

LIN'S TEMPERANCE BITTERS

On the principle of substituting the tonic in place of the stimulant principle, which has reformed so many drunkards. To be used with Lin's BLOOD Pills, superior to all others for cleansing the system and the humors affecting the blood, and for all irregularities of the bowels, and the general health.

Doctor O. C. Lin.

HEADACHE.

DR. SPOHN'S ELIXIR OF HEALTH,

For the certain prevention of Fevers or any general sickness; keeping the stomach in the most perfect order, the bowels regular, and a determination to the surface. Colds, Coughs, pains in the bones, hoarseness, and dropsy are quickly cured by it. Know this by trying.

SARSAPARILLA.

Comstock's Compound Extract. There is no other preparation of Sarsaparilla that can exceed or equal this. If you are sure to get Comstock's, you will find it superior to all others. It does not require puffing.

LIN'S
CELESTIAL BALM OF CHINA.

Fellow-Citizens,—Perhaps you think that this Balm is intended to cure too many diseases, but we assure you that all diseases of this character, and many others that might be mentioned, are speedily cured, or in truth persons greatly relieved, by the use of this medicine. We earnestly request the afflicted to give it a fair trial.

Entered according to act of Congress, in the year 1842, by Comstock & Co., in the Clerk's office of the Southern District of New York

Christian Review.
A GOOD PROPOSITION.

THE importance of the Christian Review is admitted. It was commenced nearly seven years since in obedience to an urgent and almost spontaneous call from different parts of the land, and in compliance with that call, has been sustained through six successive volumes, only by special effort, and considerable sacrifice (previous to the present volume) on the part of a few individuals. The number of subscribers, however, has gradually increased, so as to inspire the hope that ultimately, the list would become such as to place it above "want," and on a basis that should insure its perpetuity; and with proper exertions on the part of its friends, it is believed such a result might easily be accomplished.

The work is put at the low price of three dollars per annum, in order to bring it within the means of as large a number as possible. Yet, many who are able, and who would be benefitted by its perusal, are not now subscribers, and need, it is thought, only to be reminded of the facts to become so.

The work occupies a high position among the religious quarterlies of the country, and in the estimation of intelligent men of all Christian denominations, is contributing a good share of the religious periodical literature of the age. To the Baptist denomination, in particular, it is an auxiliary in defence and illustration of the truth, with which it is believed, we cannot afford to dispense. And, since the committee and the publishers have resolved, never again to make an appeal for pecuniary aid, but to discontinue its publication whenever the subscriptions cease to be sufficient to sustain it, it becomes every well-wisher of the Review to exert himself now in its behalf.

☞The publishers having a number of the past volumes on hand, propose, in order to interest some who may be desirous of possessing it, yet feel unable to subscribe, to exert their influence to obtain new subscribers, and by so doing not only secure it for themselves, but, by increasing its circulation, extend its usefulness, and help also in insuring its perpetuity—to offer a PREMIUM for new subscribers, as follows.

☞Any person obtaining TWENTY NEW SUBSCRIBERS and remitting the publishers sixty dollars, shall be entitled to a complete set of the Review in seven volumes, the subscription price of which is, TWENTY ONE DOLLARS!

 For FIFTEEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS the last five volumes will be given—subscription price FIFTEEN DOLLARS!

 For TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, the last TWO VOLUMES, subscription price, SIX DOLLARS!

For FIVE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, either of the last three volumes, subscription price, THREE DOLLARS!

It is hoped that this very liberal premium, may induce many of the friends of the Review to make a renewed effort in its behalf, and thus not only reap benefit themselves, but aid the great object the Review is intended to sustain.

SUBSCRIBERS are reminded of the terms of subscription, "three dollars per annum IN ADVANCE." Have you paid your subscription? The money is much needed.

GOULD KENDALL & LINCOLN, Publishers,
59 Washington Street.

N. B. The publishers of any religious paper who shall give the above advertisement three insertions in their columns (and send a copy to the publishers) shall be entitled to a selection of either two of the last four volumes.

Boston, August 10th.

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers, and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business, in "Mechanic's Hall," in rooms adjoining the "Register Office," in all its various branches, where they will be happy to wait on customers on the shortest notice. Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done up in a style not surpassed by any of the "Craft" in this "village or county;" and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

DE RUYTER INSTITUTE.

M. L. WOOD, A. B., Principal.
Instructor in Languages, and Lecturer on Chemistry.
G. M. LANGWORTHY,
Instructor in Mathematics, and Lecturer on Natural Philosophy and Astronomy.

Ladies' Department.

Miss MARY SEVERANCE, Preceptress.
Instructress in French, Drawing, and Painting, &c.
Miss ELIZABETH B. GOODRICH.
Instructress in the Primary Department.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

TUITION.

In the common English branches.	$3,50
In the Languages and higher English branches,	5,00
In Drawing,	2,00
In Painting,	2,00
Extras,	,50

Tuition in advance.

N. B. Those desiring to qualify themselves for teaching, will be furnished with every facility for doing so, and when duly qualified will receive a certificate of recommendation.

A Christian Father's present to his Family.

HOLIDAY GIFT FOR THE YEAR 1843.
A BOOK FOR EVERY FAMILY IN THE UNITED STATES.

AGENTS WANTED.

ONE Hundred Dollars given for every one hundred copies sold!—Agents—responsible men—wanted in every town and village throughout the United States and British Provinces, to sell 'Sears' Bible Biography,' the most splendidly illustrated and Cheapest work ever issued on the American Continent, containing several hundred Engravings, entirely new and original, designed and executed by the most eminent artists of England and America. Cost of preparing the work, $5000. This beautiful and important work contains upwards of 500 pages royal octavo, is printed from new stereotype plates, handsomely bound in gilt, and lettered, and retails readily at the low price of $2 50 per volume. The following extract is from a lengthy Review, written by the Rev. W. C Brownlee, D. D., and is only one out of several hundred recommendations, from the clergy and the press, that the work has already received.

New-York, August 6, 1842.

"This is, beyond question, one of the most elegant books ever presented to our fellow citizens in this Republic. It ought to be in every Christian family for its innate value; and in every patriotic family as a splendid specimen of our progress in domestic manufactures, and the advancement of our artists and manufacturers in their rivalship with those of Europe. W. C. BROWNLEE."

A very liberal offer!—One Hundred Dollars will be given by the Publisher to every Agent who will undertake and sell One Hundred Copies of the above Work. He believes that there is scarcely a town or village in the Union, but that numbers may easily be disposed of.

 Persons inclosing money, will be careful to pay the whole postage; and in ordering books will state, explicitly, how the books shall be sent to them.

Also, in press, another important, valuable, and cheap work, in the course of publication, and will be ready for delivery early in October, 1842, complete in one volume royal octavo, containing about 600 pages of letter-press, and more than five hundred Engravings, elegantly bound in gilt; price only $2 50 per copy.

The Wonders of the World,
In Nature, Art, and Mind.

Comprising a complete Library of Useful and Entertaining Knowledge, and illustrated by more than FIVE HUNDRED ENGRAVINGS.

Consisting of Views of Cities, Edifices, and other great works of Architecture, Monuments, Mechanical Inventions, Ruins, Illustration of the Manners and Costumes of different Nations, Religious Rites and Ceremonies, Cataracts, Volcanoes, Curiosities, Trees Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Reptiles, and the numerous objects contained in the Fossil, Vegetable, Mineral, and Animal Kingdoms. Carefully compiled by ROBERT SEARS, from the best and latest sources.

For further particulars, please to address the subscriber, post paid, without which no letter will be taken from the office. ROBERT SEARS, Publisher, 122 Nassau street, N. Y.

The above will be found the most useful and popular work ever published, for enterprising men to undertake the sale of, in all our cities and towns.

All Clergymen, Superintendants and Teachers of Sabbath schools, Agents of Newspapers and Periodicals, and Postmasters, are respectfully requested to act as Agents.

To Publishers of Religious Newspapers throughout the United States.

Religious papers copying the above, entire, without any alteration or abridgment, (including this notice,) and giving it Six Months' insertion in their papers, shall receive a copy of each of the above works (subject to their order,) together with the well known and popular work, (in 3 vols.) entitled "Pictorial Illustrations of the Bible and views in the Holy Land," forming an illustrated Commentary of the Old and New Testament, each volume containing 200 Scriptural Engravings, and 400 pages of interesting letter press descriptions, 8vo., substantially bound. Compiled from the Notes of the London Pictorial Bible, which sells in this country for $20 per copy.—September 24, 1842. 33mo

POETRY.

The following lines were sung at the close of a Missionary Discourse by Eld. J. L. Scott, at the last session of the General Conference. They were written for the occasion.

Hark! hark! what cry arrests my ear?
It is a distant plaintive prayer:
"O friends of Jesus hear!
Behold us in these western wilds,
Where vice the youthful heart beguiles,
And rolls its dark career.

"Our souls cry out in deep distress,
Where is the road from wretchedness?
We die in deep despair.
A gleam of light has pass'd our brow;
To seek its source we know not how;
For help we now appear.

"A man of God just pass'd us by
In haste, he said, 'prepare to die,
To meet your final doom.'
In melting strains he loudly cried,
'In Christ's pavilion quickly hide,
Secure from wrath to come.'

"We flew, the joyful news to grasp;
He cried, 'improve, for I'm in haste,
But little can I stay.'
He look'd on us, and as he went
'Prepare,' he said, for the event
Of time—for endless day.'

"We sought his feet, but he was gone;
His message left, his moments flown,
To other fields he fled.
On him we gaz'd—like time he flew,
His visage died upon our view—
We grasp'd what light he shed.

"Half wak'd, we struggle here in night,
O, Christians! where's the perfect light
That leads the soul to God?
Shall we in moral darkness dwell,
And crowd the road that leads to hell,
Nor flee the friends' abode?"

O, Christians! hear their bitter cry,
That rolls the Mississippi by,
And mounts to God above,
O, will you let them plead in vain
Since Christ the Lord for all was slain,
That all might know his love?

Haste, then, the messengers prepare,
And quickly send them, send them there,
To teach the road to heaven.
May God on high prepare their way,
And as they point to endless day,
Salvation will be given.

When here we fail, in realms above
We'll bathe eternal in that love
That sends this message round.
With angels blest, on seraph's lyre.
Our harps well tuned with holy fire,
Shall joyful praise resound.

KNOWLEDGE FOR THE PEOPLE.

WORKING METALS.

Why are the ancient Britons concluded to have been expert in working metals?

Because the art of working in iron and steel had risen to such perfection in the tenth century, that even the horses of some of the chief knights and barons were covered with steel and iron armour. Artificers who wrought in iron were so highly regarded in that warlike time, that every military officer had his smith, who constantly attended his person to keep his arms and armour in order. The chief smith was an officer of considerable dignity in the court of the Anglo-Saxon and Welsh kings, where he enjoyed many privileges, and his wages were much higher than those of any other artificer. In the Welsh court, the king's smith was next in rank to the domestic chaplain, and was entitled to a draught of every kind of liquor that was brought into the hall.

Why were bellows first invented?

Because they might imitate the action of the lungs and a hollow reed placed in the mouth of the blower, the latter being the first instrument employed for blowing a fire. Our commom bellows appear to have been known to the ancient Greeks, and Roman lamps have been found in the form of bellows.

Why is it to be regretted that we know but little of the ancient construction of bellows?

Because more information on this subject would enlarge the knowledge we possess of the metallurgy of the ancients.

Strabo tells us, on the authority of an old historian, that Anacharsis the Scythian philosopher, invented the bellows, the anchor, and the potter's wheel: but this seems doubtful, as Pliny, Seneca, Diogenes, Laretius, and Suidas, only attribute the two last to him; and Strabo also remarks, that the potter's wheel is mentioned by Homer, who lived prior to the time of Anarcharsis. It is therefore, probable that the latter became acquainted with the invention on his travels, and having made it known to his countrymen, was looked upon as the inventor.

Why are forge-bellows constructed with three boards.

Because they are required to keep up a constant and unremitting stream of air through the fuel, to keep it in vivid combustion. Thus, the centre board is fixed, and furnished with a valve opening upwards, the lower board being movable with a valve also opening upwards, and the upper board being under a continual pressure by weights acting upon it. When the lower board is let down, so that the chamber between it and the middle board is enlarged, the air included between these boards being rarified, the external pressure in the atmosphere will open the valve in the lower board, and the chamber between the lower and the middle boards will be filled with air in its common state. The lower board is now raised by the power which works the bellows, and the air between it and the middle board is condensed. It cannot escape through the lower valve, because it opens upwards. It acts therefore, with a pressure proportional to the working power on the valve in the middle board, and it forces open the valve, which opens upwards. The air is thus driven from beneath the lower and middle boards into the chamber between the middle and upper boards. It cannot return from this chamber, because the valve in the middle board opens upwards. The upper board being loaded with weights, it will be condensed while included in this chamber, and will issue from the nozzle with a force proportionate to the weights. While the air is thus rushing from the nozzle, the lower board is let down and again drawn up, and a fresh supply of air is brought into the chamber between the upper and the middle and upper board. This air is introduced between the middle and upper board before the former supply has been exhausted, and by working the bellows, with sufficient speed, a large quantity of air will be collected in the upper chamber, so that the weights on the upper board will force a continual stream of air through the nozzle.—Lardner.

There are usually two blast-holes to conduct the stream of air from the bellows to the laboratory of the furnace, placed on opposite sides, but so angled that the streams do not impinge on each other.—The bellows are commonly cyllindrical, and their pistons are worked by a steam-engine.

Why are these bellows superior to the house bellows?

Because the latter are constructed only with two boards, and have thus only an intermitting action, or blow by fits, the action being suspended while the upper board is being raised.

Why are the German bellows made of wood superior to those in general use?

Because the effect produced by them is stronger and more uniform, and they last longer. Some idea may be formed of this contrivance from the following sketch.—The entire machine is composed of two boxes placed over each other, the uppermost of which can be moved up and down, in the manner of a lid with a hinge; but the upper box are sufficiently large to contain the lower between them, when raised to its greatest extent. Both are fastened together at the smallest extremity, where the pipe is inserted by a strong iron bolt. Thus, when the boxes fit each other with exactness, and the upper is raised over the under, which is immovable, the space contained within both will be increased; consequently, more air will rush in through the valve in the bottom of the lower one; and when the upper box is again pressed down, this air will be expelled forcibly through the pipe. The only difficulty is to preven any portion of the air from escaping it at any other part of the machine than the orifice of the pipe; and this is obviated by the simple contrivance of placing movable slips of wood at the inner sides of the uppermost box, which, by means of metal springs are pressed to the sides of the lower box, and fill up the intervening space.—Beckmann.

IRON.

Why is the use of iron believed to have been known in the earliest ages?

Because of its frequent mention in the Bible; thus, Tubal Cain, who lived nearly 4,000 years before the commencement of the Christian era, was "an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron." (Gen. iv. 22.) and we read that Abraham took a knife to slay his son Isaac. [Gen. xxii. 10.] In these early times too, mention is made of shears and of shearing of sheep. [Gen. xxxviii. 12, 13.]

Why is this knowledge supposed to have been afterwards lost?

Because many ancient nations used stones, flints, and the horns and bones of various animals, the bones and shells of fish, reeds and thorns, for every purpose in which the moderns now use edge tools of iron and steel.

Chronology informs us, iron was first discovered by the burning of Mount Ida, 1406 B. C. In England by the Romans, soon after the landing of Caesar! first discovered in America, in Virginia, 1715; first cast in England, at Blackstead, Sussex, 1544.

Why was iron, at one period forbidden to be used by the Romans, except in agriculture?

Because they thought iron poisonous, and that wounds made with iron instruments healed with difficulty. Chemistry has, however, exposed this fallacy. Fourcroy says iron is the only metal which is not noxious, and whose effects are not to be feared. Indeed, its effects on the animal economy are evidently beneficial.

Why is iron the most useful of metals.

Because it becomes softer by heat, and has the capability of being welded to another piece of iron, so as to form one entire mass; and this may be done without rivet, solder, or melting either of the pieces. No other metal possesses this singular property, except platinum.

An iron wire only one-tenth of an inch in diameter, will carry 450 pounds without breaking. A wire of tempered steel of the same size will carry nearly 900 pounds.—Black.

Why is the swedish iron superior to British iron?

Because the Swedes smelt with wood instead of coke. It is imported into England in great quantities and is chiefly used for carbonization in steel.

Because it loses a portion of its latent caloric; Dr. Black being of opinion that metals are malleable in proportion to the matter of heat which they contain in a latent state.

Why is cast iron paddled and rolled?

Because a principal part of foreign substances are thus burned away or squeezed out and malleability is conferred upon the metal by rendering it more pure.

By this curious process of puddling, cast iron, after it has been to a certain extent refined, by refusion in a forge, is, in this country, converted into wrought iron. The cast iron is just put into a reveratory furnace, and when in fusion, is stirred, so that every part may be exposed to the air and flames. After a time, the mass heaves, emits a blue flame, gradually grows tough, and becomes less fusible, and at length pulverulement; the fire is then urged, so that the particle again agglutinate at a welding heat, and are gradually wrought up into masses. In that state of intense heat, the masses are passed successively between rollers, and the bars made malleable. They are cut into pieces, placed in parces in a very hot reveratory, and again hammered or rolled out into bars. They are thus rendered more tough, and flexible, and malleable, but much less fusible, and may be considered as nearly pure iron.

Why is iron better cast perpendicularly than horrizontally?

Because of the pressure of the upright column, which renders the iron much less liable to air bubles and imperfections of that kind, which defeat the skill and calculations of the machinist. If this upright pressure be increased by a weight of extraneous metal, the casting is still more likely to be sound.

Why is a rod of wrought iron, if plunged into cast iron in fusion, become steel?

Because the iron absorbs part of the carbon. What is called case-hardening, is a conversion of the surface of iron into steel.

Why is the proces by which iron is converted into steel, cementation?

Because it consists in heating bars of the purest iron in contact with charcoal; it absorbs carbon, and increases in weight, at the same time acquiring a blistered surface. This, when drawn into smaller bars, forms shear steel.

In this process it has been commonly considered that the carbon combines mechanically with the iron; our chemists have, however, long been of opinion, that it is a chemical combination that takes place by the gradual absorption of carbon in the gaseous state, by the iron. This fact has been proved by Mr. Charles Mackintosh, of Scotland, who has taken out a patent for preparing steel, by subjecting the iron to a stream of carburetted hydrogen gas, enveloped from coal under distillation.—This iron is enclosed in a pot or crucible in the furnace, and when arrived at the proper heat, a stream of gas is directed by a pipe into the crucible, which has another aperture to allow that part of the gas to escape, which has not been taken up by the metal. Steel, in ingots, is porous; but to confer solidity, it is hammered, tilted, and rolled. By the power of a water-wheel, fifteen feet in diameter, hammers are worked, weighing from 2 to 4 1-2 cwt. and strike, at ten or twelve inches fall, from 100 to 200 times in a minute. The ingots, at a strong red heat, are exposed to the action of these hammers, and the metals condensed into bars, which are next submitted, at the same degree of heat, to the tilting hammers, which gives 300 strokes per minute; lastly, they are rolled or flattened into sheets, and drawn into lengths. Six tons a week are hammered down by a single hammer; about three tons are tilted; and twenty-four tons can be rolled, working night and day, by relays of hands.

The making of steel is a British manufacture scarcely sixty years old. Previously it came from Austria and Syria, and was dear and little use. It is however, now heated, welded, cut, and moulded in Great Britain, with nearly the same facility as deal wood by an ordinary carpenter.

Why is steel tempered?

Because when steel is heated to a cherry-red color, and then plunged into cold water, it becomes so extremely hard and brittle, as to be unfit for any practical purpose; the tempering reduces it from this extreme hardness, by heating to a certain point or temperature.

The polishing of steel is not executed in the same manner as that of the softer metals; the steel is not polished until it has been hardened, and the harder it is, the more brilliant will be its polish. Rotten-stone, a kind of very light tripoli, but finer than the other sorts is used.

Why are the most minute instruments generally made with good steel?

Because it is much more ductile than iron; a finer wire being drawn from it than from any other metal.

An Old Apologue.—A man going out of his beaten and directed way to gather unlawful fruits, fell into a deep pit. In his fall he caught hold on the arm of a tree growing in it. Thus he hung in midway, betwixt the upper light from which he fell, and the lower darkness to which he was falling. He looks downward, and sees two worms gnawing at the root of this tree. He looks upward and spies on a branch a hive of honey. He climbs up to it and feedeth on it. But in the meantime, the worms did bite in sunder the root, and down falls man and tree and all, into the bottom of a dark pit. Man himself is this wretch, who, straying from the way of God's commandments, fell to eat of the forbidden fruit—instantly he fell. The pit over which he hangeth is the grave; and the tree whereby he holdeth is this mortal life; the two worms are day and night; and the hive of honey is the pleasures and lusts of this world. Thereupon he greedily feeds, until the two consumers, day and night, in their vicissitudes, have eaten asunder the root of life. Then down drops earth to earth; there it must lodge in the silent grave, neither seeing nor seen, blended in the forgotten dust and undistinguished mould, till it be awakened by archangel's trump in the great day of Christ.—Old Writer.

'Halloa, you man with the pail and frock!' said a British officer, as he brought his fiery steed to a stand in front of Gov. Chittenden's dwelling—'Can you inform me whether His Excellency the Governor of Vermont resides here?'

'He does,' was the response of the man, still wending his way to the pig-stye.

'Take my horse by the bit, then,' said the officer, 'I have business to transact with your master.'

Without a second bidding the man did as requested, and the officer alighted and made his way up to the door, and gave the panel some hearty taps with the but of his riding whip—for be it known, in those days of republican simplicity, knockers and bells, like servants, were in but little use. The good dame of the house answered the summons in person; and having seated the officer and ascertained his desire to see the Governor, departed to inform her husband of the guest's arrival; but on ascertaining that the officer had made a hitching post of her husband, and immediately returned and informed the officer that the Governor was engaged in the yard, and could not well wait upon his Honor and his horse at the same time. The predicament of the officer can be better imagined than described.

Corn Stalk Molasses.—We are gratified to acknowledge the receipt of a sample of corn stalk molasses, made by Mr. Carpenter, of Galesburg. Its flavor is somewhat peculiar, reminding us at one time of one thing and at another time of another, until we have decided that there is nothing which it so much resembles in all respects as sugar-house New Orleans, though an epicure would certainly pronounce it somewhat inferior. This is the first year of its manufacture in Galesburg, Mr. C. being the first and only person thus far in that place to engage in it. His apparatus, we are informed, cost about $150, and will make one barrel of molasses a day, which sells readily at 40 cents a gallon. When the corn is properly planted and prepared, one acre will yield two barrels. As Mr. C. makes for his neighbors "on the halves," the corn grower will receive a barrel of molasses for an acre, which is certainly a more profitable product than corn at 25 cents a bushel. The mill is worked by two horses, and requires the manual assistance of the owner and two boys. There is a similar mill in the country, we understand, propelled by one horse, which answers tolerably well. What experiments have been made in sugar-making we know not, though as the molasses is said to granulate without fail, sugar must follow as a matter of course.

We saw a farmer in the country the other day gathering his water melons, in order to boil the contents into sugar. We hope he will forward us the results of his labors.—Peoria (Ill.) Register.

Anecdote of an Irish Sweep.—Some years ago an effort was made to collect all the chimney-sweepers in the city of Dublin, for the purpose of education. Among others came a little fellow, who was asked if he knew his letters. 'O, yes;' was the reply.

'Do you spell?'

'O, yes,' was again the answer.

'Do you read?'

'O, yes.'

'And what book did you learn from?'

'O, I never had a book in my life, sir.'

'And who was your schoolmaster?'

'O, I never was at a school.'

Here was a singular case, a boy could read and spell without a book or a master. But what was the fact? Why, another little sweep, a little older than himself, had taught him to read by showing him the letters over the shop doors, which they passed as they went through the city. His teacher, then, was a little sweep like himself, and his book the sign-boards on the houses.—What may not be done by trying!

Benefits of Affliction.—When Mr. Cecil was walking in the Botanical Garden of Oxford, his attention was arrested by a fine pomegranate tree, cut almost through the stem near the root. On asking the gardner the reason of this—"Sir," said he, "this tree used to shoot so strong that it bore nothing but leaves. I was, therefore, obliged to cut it in this manner; and when it was almost through, then it began to bear plenty of fruit." The reply afforded this inquisitive student a general practical lesson which was of considerable use to him in after life, when severely exercised by personal and domestic afflictions. Alas! in many cases it is not enough that the useless branches of the tree be lopped off, but the stock itself must be cut and cut nearly through—before it can become extensively fruitful. And sometimes the finer the tree, and the more luxuriant its growth, the deeper must be the incision.

The worthiest people are the most injured by slander; as we usually find that to be the best fruit which the birds have been pecking at.

A good conscience is the finest opiate.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PROSPECTUS OF THE FARM HOUSE OF THE XIX CENTURY, OR ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE, containing the best mode of culture adopted in France, England, Germany, and Flanders; full practical instructions to guide the small cultivator, the farmer, the director, and the large proprietor in the improvement of an estate; the general principle of agriculture, and the culture of all the useful plants; the training of domestic animals, and the veterinary art; the description of various arts relating to agriculture; rural implements and buildings; the management and improvement of vines, fruit trees, timber, and forests, tanks, etc.; the economy, organization, and direction of a rural establishment; and finally, legislation as applied to agriculture; closing with a table of contents alphabetically arranged; a list of figures, abbreviations, and authorities cited

An Elementary, Complete, and Methodical Course of Rural Economy, with more than Two Thousand Engravings, representing the various Implements, Machines, sets of Apparatus, Breeds of Animals, Trees, Shrubs, and Plants, Rural Buildings, etc. Digested and Revised by a Committee of Scientific and Practical Agriculturists, belonging to the Agricultural Society of France, under the direction of M. T. Bailey, Member of the Societies of Agriculture and Horticulture. Translated from the French, with Notes adapting it to the use of farmers in the United States of America, by Elizur Wright, jr., formerly Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the Western Reserve College, Translator of La Fontaine's Fables, &c.

Agriculture is the foundation of all human arts—the art for which man was made, and the perfection of which is his chief happiness and glory as the lord temporal of this planet. Of this sublime art, all other arts and sciences are but satellites, their business being to wait on, enlighten, and adorn it with their moonshine. Consequently, no man more than the agriculturalist needs the full use of his brains, and a perfect command of all the treasures of human experience. So the farmer of the United States view the matter; and in presenting them with a translation of the celebrated Maison Rustique of the French, we have no doubt of their hearty support. It is the work of all works on practical agriculture; the most scientific, clear, and comprehensive. France has long excelled in profitable farming. This is the source of her wealth. England is rich by coals and commerce. Her agriculture is splendid, but sometimes costs more than it comes to. Those who have fortunes to spend may buy the vast works of Marshall, Dickson Arthor Young, London, &c, but those who wish to get a fortune out of the soil will find the French writers better able to show them the way. The excellence of French elementary works is well known to all teachers. For centuries, the Maison Rustique has been, in France, the standard elementary work—the spelling book and grammar of farming. The present edition for "the nineteenth century," has been re-written and brought up with the "march of mind," by sixty of the ablest "agronomes" of France. It has all the light of the latest improvements, not only in France, but in all Europe.

William Cobbett, one of the most successful farmers both in England and America, who wrote the best English style and the best French grammar that ever was, valued the Maison Rustique, not only as an encyclopedia of farming, but as a means of educating his children. He was his own schoolmaster. In winter evenings his family resolved itself into a school, and he thus speaks of the use then made of this work:

"Our book of never failing resource was the French Maison Rustique, or Farm House, which, it is said, was the book that first tempted Dagnesnois (I think that was his name,) the famous physician in the reign of Louis XIV., to learn to read. Here are the four-legged animals, from the horse down to the mouse, portraits and all; all the birds, reptiles, insects; all the modes of rearing, managing, and using the tame ones, and destroying those that are mischievous; all the various traps, springs, nets; all the labors of the field and garden exhibited, as well as the rest, in plates; and there was I, in any leisure moments, to join this inquisitive group, to read the French, and tell them what it meaned in English, when the picture did not sufficiently explain itself. I never have been without a copy of this book for forty years, except during the time that I was fleeing from the dungeons of Castlereagh and Sidmouth, in 1817, and when I got to Long Island, the first book I bought was another Maison Rustique."—Advice to Young Men, Art. 129.

Of the qualifications of the translator, it may be said that he is a practical farmer, and in regard to his translation of La Fontaine, which has been reprinted in England, an English reviewer confesses that he "does not know the English writer who could have done it better."

Terms.—The work will be published as a semi-monthly periodical, in numbers of 56 pages, octavo, each 25 cents, and when completed will contain forty numbers, at $10.

Five dollars paid in advance for the first 20 Numbers, shall entitle subscribers to the remaining 20 Numbers for four dollars.

Or, nine dollars in smaller sums, (if not less than $1,) regularly advanced during the course of publication, shall entitle the same reduction.

The 1st number will be issued on the 1st of July, 1842.

All orders and remittances should be addressed to S. S. HASKELL, Publisher, 138 Fulton-st. New York.

New York, June 1, 1842.

⁂ All editors who will give this prospectus fifteen insertions, and forward the papers containing them to the New York Watchman, shall be entitled to one copy of the work. 18w15

DIFFICULTIES ARISING FROM THE DOCTRINES OF UNIVERSALISM.

Universalism in this country has had several fathers. Mr. Murray is the father of Universalism as it was; Mr. Ballou, the father of it as it is. Mr. Ballou informs us that he was led to adopt his views of religion by reading a Deistical book. By denying future punishment and the divinity of Jesus Christ, he, in 1818, changed the whole fabric of Universalism; and has earned the title of originator of its present form and character.

Though Mr. Ballou is the author of modern Universalism, it was not through his influence that it has displaced the system of Murray. It is well known that Mr. Ballou is a man of little reading, and limited in his knowledge of books. He had, at the beginning of his public life, barely a common education. And though, after preaching several years, he began to study English grammer, any one who hears him will be convinced that he must have abandoned the attempt soon after the commencement. He had neither personal influence nor intellectual power enough to make his notions popular. Though he published them to the world, they met with little attention among his associates.

About this time, Walter Balfour professed conversion to Universalism. He adopted Mr. Ballou's sentiments, and carried them out with a bold hand. He went far beyond Mr. Ballou, and asserted such strange doctrines, and unheard-of notions, that he claims a place among the fathers of Universalism.

He professed to be a scholar. He talked about Sheol, Hades, Tartarus, and Gehenna, to such a degree, that his associates, unable to decide whether he was a learned man or a pretender, granted his claims, and shared his praise.

Mr. Balfour was brought up in the doctrines of the church of Scotland. He renounced them, however, and became a Haldanite, and as such came to this country, as a missionary, to enlighten the descendents of the puritans in relation to the Bible, and to do the work of a missionary upon the soil of New England. He did not visit this county as a man of distinction. He was not, as Universalists represent, a popular Orthodox preacher. He was an open-communion Baptist, and the body of which he was a member, was feeble and almost unknown.

Soon after he reached this country, he introduced himself to the late Rev. Dr. Morse of Charlestown, and made known the purpose of his mission. Dr. Morse gave Mr. Balfour little encouragement.—Soon after his arrival, Mr. Balfour changed his ground, and avowed himself a Congregationalist. Still he failed to secure that position which he thought his talents ought to command. He soon left the Congregationalists, and announced himself a Baptist. But his standing among the Baptists was not what he wished; and he left them in a short time. He next became a Puritan Baptist, celebrated the communion every Sabbath, and washed his disciples' feet.—Making a hurried descent through Unitarianism and Restorationism, he came down to Universalism; and was embraced by Universalists as one of the greatest and most learned of men.

Before he avowed himself to be a Universalist, Mr. Balfour addressed a series of anonymous letters to Rev. Prof. Stuart, professing to be in doubt upon some of the great doctrines of the gospel, and asking for light. These letters appearing in a Universalist print, endorsed by no responsible name, and bearing internal evidence that the writer was a confirmed Universalist, as no doubt he was, they received no attention from Prof. Stuart.

Indeed, no one supposed, at the time, that the writer expected any notice from the distinguished person whom he addressed; the whole being evidently intended for effect. He then threw off his disguise, and addressed Prof. Stuart over his own name. But he commanded less attention, if possible, when known, than when engaged as an anonymous writer. All by whom he desired to be noticed, knew the man too well to waste upon him either intellect or ink. He gained his object, however. He came to Universalists as a mighty man; as one whom his former brethren dared not attack, and whom Prof. Stuart could not answer.

Claiming to be a learned man, as indeed he was, in comparison with his present associates, Mr. Balfour gave a new aspect to Universalism; and so changed it, that, when it came from his hands, it retained but little of the form it had received from Mr. Murray, the father of the system.

Mr. Balfour contended that no such place as hell ever existed. The being of Satan he expunged from the Bible. The immortality of the soul he denied. He taught that all punishment was limited to this life, that all consciousness ceased with the death of the body, and that men would know nothing after death, till the general resurrection, when they would be created over again.

When I began my public life, the views of Mr. Balfour were generally received by the sect to which I belonged. The divinity of Christ was a theme of ridicule. Future retribution was laughed at as a relic of heathenism. The immortality of the soul was a thing that existed only in the imagination. The Bible was allowed to be an inspired book, provided it taught Universalism; while it was a common remark from the pulpit, that it would be unworthy of confidence if it contained any sentiment inconsistent with the salvation of all men.

I embraced the form of Universalism then prevalent. I was a Humanitarian.—The immortality of the soul, the native depravity of man, the apostacy and the ruin of our race, the plenary inspiration of the Bible, and future punishment, were all set aside by my teachers, and were rejected by myself. There were parts of the Bible that seemed to teach doctrines different from those which I had espoused. But I relieved my mind with the supposition that all systems had their difficulties, and that mine had fewer than others.

In the course of my ministry, as I became familiar with men and opinions, I could not but be impressed with the fact that a great many wise and good men received the doctrines which I rejected. Many of them stood high as men of sense and sound discernment. These men would be confided in, as to other matters. How, then, could they receive doctrines which, to my mind, were so contrary to reason? How could they discover their faith in the Bible, when I knew it taught no such thing? I thought much, read much, and was much perplexed upon this subject. Some parts of the Bible seemed to be built upon the fact that the soul is immortal. Other parts seemed to assert the divinity of the Redeemer. There was much too, that intimated that this life is one of trial, and that its actions will decide the endless destiny of man.

Though the principles of interpretation which I brought to the Bible helped me to get over these difficulties in a great measure, yet in all cases I could not satisfy myself. And, besides, those principles obliterated some of the most obvious truths.—The same reasoning that blotted from the Bible eternal death, also blotted out endless life. When I extinguished the fires of hell, I put out, at the same time, the light of heaven. When I had proved that Satan had no existence, the same arguments would annihilate the being of God, and make atheism the true faith.

From this perplexity I sought and found relief in the following manner: Some years ago, I had presented to me a book, containing the studies pursued at the Andover Theological Seminary, together with the doctrines there taught, and a reference to the works in which each doctrine was explained and defended.

Taking the book one day from my library, I resolved to investigate this subject, and see what the advocates of Orthodoxy could say in its defence. I had access to a very valuable theological library, and availed myself of its ample stores to obtain information as to those doctrines which have so long composed the faith of the church of Christ. I had no design or desire to embrace the creed I was about to examine. But the world seemed full of ideas about the fall of angels and men, and of the doctrines of depravity, atonement, regeneration, and eternal judgment. It was my desire to know upon what these and kindred doctrines were based; to inform myself in respect to the amount of evidence derived from the Bible in their support.

For some time I was engaged in this work. As I proceeded, I was astonished to find how grossly caricatured the doctrines of grace had been, and how much reason and Scripture were on their side.—I often found those despised sentiments sustained by an amount of evidence which I was unable to remove.

As the results of this inquiry, my views on most of the important doctrines of the gospel were materially changed. Indeed, from the commencement of my ministry, my views had undergone a gradual and imperceptible change, till the grace of God led me to embrace fully the doctrines of the cross.—Universalism Examined, &c., by M. H. Smith.

"I AM SUCH A SINNER."

Such is often the exclamation of men, who, long deluded by self-righteous views, at length discover their lost condition. For, strange as it may seem, there are but very few wicked men in the world, who are fully convinced that they are wicked. 'Every way of a man is right in his own eyes.'—'Ye are they which justify yourselves.'—'There is none iniquity in me, that were sin.' 'What have we spoken so much against thee? 'Wherein have we robbed thee?' are passages of Scripture, which aptly and justly represent the real state of feeling in the mass of unregenerate men. One great and often successful device of the adversary is to persuade men that they are good enough, and that the offer of mercy to sinners is not required in order to their salvation. The consequence is, that the best tidings in the gospel are regarded by many as wholly destitute of interest, and by some, as a detraction from their established worthiness. The giant, refreshed, does not more disdainfully reject proposals to amputate his right arm, than does the sinner the offer to save him by grace. But this delusion will not last always. In this world it is sometimes taken away. Jehovah, by his Spirit, gives power to the truth and quickness to the conscience, and the exceeding bitter cry—'I have sinned'—'I have sinned against the Lord,' is heard from him, whom nothing had formerly been able to humble and subdue. When this state of mind is produced, the adversary commonly tempts to an extreme the opposite of that formerly noticed, and the awakened soul is almost persuaded that its sins exceed the limits of divine mercy—that it has no ground of hope left it. Thus despair succeeds presumption, and both alike work the ruin of the soul.

To souls borne down with a sense of sin, we wish to say a few things deemed suitable to their circumstances.

1. Awakened sinner! your heart and your life are both as wicked as you have ever thought them to be. Yea, you have never seen the worst of the case. You could not bear the sight of all your offenses against the Holy One. They are both more numerous and more henious than you have ever seen them to be. It is a mercy indeed that God has not shown you the very worst of your state. The sight would have overwhelmed you.

2. Yet it is no less a mercy that he has showed you enough to make you feel the need of divine mercy. It is infinite kindness in God that he did not let you sleep on until it was eternally too late. Bless him for this. Hell is the truth seen too late. But the truth seen in time may lead you to salvation

3. Earnestly, therefore, beseech the Lord to continue the enlightening influence of his Spirit, and hail these convictions as assurances that God has not yet finally forsaken you, but is even now ready to show mercy to you if you will repent and obey the gospel. Pray that your convictions may not leave you.

4. Study and pray that you may understand the way of salvation, and be led to embrace it. Especially forget not that all the merciful provisions of the gospel are for sinners, for the worst of sinners. No minister is allowed to preach any gospel to the amiable and moral, but the very gospel which he is commanded to preach to felons and outbreaking sinners. The door of mercy is as wide open to those who have sinned much, as to those who have sinned comparatively little. If you are a great sinner, Jesus Christ is a great Savior. The history of redemption abounds with wonders of mercy to the worst of men. Be encouraged, therefore, to come to Jesus Christ, and plead for pardon. The invitations and offers are numerous, sincere and very kind. Under these circumstances it is wicked pride and unbelief to cry out, 'I am such a sinner' that I cannot be saved. Real humility would lead you to accept the Savior. Delay no longer, come to Jesus.

While life prolongs its precious light
Mercy is found and peace is given;
But soon, ah soon! approaching night
Shall blot out every hope of heav'n.

While God invites, how blest the day:
How sweet the gospel's charming sound:
"Come sinners, haste, Oh, haste away,
While yet a pard'ning God he's found.

"Soon, borne on time's most rapid wing,
Shall death command you to the grave,
Before his bar your spirits bring,
And none be found to hear, or save.

"In that lone land of deep despair,
No Sabbath's heav'nly light shall rise;
No God regard your bitter pray'r,
Nor Savior call you to the skies."

INFIDELITY AT THE PRESENT DAY.—I am well aware that much has been written and said upon this subject, and furthermore that much good has been accomplished thereby. If such then has been the result, is it not an incentive to action? Most assuredly. The sly creeping advocate of this unprincipled, flimsy, thread-bare doctrine, watches every opportunity imaginable to hurl the thunderbolts in loud acclamations of hypocrisy, backslider, or some other anathemas against the believers of Christianity. For one I am sensible that there is not a single individual, professing to advocate that doctrine of infidelity, who is strictly sincere and honest in his opinions. I state this without the least fear of contradiction. The very nature of man, when viewed by a candid and considerate person, if he is in possession of faith of the size of a mustard seed, is enough in itself to establish the inconsistency of infidelity. Society, as it is now organized, demands from the hands of every well wisher, a strict adherence to the principles of true Christianity. Take away from man the fear of Omnipotence, or remove the penalty attached to the laws of God, and the barrier against the commission of crime is removed. There is no longer a safety for any human being. Perfectly regardless of all, man hastens on to deeds of blood without any restraint. The prominent doctrine of moral restraint is fiction and moonshine. Remove the penalties attached to human laws, and where would lay the virtue of those laws. We need not run into mystification to secure evidences to back up any assertion which this subject may produce; they are every where apparent, they abound in every corner of the universe. But alas! where can the disbeliever resort for his evidence.—Does it abound in etchings and engravings upon the face of nature? Do the blue heavens above, or the deep-rolling ocean below, bear any evidence for him? Do the varied changes of the seasons, the verdure of the spring, or the golden tint of the frost in autumn, bear testimony in his favor?—No; they are so many living witnesses ready at all times to bear testimony of the goodness and wisdom of an Omnipotent Being.—Olive Branch.

Wickedness may well be compared to a bottomless pit, into which it is easier to keep ourself from falling, than having fallen into, to stay oneself from falling infinitely.

From the New-York Evangelist.

GOD'S WITNESS.

There is something in every man that whispers of a judgment to come. Whether he looks upward, or looks forward, gloomy forebodings will loom forth, menacing fearful retribution for guilt. The universal conscience of man has attested the reality and force of this conviction. Everywhere, and at all times, a necessity has been felt for propitiating an unseen, but offended God. The most ignorant minds, from which depravity had well nigh obliterated all vestiges of religious truth, have yielded reluctant but inevitable assent to the stern demand. If we look at the past ages, the world seems to have been but little other than one vast temple of sacrifice, in which ascended the smoke of unnumbered altars, and flowed the blood of countless victims. Nor has it stopped here. If the sullen accusations were not hushed by such oblations as these, incense has been rendered in the sight of human victims, and man has delivered to the knife the fruit of his body, and sought to read in the bleeding heart of desolated love, the assurance of his pardon, and freedom from his guilt.

Conscience may not now seek an expression in the simple practices of ancient sinners, but it is not the less unquenched. Altars do not fill our cities, nor the smoke of sacrifice ascend from our plains; but still is there the same unhushed cry of guilt in every sinner's bosom—the same fearful consciousness of a long and unsettled account with God. There is still a shivering at the thought of that unseen world where mercy becomes retribution, and probation terminates in doom. Few indeed are the sinners who do not, in their hours of thoughtfulness, quail before the frown of the Avenger. Few indeed, who wholly escape from convictions which they cannot express, and apprehensions which no mere earthly peril ever can inspire. "Point me," says one, who in painting the remorse of his own disturbed conscience, spoke for the world of sinners,

"O! point me thou
Some humblest, painfulest, severest path—
Some new austerity, unheard of yet
In Syrian fields of glory, or the sands
Of hottest Egypt. Let me bind my brow
With them; and barefoot seek Jerusalem,
Tracking the way with blood: there day by day,
Inflict upon this guilty flesh, the scourge;
Drink gall and vinegar; and for my bed,
Hang with extended limbs upon the cross,
A nightly crucifixion!————"

Anything! anything of labor, action, toil, or suffering, rather than endure the tortures of a wounded spirit—the burden of the hopeless and unforgiven! So unerringly does God's witness within us testify of his power and his wrath. So luminously does it point to the day of his solemn inquisition. If the sinner trembles at the foreshadow, what shall he do at the coming of the stern reality. If he is afraid in the land of peace, how shall he encounter the swellings of Jordan! W. W.

THE FUGITIVE.—Twenty years ago, a negro, held as a slave by some one in Maryland, escaped to Philadelphia, and took with him his little daughter, aged 8 years. There they lived a long time without any to molest them or make them afraid. After a while the child, now a woman came to New-York to reside. Here she married, and here she had a family, living with her husband and children, in confident belief that no one, not even her companion, knew that she had ever been a slave. At a late hour one night last week, a stranger, (supposed to be an officer,) knocked at her door, and desired her to light him to the next house where some one wished to see her. She took a candle and proceeded to the door, and on opening it saw, to her astonishment, the son of her old master. In a moment she extinguished the light—sprang into the yard, over the fence, and made her escape. She found a temporary asylum in the dwelling of an acquaintance, but this person being afraid of getting into trouble, desired her to seek another place. Between two and three o'clock in the night, she rapped at the house of a minister of the gospel, who treated the trembling woman very kindly, and invited her to stay at his house until her husband was informed where she was. The next day a place of security was found for this poor woman and her children. The young master and the supposed officer, finding their prey had escaped, became furious, searched the house and premises, seized the clothing of the woman and carried it off. They and their assistants are now ransacking every nook and corner where they think the woman is secreted. But a kind Providence has thwarted them, and their efforts to seize and convey this woman, this wife, this mother into slavery will be in vain. A respectable family, however, has been broken up; consternation has been carried into a peaceful dwelling, and terror has been experienced by many hundreds of unoffending persons.

MY MINISTER DOES NOT VISIT ME.—What then? I do not wait for those I want to see, but I go and see them. And I am sure he owes me a visit. I think, however, that I have a good excuse for this seeming neglect, and I ought perhaps to believe that he has as good a one. But he has been several times to see brother A. and B., and if he can find time to visit them, he might find time to come and see me. And is this a just cause for provocation? Am I afraid that he has more affection and regard for them than for me? If I had truly Christian and gracious affection, should I not rather rejoice that they are benefited and honored by his visits, rather than repine at this apparent neglect? And while indulging such a suspicious and jealous disposition, should I be benefited by such visits or would they be beneficial to him? Are not such feelings calculated to destroy all good feelings in the church? And are such feelings produced by that charity which thinketh no evil? But if I really want to see him so much, why do I not manifest such a desire by going to see him? But perhaps he will not want to see me, and he is not very sociable sometimes. But brother S. says he never stops to think whether he wants to see him or not but always improves every good opportunity; for he has a string of inquiries to make, and always finds it more difficult to get away than to make him converse. I am afraid that the most profitable and important subjects were not always brought forward, and this is a good reason why he is not so free. And can he, judging from my conduct, believe that I want to see him, when I pass his door so frequently and never call? I am afraid that I more desire that he should treat me with respect than that he should be useful to others.—And if so, I am growing large in my own esteem—a sad feeling for a Christian.—Would it not be as profitable for me to visit him in his family and see how he carries out at home those principles which he lays down in the pulpit? I am afraid the truth is, he is not paid in any degree according to agreement, and if so, he must of course stay at home more to take care of his own affairs, as it is not in his power to employ others. But, unless I dismiss these reflections, I shall find that the cause of complaint is all on the other side, and get myself deeper and deeper in the mire. I am resolved, therefore, to go and see for myself.—Christian Mirror.

A. LAYMAN.

From the New-York Evangelist.

LET YOUR LIGHT SHINE.

No higher privilege is granted to men on earth, after that of loving God, than to be a worker with God in the salvation of the world. To shine as lights in the world, is glory full of heaven's lustre.

As a means of eliciting this light, and having it so reflected as to be seen afar most resplendent, by deeds of love, the Rev. Mr. Bingham has recently suggested one of the very best.

Let every church choose a committee of three or five, to inquire where are the dark places of earth that need to be enlightened, what is doing to enlighten them, what needs to be done, what its church is doing, how much each member is doing, can do, or knows of what is needful to be done, &c. and report to the church monthly. Let it also inquire how much each member loses, who does nothing to let his light shine—how much he is to be pitied who is unable to do anything to spread light, and he deeply commiserated, who has no heart to do, and must, if he enters heaven at all, enter with no works to follow.

The Tabernacle church of New-York, it is understood, is about to send out and support two missionaries. One dollar a month from one-half of the professors of Protestant Christianity, would evangelize the world in twenty-five years. Now, in this country they give, the Baptists about twenty-five cents a year; Methodists, thirty-five cents; Episcopalians, fifty cents; Presbyterians, seventy-five cents; Congregationalists, one dollar, Well might the churches cover themselves with sackcloth and ashes in shame for its want of care for souls. L.

Unwillingly does the mind digest the evils prepared for it by others; for those we prepare ourselves, we eat but the fruit which we have planted and watered.

————A little child
That lightly draws its breath,
And feels its life in every limb—
What should it know of death?

Wordsworth.

At Smyrna, the burial ground of the Armenian, like that of the Moslem is removed a short distance from the town, is sprinkled with green trees, and is a favorite resort, not only with the bereaved, but with those whose feelings are not thus darkly overcast. I met there one morning, a little girl with a half-playful countenance, busy blue eye, and sunny locks, bearing in one hand a small cup of china, and in the other, a wreath of fresh flowers. Feeling a very natural curiosity to know what she could do with these bright things in a place that seemed to partake so much of sadness, I watched her light motions. Reaching a retired grave covered with a plain marble slab, she emptied the seed—which it appeared the cup contained—into the slight cavities which had been scooped out in the corners of the level tablet, and laid the wreath on its pure face.

'And why,' I enquired, 'my sweet girl, do you put the seed in those little bowls there?'

'It is to bring the birds here,' she replied, with a half wonderful look; 'they will light on this tree,' pointing to the cypress above, 'when they have eaten the seed, and sing.'

'To whom do they sing?' I asked, 'to you or to each other?'

'O no,' she quickly replied, 'to my sister, she sleeps here.'

'But your sister is dead?'

'O yes, Sir, but she hears all the birds sing.'

'Well, if she does hear the birds sing, she cannot see that wreath of flowers.'

'But she knows I put it there; I told her before they took her away from our house, I would come and see her every morning.'

'You must have loved that sister very much,' I continued, 'but you will never talk with her any more; never see her again.'

'Yes, Sir,' she replied, 'I shall see her always in heaven.'

'But she has gone there already, I trust.'

No she stops under this tree, till they bring me here, and then we are going to heaven together.'

'But she is gone already my child; you will meet her there I hope; but certainly she is gone and left you to come afterwards.'

She cast to me a look of inquiring disappointment, and her eyes began to fill with tears.

O yes, my sweet child; be it so,
That near the cypress tree,
Thy sister sees those eyes o'erflow,
And fondly waits for thee.

That still she hears the young birds sing,
And sees the chaplet wave—
Which every morn thy light hands bring,
To dress her early grave.

And in a brighter, purer sphere,
Beyond the sunless tomb,
There virtues that hath charmed us here,
In fadeless life shall bloom.

FALSEHOOD.

This is so common a sin among old and young, that I need not define it; but those who practice it are none the less guilty on that account. Let us see what God says of it. In Proverbs, it is said, 'Lying lips are an abomination unto the Lord.' 'The lip of truth shall be established forever; but a lying tongue is but for a moment.' David says, 'He that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight.' In the Revelation it is said, 'All liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone.'—Many more passages might be quoted to show God's abhorrence of this sin; but we have enough already. We will now turn to one or two instances, in which he has punished those who have been guilty of it.

When Naaman, the leper, had been cleansed by washing in the Jordan, you will recollect that he urged Elisha to accept a present, which he refused. But when Naaman was returning back to his own country, Gehazi, the servant of Elisha, followed after him, and told him that his master had sent him to ask for a talent of silver, and two changes of raiment. This was a falsehood; but Naaman did not know it, and gave him more than he asked. When Gehazi returned home, Elisha asked him where he had been. He said he had been nowhere, and thus told another falsehood. But he was punished most severely; for the leprosy of Naaman clung to him, 'and he went out from Elisha's presence a leper as white as snow.'

In Acts, we have another example.—Ananias and Sapphira, after selling their possessions, as others had done among those early Christians, lied to the apostles, and consequently to the Holy Ghost, and to God. But how great was their punishment! No sooner did Peter rebuke Ananias, than 'he fell down and gave up the ghost.' About three hours after, when Sapphira came in, who was ignorant of the fate of her husband, she also fell down before the rebuke of the apostle, and was buried by his side. What solemn warnings are these to those who do not always speak the truth!

Think, for a moment, of the great evil a falsehood may occasion. It was a falsehood that deceived our first parents, and led them to sin; and O, what a train of suffering has followed in consequence of that falsehood! Its effects are now felt, and will be felt through all eternity. Young reader, are you willing to be a disciple of him who is 'a liar, and the father of it?'—Will you not rather avoid a sin which may lead to such fearful consequences? There are some who seldom tell a direct lie, who are in the habit of deceiving others; do you ever do this? Remember the words of the wise man, 'Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel.'

A poor African mother, with clasped hands and streaming eyes, was once mourning over the death of her son, who had been slain in battle by a Moor. As he was borne along on horseback, she proclaimed to the mournful group all the excellent qualities of her boy. But the one for which she chiefly praised him, formed itself a noble epitaph. 'He never,' said she with pathetic energy, 'never, never told a lie!'—Happy the mother who has this thought to console her, when following a beloved child to the tomb!

Young reader, if truth is such a beautiful trait of character, will you not always strive to possess it! Can you not adopt as your own the desire expressed in the following acrostic?

"Truth! thou angel of heavenly birth,
Rarely an exile to this earth,
Unfold thy beauties to my view,
Till I shall learn to love thee, too,
Heaven-born angel, fair and true!"

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, November 2, 1842.

SANFORD P. STILLMAN, of Westerly, is requested to act as an Agent for the Register in that place, in connection with Eld. Campbell. We will forward you soon a correct transcript of the accounts in your vicinity, also a list of the subscriber's names, and we trust that we shall feel a willingness on our part to compensate you for whatever trouble and expense you may experience in acting in behalf of the Press.

Faith and Works.

That faith that receives Jesus Christ in all his offices as he is revealed in his word, is inseparably connected with works of obedience to all he has required. There is a faith that is without works, and is dead.—This is

1. A bare assent to the truths revealed in the scriptures. There are but few in any religious community that are destitute of this kind of faith. The truths of religion so commend themselves to every thinking man as to gain his assent. And there is such a multitude of witnesses testifying to the redeeming and saving efficacy of the Gospel, that a man must be perversely blind who does not award to Christianity a divine origin. But having given his assent to the truth of the fundamental doctrines of the gospel, from the speculative knowledge he possesses he refuses to yield to its practical duties, thus rendering his faith a speculative or historical thing, without efficiency or power. The Devils have this kind of faith, for it is said of them, "the devils also believe and tremble." But as this kind of faith does not produce obedience to the will of God, it is of no avail.

2. A temporary assent to the word of God. At the present day a variety of means prompt men to embrace the gospel of Jesus. In many instances the word is received with all readiness and joy, and religion engrosses the thoughts and governs the conduct for a time. But when persecution or afflictions come, or when self-denial and sacrifice is required, or when personal convenience, and selfish gratification cannot be subserved, faith is at an end, and the thoughts become swallowed up in sin, and the ways of God are deserted. This arises sometimes from the fact that the reward of religion and not its duties were taken into the account, and sometimes from the fact that a profession of religion would greatly promote selfish and worldly interests. Let the cause be what it may, the faith that endures for a season only, is vain. Some of this class are referred to by the Savior in his parable of the sower. Some receive the seed in stony places, but having no depth of earth soon wither away.

3. A kind of faithless faith, or mock faith, a thing we hardly know how to name. But it is exemplified by receiving a part and rejecting a part of the plan of salvation as revealed by Jesus Christ. Some there are who claim the promises but reject the duties of the gospel, and take the responsibility of deciding how much, and what that God has enjoined, is essential to salvation. This system claims the privilege of receiving a part, and rejecting a part—of taking part as it is, and altering other parts—of rejecting some, and placing a new thing of its own invention in its stead. But as this does not require obedience in all things, it is a faith without suitable works, and is also dead.—But the faith that works by love and purifies the heart, and that is like an anchor to the soul, allows God to give directions while it yields obedience in all things. If a man then does not embrace the gospel entire, with all its duties, restraints, and requirements, and does not yield himself a living sacrifice, and all his members as servants of righteousness, having no desire but to know and to do the will of God as it is revealed, without alteration, abridgement, or substitution, he is destitute of a justifying and saving faith.

The following we take from the Baptist Advocate, and commend it to our readers.—We know not how, however, to reconcile the Advocate with itself. In this article the Editor pleads for "implicit obedience to the precepts of scripture." But in a discussion with one of the former Editors of this paper, to the inquiry whether the fourth commandment is still binding on Christians, he replies, "we express our opinion unequivocally in the negative." Are we now to conclude that the Editor has determined to adopt the self-denial which is so opposed to the pride of human reason, and observe the 4th command as all other precepts of the scripture, or that he will adopt the course he mentions in the first sentence of the following article, and cavil at the precepts of the Bible while he acknowledges their divine authenticity?

"IMPLICIT OBEDIENCE TO THE PRECEPTS OF SCRIPTURE.—One of the most remarkable facts in human experience, is, that those who acknowledge the divine authority of the Scriptures, are often disposed to cavil at their precepts. Even Christians often detect themselves in an earnest endeavor to avoid the obvious import of the commands of God, and to discover some easier method of satisfying conscience than simple, unquestioning obedience. The duty of immediately surrendering our judgment to what is written, is so opposed to the pride of human reason, that probably habitual self-denial is in nothing more difficult. And yet the duty cannot be doubted. And, as the faithful discharge of duty secures blessing, and blessing proportioned in some degree to the arduous nature of the duty, so in this instance, God bestows special grace on those who habitually reverence his word. To "tremble" at the word of God, is one of the most striking characteristics of the man with whom He dwells, and is an invariable accompaniment of deep humility and contrition of heart.

"The effect of an external manifestation of our habitual reverence for God's word and implicit obedience to it, is most salutary upon the minds of observers. The unconverted are convinced of the sincerity of our profession, and are themselves led to respect that which we always so scrupulously regard. They fear to infringe upon feelings and sentiments evidently so profound and sacred, and are thus restrained from that levity in speaking of the Scriptures to which the world are so much disposed. And it is only when we show ourselves most scrupulous in obeying the precepts of Scripture, that we can with apparent consistency urge upon others that obedience by repentance and faith which is requisite for their eternal salvation.

A friend has handed us a copy of the articles of faith and practice of the Black River Baptist Association, from which we extract the following:—

Art. 12. We believe that the command, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy" is still obligatory upon all who have the light of revelation, that the first day of the week, called in the New Testament Lord's day, is to be observed as the Christian Sabbath, &c.

Are we to understand from this that both the seventh and first days are observed by them as the Christian Sabbath? It is surely so if their conduct and language agree. They declare first, that the command which definitely declares the seventh-day to be the Sabbath to be still obligatory on all who have the light of revelation. They must either place themselves beyond the light of revelation, or keep the seventh-day in order to be consistent with themselves. Perhaps some of the members of that Association will tell us why they keep two Sabbaths every week, or if they do not, why their professions and practices are discordant?

A correspondent writes us as follows:—'I came here with your father yesterday, on purpose to hear him preach on the Sabbath question last evening, but was disappointed, because in the opinion of some of the Sunday keepers, it seemed to be a violation of the Sabbath to have the subject taken up on that day."

Here we have the idea that the Sabbath is so holy that it must not be defiled by enforcing the doctrine of the Sabbath during its hallowed hours. It is so sacred that a mention of itself must not be made while it lasts. This sort of logic we know not how to understand. We leave it with our readers for digestion.

Hard Times.

Our agent, A. H. BURDICK, while on board of the steam boat from New York to Stonington, was robbed of his papers, including our accounts, and was thereby unable to effect a settlement. We pity the poor fellow who took them, for poor indeed must he be to be driven to the necessity of stealing newspaper accounts. As Mr. B. has returned, our subscribers will make their remittances through our local agents as usual.

For the Register.

Reasons for not Patronizing the Register.

MR. EDITOR.—I wish very briefly to give you some of the reasons I have had urged why individuals, possessing an abundance of this world's goods, cannot patronize your paper. And, you will understand by the way, that all of the cases which I shall mention, came under my personal observation, while endeavoring to persuade Christians and others that much could be done for the cause of God and his long-neglected Sabbath, by means of the Religious Press among us. How far I succeeded in this behalf the sequel will show.

1. "I will not patronize the Register, because you don't publish half murders and fights enough!" Poor soul! thought I, you must be in a depraved condition truly. Not "half murders" enough? Why my blood curdles in my veins at the bare mention of it! I have long since thought that the Religious Press was ministering too much to a depraved appetite by publishing to the world all the horrible murders that have disgraced the fair fame of our country, and I do seriously think that it were better for the cause of morals and of humanity were all the Religious papers in the country to adopt a rule to publish nothing of the kind. I am acquainted with some political papers which have adopted this rule, and it enhances the value of such papers in the estimation of a discerning public. But to hear a professed Christian calling for the publication of more "murders" than weekly disgrace the columns of most of our Religious journals, was more than my better feelings could abide, and I looked upon the man with dismay. This man, therefore, cannot support your paper.

2. You do not publish politics enough—"why, you don't never as much as publish a single political article during the whole year. I have seen my neighbor's paper, and know this to be true!" Very well, thought I, this is complimentary indeed, for it never was the design to publish "politics" in the Register. But hold:—

3. "I won't take your paper, for it is filled with "politics" every week, more or less." Put "that and that" together, and what does it amount to? A perfect contradiction truly. Neither of this class will patronize the Register. Very well, I concluded that it took all kinds of people to fill the world, and this should not dishearten me.

4. "I don't think it is right to read newspapers, for we shall neglect reading the Bible!" Ah! is this the case? I informed the friend, that whenever he would show me one of this class, as a general thing, I would show him one who neglected his Bible far too much.

Thus, you see, Mr. Editor, what an Agent for a Religious paper has to contend with. This is but a beginning. But, I am ashamed to mention others, such as newspaper borrowers, &c. &c., for the cause' sake.

News of the Day.

Correspondence of the Express.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 14th, 1812.

An important decision has just been made by the Treasury Department in relation to the duties on goods composed of silk and cotton; large quantities of which are understood to be piled up in the public stores in New-York. The rate is fixed at 30 per cent., instead of being levied by weight, as would be the case if the goods composed of this mixed material were to pay the silk duty. The appraisers in New-York were in favor of this rate, but the Collector put a different construction on the act, on the ground that the goods were subject to duty as if composed entirely of silk. Owing to the manner in which the law was framed, either construction would be right, and between the two the Government have chose the one which will produce the most revenue. The circular will be issued as speedily as possible. In the meantime letters will no doubt be written to the Collectors of the principal ports to this effect, to enable the importers to enter the goods at once, and to relieve their minds, which are now held in suspense as to whether they shall pay 30 or 300 per cent. duty.

Among the persons lost on the Merchant, were two of the Santa Fe pilgrims. There were sixteen of them in the boat, who came from Mexico by the Cutter Woodbury, and were just returning to the homes from which they have been so long severed.—After enduring unparalleled privations during their solitary march through the trackless wilderness—after being scourged from one extremity of Mexico to the other, by a gang of barbarians—after submitting to the vilest degradations in the cities of Mexico—they finally succeeded in reaching this city, in a state of the most perfect destitution.

Through the kindness of the commander of the Texian navy, they were furnished with some articles of clothing, and a free passage was given them to Galveston, on the Merchant. They embarked, their hearts bounding with the hope of once more meeting their friends and families, and were shipwrecked. Verily there seems to be no end to their sufferings. Several of them have now returned to this city, and their deplorable situation demands the attention of the charitable and benevolent.—N. O. Tropic.

A Tale of Blood.—The Crescent City, a paper published at New Orleans, states that on the afternoon of the 29th ult., the trading boat of one Bastian Belanger, an Italian, and an assistant known only by the name of Jean, a Genoese, drew up to the left shore of the Mississippi, in the parish of Iberville, opposite to the house of J. H. Richards and Brother. Some of Richards' family were on board the pirouge as late as sun-down. Every thing on board appeared as usual. Bastian informed them that he would not leave till ten the next morning.

On getting up the next morning, the family found the boat gone; but soon afterwards discovered it on the other side of the river, a little further down the stream. On going to the place where it had been tied on the preceding evening, they found the print of a man's fingers in blood, and other marks of violence having been committed. They then crossed the river to the place where the boat lay, and found her sunk, with the deck a little above water. Marks of blood were discovered, particularly near the cabin door, together with brains, hair, and piece of a skull bone. On the pirogue being raised, two or three small augur holes were found in the stern; but all of Bastian's goods were found undisturbed.

The suspicion of the neighborhood at first was that the assistant Jean, had murdered Bastian for the sake of his money, a considerable sum of which he is believed to have had with him. But on the 3d inst. the bodies of both Jean and his master were discovered floating in the river. The back part of their skulls were beaten off.

The probability is that they were murdered by some of the pirates of the Mississippi, a class of freebooters which may before long, make it necessary to employ an armed police on that river.

Singular and Exciting Occurrence.—On Sunday night last, about 12 o'clock, one of the City Guard, who was stationed in the vicinity of the Medical College in Queen street, came to the Guard House in great haste, and much excited, stating to the Sergeant that while passing the College building, he had heard a groaning in the yard near the railing, and on examining as to whence it proceeded, had discovered a coffin and heard a noise which appeared to proceed from some one enclosed therein.—He stated that there was a scratching against the sides of the coffin, and a groaning, as if a human being struggling for relief and catching for breath. The Sergeant immediately called assistance and promptly repaired to the spot to ascertain the cause of the alarm, and if found necessary to extend relief. On reaching the place, and opening a lantern with which the parties had provided themselves, a long box was discovered, from one end of which something was observed to protrude, which in the imagination of those present appeared to be the foot of a negro, and the struggling and hard breathing still continued. The box was of course at once forced and to the astonishment, as well as amusement of those engaged in the humane act, a live alligator of some nine feet in length, and an appropriate breadth joyously crawled out of his imprisonment, and his liberators made a hasty escape from the scene of action, not liking the companionship of the formidable reptile who had availed himself of their benevolent exertions to obtain his liberty.—We learn that the alligator had been safely and carefully boxed up the day before, by the Janitor of the College, for the purpose of being transported to Philadelphia, but to his perfect astonishment in the morning found his alligatorship basking in the sun, apparently highly delighted at being thus liberated from solitary confinement.—Charleston Cour.

Pickled Eggs.—An industrious farmer's wife, residing at Shipton, near Andover, among a variety of other pickles which she annually introduces into her store-room, preserves pickled eggs. The process she uses in curing them is very simple. When she has a large stock of eggs on hand, she boils some six or seven dozen till they become hard. She then divests them of the shell, and puts them into large jars, pouring upon them scalding vinegar saturated with ginger, garlic, whole pepper and allspice. This pickle is an admirable aid to cold meat, and is, in the winter months, regarded as a perfect farm-house luxury.—Hampshire Corres.

Wheat to Canada.—The House of Assembly of Canada, on the 4th inst., passed a bill imposing a duty of three shillings per quarter of eight bushels on United States wheat imported into that province. The vote stood 31 to 19. The other house will no doubt, pass the bill.—Jour. Com.

A fat windfall.—We understand on good authority, that FRANCIS UPTON FENNO, Esq. of Upton Cottage, Otsego county, a young Lawyer, through the death of a relative in England, has become the heir of a fortune of $400,000 and 60,000 acres of land lying in the state of Alabama.—Chenango Telegraph.

Foreign Provisions.—Somewhat of a 'sensation' was produced in the neighborhood of Chard, by the introduction of American pork and beef, retailed at from 3 1-2 to 4 1-2d per lb. The anxiety manifested by the people to obtain cheap food was not slow in manifesting itself, and the first consignment of pork was cleared in a few hours, more being expected. The importation of meat excites a good deal of alarm among the graziers, who anticipate in consequence, a serious depreciation in prices; for, if provisions are rendered at such low rates now in anticipation of the reduction of import duty, which comes into operation on the 10th inst., they will be considerably lower after that time. The quality of the American barreled provisions is pronounced to be excellent.

Fatal Accident.—On Wednesday morning last, as Mr Jabez Felt was digging gravel from the bank near Smithville, Jefferson county, it suddenly caved in and buried him beneath. Two other men were present at the time, and the alarm was immediately given. He was dug out in about three quarters of an hour, but life was extinct. Mr. Felt was a very respectable farmer, about 35 years of age, and has left a wife and three young children.

Stage Wreck!—No lives lost.—Captain Bayard also reports, that on his way from Elizabeth City to Norfolk, in the stage on Monday, when 9 miles distant from Deep Creek, the horses took fright and plunged into the canal. The horses soon extricated themselves; while the passengers four in number had a narrow escape from being drowned, and were considerably bruised. The baggage and mail were all saved, though dripping wet. No insurance in this case!—Norfolk Herald.

New Method of Computing Interest.—The most expeditious mode of computing interest, which we have ever seen, is explained in the United States Almanac for 1843. It is only necessary, by this process, to multiply the decimal of the year by the principal, and the product by the rate per cent. The decimal for each day in the year is given, so that the work is a complete interest table—the result is as easily acquired as by Rowlett or Preston. The explanation is found in the above named work, page 299, viz:

To apply these columns (referring to the columns of the day of the month, day of the year, and decimal of the year, which are prefixed to the tide table) to the computation of interest, suppose a note of hand for $1012 to become due at the end of ninety-five days, is given February 17, 1833, and that the rate of interest is 5 per cent, required the time it becomes due and the amount of interest to be paid. Against the date, February 17, we have 47 for the complete day of the year: adding 95 to this we have 142, and looking over the next pages, we find this number against May 23d, which is therefore the day on which the note becomes due. Also against February 17 is the decimal 129, against May 23d the decimal, 389

The difference is, 260

the fraction of a year for which the interest is to be computed. Multiplying the principal by this fraction, and the product by the rate per cent. will give the interest thus:

Principal,	$1012
Fraction of a year,	260
	60720
	2024
First product,	263.120
Rate per cent,	6
Interest required,	15.78620

It strikes us that this is the most complete mode of computing interest that has ever been published. Mr. Downes, we believe, is the first person that applied the decimal of the year to this purpose.—Phil. Cour.

A Daring Villain.—On Sunday night a bold villain entered the dwelling of Mr. Thomas Rutter, situated in Hanover, near Lee street, and made his way into a room in which a son of Mr. Rutter slept. In this room was kept an unloaded musket.—The rascal loaded the piece, and so placed it, primed and cocked on the mantel piece, that by the slightest touch, the charge could be lodged in the head of the sleeper, if he should wake. Thus prepared, the robber proceeded to his work of pilfering, and collected a considerable amount of clothing. In the meantime the son awakes and inquires, 'Is that you, father?' to which question the robber said 'Yes.' 'Are you sick?' 'Yes.' 'Shall I go for a doctor?' 'No, I am going out, and I think I will be better in a few minutes.' The villain left the room then with his booty, and the son was again soon in the land of dreams. In the morning his father waked him, and found the gun in the position described, and the room wanting in many valuable articles. The conversation which had passed was brought to recollection, and all were overjoyed in the singular preservation from the intended murder of the burglar, if the contingency should have called for such an act.—Baltimore Sun.

The United States and Morocco.—The Paris correspondent of the Courier des Estatas Unis, writing under date of October 1, states that Com. Morgan who had visited Tangier with two vessels of war, had returned hastily to Cadiz, in the frigate Congress leaving the Fairfield at Tangier to follow shortly for Cadiz.

The Pacha had refused the reparation which the commodore had demanded for the maintenance of the pacific relations between the court of Morocco, and the United States, whereupon he had written to the Emperor, and the answer to the letter was expected by the Fairfield.

Naval.—It is stated that Capt. John Gallagher, who was lately in command of the U. S. Ship Independence, and who was to have been tried by the Naval [illegible] tial, now sitting in New-[illegible] grave charges, has sent in [illegible] to the Hon. Judge [illegible] question with the Hon. [illegible] Navy, whether he will [illegible] resignation of an offi[illegible] with high crimes and [illegible] again say, if there [illegible] in our Navy, let them [illegible] the public service.—[illegible]

Shipwreck.—The [illegible] from Providence, R. I. [illegible] N. C., in ballast, went [illegible] Hatteras, during a blow, [illegible] weather, on the night of the [illegible] saved, vessel a total loss, [illegible] partly insured in Boston. [illegible] arrived in the stage from Eliza[illegible] Monday evening, reports a new [illegible] brig, hailing from Bangor, Me., laden with sugar and molasses, went ashore on the 6th instant, to the Southward of Cape Hatteras.

Another Accident in the Mines.—John Cook and William Crease, two miners working in Patton's mines, near Llewellyn, were caught by a heavy fall of coal and slate, crushing and killing the former instantly, and falling upon the latter in such a manner as to prevent his moving or escaping. They remained in this situation from early on Saturday afternoon until 9 o'clock at night, when their non-appearance created an alarm, and knowing they were working alone in these mines, they were sought for and found in the situation we describe; the deceased has left behind him a wife.—Pottsvile Miners' Jour.

Kidnapping.—A man named Lewis J. Austin, has been arrested in Baltimore, upon a charge of having taken from Philadelphia and offering for sale, as a slave for life, a negro boy named Daniel Jones, entitled to his freedom. Upon an investigation of the evidence in the case, he was committed for further examination on Wednesday next.—Phil. Inq.

Consecration.—The Richmond Compiler of Friday says—"The solemn ceremony of the consecration of Rev. Dr. Johns, assistant Bishop of Virginia, took place on Thursday at the Monumental church, in presence of a crowded auditory, and a number of Bishops and ministers of the Episcopal church. The sermon was preached by bishop Ives, of Tennessee, and was highly appropriate to the occasion. The ceremony of consecration was performed by the venerable Bishop Griswold, of Massachusetts: and its solemnity was much enhanced by his patriarchal appearance."

The "Marriage Question" in England.—A London paper states that a young man and woman, inhabitants of Brighton, accompanied by a marriage procession of their friends and relatives, recently appeared at the altar of one of the churches of the metropolis, for the purpose of tying the hymeneal knot. "The ceremony had proceeded to the place where the clergyman had to pronounce the declaratory words that the man and woman had become husband and wife, when the minister had a notification made to him, which induced him to ask who was the bridegroom's former wife? The reply was, the present bride's sister; when the clergyman announced that such marriage ceremony was illegal, and refused to proceed with the ceremonial. All the parties were aware of the relationship, but probably were not aware of the recent alteration in the law, making marriage with a deceased wife's sister illegal."

On the 15th inst. the cars on the Troy and Saratoga Railroad were thrown off the track by a 'snake's head,' and three baggage cars were smashed to atoms. A number of passengers were somewhat bruised, and one, a Mr. E. Martin, of Canada, had his leg broke. The road was sold at auction last Monday for $[illegible].

M. Gaubert, of Paris, has invented a machine for the composition and distribution of printing types, 'the results of which are so marvellous,' said M. Arago, 'that there is some reason to fear that the use of this machine would throw a vast number of hands out of bread.'

A house situated in a by-road in the southerly part of Montague, Mass., occupied by three families, the major part of whom, male and female, love a drop of the dear creature, on Saturday, the 8th ult., procured three gallons of rum, and on Sunday following held a drunken jubilee. In the course of their debauch, they offended one of their party, Mrs Potter, the wife of Ansel Potter, who left the house, and with a rope hung herself in the barn.

It is now said, in a St. Louis paper, that Joe Smith is actually in custody at Carthage, and that he is to be brought before Judge Douglas, who is now holding a court there, on a writ of habeas corpus, for the purpose of trying the validity of the Governor's writ of arrest.

Mr. Curtis, collector of New-York, has seized, on suspicion of their being smuggled, about $15,000 worth of watches, belonging to an importer named Duncan.

Seven steel engravings, smuggled from London for a popular literary publication in Boston, worth $200 each, were seized by an officer of the customs in that city, on the 20th ult.

The daily communication between Providence and Newport, has been re-opened. The steamer Iolas has been placed on the route as a permanent boat.

On the 20th ult., a small house in the vicinity of Delhi, N. Y., occupied by two poor families, was burnt, together with a girl about two years old, and all the furniture, beds, &c. It is said the parents of the child were intoxicated, and in a scuffle [illegible] them, fire from a pipe in the mouth [illegible] m was dropped in a bed, which [illegible] fire.

[illegible] ult., at New-Haven, Chief [illegible] pronounced sentence of [illegible] Freeman, (mulatto,) con[illegible] the Superior Court of Con[illegible] stroying her child by throw[illegible] She is to be hung on [illegible] of June next.

[illegible] German farmer from Ulster county, was robbed of $1,300 recently on the Lockport road leading to Batavia, by two foot pads. The old man came as far as Lockport by canal, where he left the boat and was pursuing his way to the vicinity of Batavia, when he was met by the two men and robbed as above stated.

A veteran Tar.—Died, lately in Providence, R. I., Capt. Joseph Northup, aged 69 years. The deceased followed the seas for 53 years, and the last forty has commanded a vessel out of Newport and Providence.

Maj. Gen. Scott returned to Washington on the 17th ult. from a tour of inspection of the Military posts on the Northern and Western frontiers—from Lake Ontario via Mackinaw, to the Mississippi—embracing a journey of near 4000 miles, which he performed in 39 days.

Great Britain buys annually of the United States $60,000,000 worth of produce, two-thirds of which is cotton. Massachusetts buys of the products of other States $42,000,000 annually.

We learn from the Presbyterian Almanac for 1843, that there are attached to the Old School Presbyterians, 1399 Ministers, 140,463 communicants (exclusive of 4 Presbyteries not reported,) and 2025 churches.

Capt. Chauncey, of the U. S. Navy, has just completed the inspection and trial of one hundred Paixhan guns, in Pittsburg, Pa. made in that city by Messrs. Freeman and Miller, under contract with the Government. Every gun passed inspection, and not one proved the least defective, under a severe trial. They are all 32-pounders, and weigh two tons each.

There are in the United States, according to the census, one hundred and thirty-eight daily papers, eleven hundred and forty-one weekly papers, and one hundred and twenty-five semi-weekly. The number of periodicals is two hundred and twenty-seven.

Texas and Mexico.—We copy the annexed article from the New Orleans Advertiser, a paper which we presume to be well informed touching the movements and views of our Executive Government.—Nat. Intelligencer.

By the Natchitoches Herald we learn that the mediation of the United States has been offered by this Government, in the hope of bringing about a reconciliation between Texas and Mexico. It appears that Mr. Webster, by instruction of the President, has addressed a letter to the American Minister at Austin, enclosing a copy of instructions which had already been forwarded to Mr. Thompson at Mexico, directing him to express, in the name of the American Government, "the hope that it may be deemed to comport with the interest of the Texan Government to suspend any offensive military operation which may be in contemplation against the Mexican Republic until it should learn the result of the negotiation which Mr. Thompson had been directed to undertake."

This, though not officially communicated, yet comes in such a shape as entitles it to credit. Mr Webster is represented to say to the Mexican authorities, that while his government sees with pain the prospect of active warlike preparations between Texas and Mexico, and disclaims all right to interfere, yet it cannot under the circumstances, be indifferent to a renewal of hostilities between them. The general and natural advantages of peace, the security of our commerce, the uncertainty of the issue of war, the dissimilarity of the people, and the extent of territory of the two countries, are all urged as reasons to accept the proffered mediation. To these is added the intimation that, in case of war, American citizens will emigrate hence and aid the Texans, and that it is the President's conviction that war is not only useless but hopeless.

Admitted to Bail.—Judge Marshall, of Louisville, has admitted to bail Godfrey Pope, who is charged with murdering Mr. Bliss. The decision of the court was, in substance, that under the sixteenth section of the tenth article of the constitution of Kentucky, the accused should be admitted to bail. That part of the section referred to says: "That all prisoners shall be bailable by sufficient securities, unless for capital offences, when the proof is evident or presumption great." The doubt expressed in the decision was confined to the proof of presumption as to the capital offence.—The security demanded was of the accused himself $20,000, and by one or more sufficient sureties, $20,000—which was given.

Dreadful Steamboat Accident.—The Louisville Journal of the 18th ult. says—"The steamboat Carrier reports having passed the steamboat Eliza, on Thursday evening, at 2 o'clock, in the Mississippi, two miles above the mouth of the Ohio, sunk to the hurricane deck. Forty passengers are supposed to have been drowned, and among them the captain's wife and child. The Carrier rounded to, but could not render any assistance. The Eliza was bound for New Orleans."

City Expenses.—The report of the City Comptroller for the past year, to the 2d ult. states the whole amount of City account expenditures to have been $1,134,055 33. The Trust account expenditures were $3,187,648 25. Total $4,321,704 58. The receipts have been $4,589,202 28.

The total amount of the City Debt is stated at $13,049,766 04; of which there was incurred for the introduction of the Croton River water, $11,575,990 71, and, on account of assessments to be collected, $1,111,977.

The Comptroller suggests the following further appropriations for 1842—Board of Health $1000, markets $1000, police $4,500, water loan interest, $40,000, assessment interest, $10,000.—Eve. Post.

A great robbery was committed a couple of weeks since at Little Rock, Arkansas. The office of Mr. Fitzgerald, a justice of the peace, was robbed of $14,000 in bank notes, which had been placed with him to bring suits upon. Samuel G. Trowbridge, formerly of Maine, William M. Willson, Robert Coldwell, Amour Hunt, and William Caldwell and his wife, have been arrested as the robbers. $1,409 of the money was found with Caldwell's wife.

Ex-President Jackson.—We understand that Gen. Jackson received a painful injury in the forehead, on Thursday last, by the upsetting of Major Donelson's carriage, near the Hermitage, in which he was riding out to visit a sick neighbor. The accident was caused by the restiveness of the horses, which the driver was unable to control.—We hope the injury will not prove a serious one.—Nashville Whig.

Altered Notes.—Altered notes on the Bank of Baltimore, changed from two dollars to ten, are in circulation in this city. The altered notes differ from the genuine notes in not having on them the coat of arms of this state. They are also signed by C. C. Jamison, Cashier, and J. H. McCulloh, President; whereas the genuine ten dollar notes are not signed by these gentlemen.—Balt. Amer.

The Fall Business.—The business in the city this fall is small, compared with most seasons. It is, however, of very good character. In some instances, the sales of the merchant are much less, but his actual profits are greater. The decline of the price, especially of dry goods, has been considerable; and at the present low price of cotton, wool, and labor, they can be manufactured 25 per cent. cheaper than a year since.—There have been recently some reports of failures among the jobbers, but they are without foundation.—Eve. Post.

Moose Hunting.—Capt. Chearnley, of Halifax, has just returned from a moose hunting excursion on Gold river. The Halifax Herald says, the captain has had the satisfaction of 'bagging' sixteen of those beautiful animals in one month.

Fall of a Tourist from a Precipice in Switzerland.—A dreadful accident lately occurred to M. Brossard, Professor of Philosophy at the College of Bourg, and his lady, and Madame de La Flechere, a friend, whilst making an excursion in Switzerland in an open carriage. In going down a steep declivity, the reins gave way, and the horses dashed over a precipice, 300 feet deep, dragging the carriage after them. Madame Brossard was killed on the spot. M. Brossard was seriously hurt, but is expected to recover. Madame de la Flechere, who was thrown out as the carriage was falling down, caught by some shrubs growing out of the side of the precipice, and was scarcely injured.

A Sagacious Animal.—At the fair of Ballintubber, a horse, on which a celebrated sporting character was mounted, actually kicked two latiats out of a fellow's waistcoat pocket, disabling his arm so as to prevent him effecting service upon the owner: and in less than half an hour after, prostrated two process-servers, who had civic bills to serve upon the same gentleman.—(Roscommon Journal.) Let our American friends match this, if they can!

During the recent riots in England, the Lancashire mob sent word to Leeds that they meant to sleep on a certain night in the parish church in that place. It is said that Dr. Hook, the Vicar of Leeds, returned an answer to the effect that if they did come to the church he should be in the pulpit, and should preach to them all night.

Newly Discovered Island.—The Journal du Havre announces that the ship Pearl, on her way from Sidney to Manilla, discovered an island, in latitude 21 59, longitude 163 30 east, which is not laid down in any chart or map. It has a rich appearance, is clothed with wood, and near the shore has an abundance of cocoa-nut trees. The captain christened it Burrows' Island.—Boston Adv.

	Males.	Females.	Total.
Jan. 1 to March 31,	2,095	910	3,005
April 1 to June 30,	24,102	15,094	39,196
July 1 to Sept. 30	13,719	10,00	23,885
In nine months,	39,916	29,170	66,086

Of the above, 1,478 were merchants, 482 gentlemen, 8,649 workmen, 38 clergymen, 78 artists, 18.135 laborers, 27 lawyers, 29 musicians, 125 doctors, 53 professors, and 10,603 without occupations, even that of gentlemen. Of the male part of these emigrants, 30,898 came from Great Britain, 5,069 from Germany, 663 from France.

A Meteor.—A very brilliant meteor passed over the city of St. Louis on Sunday evening, the 25th ult. About five minutes after its explosion, which was observed, a sound was heard like two rapid heavy discharges of very heavy artillery.

Mob Law rebuked.—The citizens of Raleigh, N. C., have no disposition to submit quietly to the exercise of mob law. A meeting has been held in reference to the case of the colored man who was beaten by a mob, and after addresses from three or four of the principal citizens, strong resolutions were adopted, denouncing the persons who took part in this violation of the law, and requesting the corporate authorities to offer a reward for their detection and apprehension. We are glad to see the citizens of Raleigh taking such manly ground.

Results of Rum-selling.—The New York Organ says, that of twenty-nine persons who have sold rum in the town of Petersburgh, N. Y., within the last twenty years, four have died, all poor, and drunkards; twenty are living, all poor and drunkards; and five have discontinued the business, without loss or gain.

Spanish Vengeance.—A letter from Toledo, in the Ecodel Comercio of Madrid, states that three of the band of robbers called the "Twelve Apostles," having caught a National Guard who had given information against them, carried him off, aad having bound him hand and foot, and confined him in a shepherd's hut, set fire to it and burned him alive.

Colt's Sub-marine Battery.—The following explanation of the method by which Mr. Colt discharges his Sub-marine Battery is taken from the New-Haven Palladium. Probably we are indepted for the explanation to the chemical department of Yale College.

Two small copper wires extend from the battery, which consists of a metallic chest filled with gun-powder—to a powerful galvanic battery, which may be six or eight miles distant. These wires are wound round with cotton yarn, over which is a coat of shellac varnish. The ends which enter the battery are connected by a piece of platina wire, which passes amongst the gunpowder. When the explosion is required, the opposite ends of the two wires are suddenly brought in contact, the one with the positive, and the other with the negative pole of the galvanic battery; the effect is to heat the platina wire instantly, sufficiently to ignite the guupowder.

As we were entering our office on Thursday afternoon, we saw a respectable looking man tumble headlong upon the side walk. He was drunk. The same man was in the Police office on Friday morning, to secure the aid of the Police to find his pocket book, which he lost, while drunk, and which contained $20. He says he recollects handing it to a person, while he was intoxicated; but the person whom he says he handed it it to, denies that he ever saw it It is therefore doubtful whethhe he will ever get his money back. We understand that he is a farmer in Henrietta. He was evidently unused to the drunken mood; and perhaps the loss of his $250 will prove a blessing.

New Engine of War.—The Stockton gun, according to the Philadelphia papers, will prove a most formidable instrument of naval warfare. Experiments were made with it last week, which prove that it combines "the power of Fulton's torpedo and the certainty of execution of the Kentucky rifle." We have often heard it said, remarks the Philadelphia Evening Journal, that Capt. Stockton would make the vessel he is now building at the Navy Yard invincible, and we are now fully satisfied he will do so.

Shocking Barbarity.—The last Tennessee Review states that the grand jury of Campbell county, Tenn. had found a true bill against Geo. Smith, John H. Tobb, Loftin Duke, James Pearce and Leory Brown, for the murder of a slave belonging to John Miller. They had all got into a drunken spree, and under the influence of liquor, enticed the negro into a loft, and hung him for fun, intending to cut him down in a moment or two, before life should be extinct. Their drunken frolic was carried too far—the negro died.

Atrocious Villainy.—On Friday, Justice Matsell issued a warrant for the arrest of a female named Mary P. Smith, alias Davis, who had recently established a den of infamy in Cross st. and she was brought to the Police by officer Low. In her establishment were two sisters, who came to this city only six weeks since, from New London, Ct. in search of employment, in the care of a fiend in human shape named Comstock, who introduced them to this house as a respectable place where they would be employed, and left them. Here they have been kept close prisoners ever since, and obliged to submit to the lowest degradation, until Saturday, when one of them escaped and went to the Police office, and pemanded protection for herself and sister.—N. Y. Standard.

New Coinage.—There is a large establishment at Rutherfordton near the gold mines in North Carolina, under the management of Mr. Bechtler, which coins pieces about the value of eagles and half eagles, which, without imitating in the least in the national coinage, pass as freely in the Southern States as do the coins issued from the government mints. Their actual value is a few cents less than the amount named on their face—they bear no emblematical device, but simply the name and residence of the manufacturer, the weight and fitness, and an expression of the quality of the gold. Such coinage as this is not prohibited. Government assumes by law the exclusive privilege of coining copper, but gold and silver are left free to a any person who does not imitate the government stamp.—Trenton Gaz.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and traveling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, trouble and expense. The principal advantage to be derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inksand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c, with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents — Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

Christian Review.

A GOOD PROPOSITION.

THE importance of the Christian Review is admitted. It was commenced nearly seven years since in obedience to an urgent and almost spontaneous call from different parts of the land, and in compliance with that call, has been sustained through six successive volumes, only by special effort, and considerable sacrifice (previous to the present volume) on the part of a few individuals. The number of subscribers, however, has gradually increased, so as to inspire the hope that ultimately, the list would become such as to place it above "want," and on a basis that should insure its perpetuity; and with proper exertions on the part of its friends, it is believed such a result might easily be accomplished.

The work is put at the low price of three dollars per annum, in order to bring it within the means of as large a number as possible. Yet, many who are able, and who would be benefitted by its perusal, are not now subscribers, and need, it is thought, only to be reminded of the facts to become so.

The work occupies a high position among the religious quarterlies of the country, and in the estimation of intelligent men of all Christian denominations, is contributing a good share of the religious periodical literature of the age. To the Baptist denomination, in particular, it is an auxiliary in defence and illustration of the truth, with which it is believed, we cannot afford to dispense. And, since the committee and the publishers have resolved, never again to make an appeal for pecuniary aid, but to discontinue its publication whenever the subscriptions cease to be sufficient to sustain it, it becomes every well-wisher of the Review to exert himself now in its behalf.

☞The publishers having a number of the past volumes on hand, propose, in order to interest some who may be desirous of possessing it, yet feel unable to subscribe, to exert their influence to obtain new subscribers, and by so doing not only secure it for themselves, but, by increasing its circulation, extend its usefulness, and help also in insuring its perpetuity—to offer a PREMIUM for new subscribers, as follows.

☞Any person obtaining TWENTY NEW SUBSCRIBERS and remitting the publishers sixty dollars, shall be entitled to a complete set of the Review in seven volumes, the subscription price of which is, TWENTY ONE DOLLARS!

⁂ For FIFTEEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS the last five volumes will be given—subscription price FIFTEEN DOLLARS!

⁂ For TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, the last TWO VOLUMES, subscription price, SIX DOLLARS!

For FIVE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, either of the last three volumes, subscription price, THREE DOLLARS!

It is hoped that this very liberal premium, may induce many of the friends of the Review to make a renewed effort in its behalf, and thus not only reap benefit themselves, but aid the great object the Review is intended to sustain.

SUBSCRIBERS are reminded of the terms of subscription, "three dollars per annum IN ADVANCE." Have you paid your subscription? The money is much needed.

GOULD KENDALL & LINCOLN, Publishers,
59 Washington Street.

N. B. The publishers of any religious paper who shall give the above advertisement three insertions in their columns (and send a copy to the publishers) shall be entitled to a selection of either two of the last four volumes.

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers, and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business, in "Mechanic's Hall," in rooms adjoining the "Register Office," in all its various branches, where they will be happy to wait on customers on the shortest notice. Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done up in a style not surpassed by any of the "Craft" in this "village or county;" and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

HOLIDAY GIFT FOR THE YEAR 1843.
A BOOK FOR EVERY FAMILY IN THE UNITED STATES.

AGENTS WANTED.

ONE Hundred Dollars given for every one hundred copies sold!—Agents—responsible men—wanted in every town and village throughout the United States and British Provinces, to sell 'Sears' Bible Biography,' the most splendidly illustrated and Cheapest work ever issued on the American Continent, containing several hundred Engravings, entirely new and original, designed and executed by the most eminent artists of England and America. Cost of preparing the work, $5000. This beautiful and important work contains upwards of 500 pages royal octavo, is printed from new stereotype plates, handsomely bound in gilt, and lettered, and retails readily at the low price of $2 50 per volume. The following extract is from a lengthy Review, written by the Rev. W. C. Brownlee, D. D., and is only one out of several hundred recommendations, from the clergy and the press, that the work has already received.

New-York, August 6, 1842.

"This is, beyond question, one of the most elegant books ever presented to our fellow citizens in this Republic. It ought to be in every Christian family for its innate value; and in every patriotic family as a splendid specimen of our progress in domestic manufactures, and the advancement of our artists and manufacturers in their rivalship with those of Europe. W. C. BROWNLEE."

A very liberal offer!—One Hundred Dollars will be given by the Publisher to every Agent who will undertake and sell One Hundred Copies of the above Work. He believes that there is scarcely a town or village in the Union, but that numbers may easily be disposed of.

⁂ Persons enclosing money, will be careful to pay the whole postage; and in ordering books will state, explicitly, how the books shall be sent to them

Also, in press, another important, valuable, and cheap work, in the course of publication, and will be ready for delivery early in October, 1842, complete in one volume royal octavo, containing about 600 pages of letter-press, and more than five hundred Engravings, elegantly bound in gilt; price only $2 50 per copy.

POETRY.

From the Weekly Messenger.

The Finger of God.

Go listen to the whirlwind's roar,
  As over all 'tis fiercely sweeping,
Hurling each severed trunk before
  Its face as o'er the mount 'tis leaping;
And see the beast before it fall
  Or spring affrighted from its lair,
And as the storm its limbs appal,
  Thou seest, O man, God's finger there.

Go watch the sun's last glimmering ray,
  As in the west he's slowly sinking,
His brightness fading fast away
  As dews that from his face are shrinking,
See the light clouds which there unfold
  Their loveliness in evening air,
And, gazing on their forms of gold,
  Thou'lt see God's glorious finger there.

Go seek in summer wood a flower
  So graceful from its footstalk bending,
And there reflect that in an hour
  'Twill with the mother earth be blending;
Minutely trace its symmetry,
  Each stamen and each petal fair,
And thou art blind or thou wilt see,
  In each faint line, God's finger there.

Go look upon a penitent
  Who long has been from heaven straying,
And listen to his voice intent
  As on his bended knees he's praying;
That wretch who all his life has spent
  In wickedness without a prayer;
Yet now his heart is upward sent,
  For Gods own finger sure is there.

Go, lowly kneel before his shrine,
  The gushings of your full heart pouring,
And pray that bright your lamp may shine,
  Till, loos'd from earth, you're upward soaring!
Go, heavy laden, and find rest,
  A soothing draught for all your care,
And, peaceful as you feel your breast,
  Reflect, God's finger's there!

HUMAN SACRIFICES IN INDIA.

Blackwood's Magazine for August contains a notice of a paper recently published by the Royal Asiatic Society of London, written by Captain Macpherson of the Madras Army, and giving some account of the Khondas, one of the three races that inhabit the territory which formed the ancient kingdom of Orissa. They are Polytheists—have an hereditary priesthood—are rigid observers of veracity, and preserve in their religious worship and opinions many of the distinctive but not most beautiful features of the Grecian system in the Pelasgic period. They are almost the only people that offer human sacrifices; and of their festivals at these horid rites we find the following account from Capt. Macpherson's work:

"They are generally attended by a large concourse of people of both sexes, and continue for three days, which are passed in the indulgence of of every form of gross excess—in more than Saturnalian license.

"The first day and night are spent exclusively in drunken feasting and obscene riot. On the second morning, the victim who has fasted from the preceding evening, is carefully washed, dressed in a new garment, and led forth from the village in solemn procession, with music and dancing.

in which the mango, the bur, the dammar, and the pipala generally prevail, usually stands at a short distance from the hamlet, by a rivulet, which is called the Meria stream. It is kept sacred from the axe, and is avoided by the Khond as haunted ground. My followers were always warned to abstain from seeking shelter within its awful shade.

"In its centre, upon the second day, an upright stake is fixed, generally between two plants of the sankissar, or bazar danti shrub. The victim is seated at its foot, bound back to it by the pries. He is then annointed with oil, ghee and tumeric, and adorned with flowers; and a species of reverence which it is not easy to distinguish from adoration, is paid to him throughout the day. And there is now infinite contention to obtain the slighest relic of his person; a particle of the tumeric paste with which he is smeared, or a drop of spittle, being esteemed, especially by the women, of supreme virtue.

"In some districts, instead of being thus bound in a grove, the victim is exposed in or near the village, upon a couch, after being led in procession round the place of sacrifice. And in some parts of Goomsur where this practice prevails, small rude images of beasts and birds in clay are made in great numbers at this festival, and stuck on poles; a practice, of the origin or meaning of which I have been able to obtain no satisfactory explanation.

"Upon the third morning, the victim is refreshed with a little palm sago, while the licentious feast, which has scarcely been intermitted during the night, is loudly renewed. About noon these orgies terminate, and the assemblage issues forth, with stunning shouts and pealing music, to consummate the sacrifice.

"As the victim must not suffer bound, nor, on the other hand, exhibit any show of resistance, the bones of his arms, and if necessary, those of his legs, are now broken in several places.

"The acceptable place of sacrifice has been discovered during the previous night, by persons sent out for this purpose into the fields of the village, or to the private oblator. The ground is probed in the dark with long sticks, and the first deep chink that is pierced is considered the spot indicated by the earth-god. The rod is left standing in the earth, in the morning four large posts are set up around it.

"The priest, assisted by the abbaya and one or two of the elders of the village, now takes the branch of a green tree, which is cleft to a distance of several feet down the centre they insert the victim in the rift, fitting it in some districts to his chest, in others to his throat. Cords are then twisted round the open extremity of stake. which the priest, aided by his assistants, strives with his whole force to close. He then wounds the victim slightly with his axe, when the crowd throws itself upon the sacrifice, and exclaiming, 'we bought you with a price, and no sin rests on us!' strips the flesh from the bones. Each man bears his bloody shred to his fields, and thence return straight home. Next day all that remains of the victim is burned up with a whole sheep on a funeral pile, and the ashes are scattered over the fields, or laid as paste over the houses and granaries; and for three days after the sacrifice, the inhabitants of the village which afforded it remain dumb, communicating with each other only by signs, and remaining unvisted by strangers. At the end of this time, a buffalo is slaughtered at the place of sacrifice, when their tongues are loosened."

KNOWLEDGE FOR THE PEOPLE.

Why is Wootz or Indian steel the most valuable for making edge tools.

Because it is combined with a minute portion of the earths, alumina and silica; or rather perhaps, with the bases of these earths. Whether the earths are found in the ore, or are furnished by the crucible in making steel, is not certainly known; nor is the indian steel-maker probably aware of their presence. Wootz, in the state in which it is imported, is not fit to make into fine cutlery. It requires a second fusion, by which the whole mass is purified and equalized, and fitted for for forming the finest edge instruments.—Brande.

Why does a razor operate best when dipped in hot water?

Because the temperature of the blade has been raised, and the firmness of the edge proportionally increased.

In some experiments, the knife edges attached to the pendulum described by Captain Kater, on being carefully hardened and tempered in the bath at 432 deg. were on trial, found too soft. They were a second time hardened, and then hardened a second time, and then heated to 212 deg. at which point the edges were admirably tempered. This, it will be remembered, is the heat of boiling water, and further illustrates the preceding question.

In the manufacture of a razor, it proceeds through a dozen hands; but it is afterwards submitted to a process of grinding, by which the concavity perfected, and the fine edge produced. Scissors, in like manner, are made by hand, and every pair passes through sixteen or seventeen hands, including fifty or sixy operations, before they are ready for sale. Common scissors are cast, and when riveted, are sold in England as low as $1. per gross. Small pocket knives too are cast, both in blades and handles, and sold at $1,37 per gross, or a cent each. These low articles are exported in vast quantities in casks to all parts of the world.

ZINC.

Why is Zinc useful in the arts?

Roofs covered with zinc are very numerous in the Low Countries but have one bad quality. In cases of fire, the zinc being very combustible, soon becomes inflamed, and falling all around, occasions great danger to those who approach the building. In short, zinc is the most combustible metal we have. If beaten out into thin leaves, it will take fire from the flames of a common taper.

Why has the oxide of zinc been substituted for white lead in house painting?

Because it preserves a good color much longer: it is not, however, of so perfect a white as lead.

TIN.

Because it occasioned the coin to wear longer, and it imparted sufficient hardness to the copper to render it capable of forming very good cutting instruments. Mr. Parkes in analysing several Roman brass coins, from various periods of the Empire, found tin to be a component part in all of them.

Because it bears a prohibitory duty of 30*l.* per cent. It is raised in great quantities in South America, and is very pure, but not so neatly manufactured as the Cornish tin. According to Aristotle, the tin mines of Cornwall were known and worked in his time. Diodorus Siculus, who wrote 40 years before Christ, describes the method of working these mines and says, that their produce was conveyed to Gaul, and thence to different parts of Italy. The miners of Cornwall were so celebrated for their knowledge of working metals, that about the middle of the 17th century, the renowned Becher, a physician of Spire, and tutor of Stahl, came over to this country to visit them.

A celebrated tin mine was the famous wherry mine, near Penzance. The shaft through which the miners went down to work, was situated nearly 100 yards below water mark. "The opening of this mine" says Dr. Maton, "was an astonishingly adventurous undertaking. Imagine the descent into a mine through the sea, the miners working at the depth of 17 fathoms below the waves; the rod of a steam engine, extending from the shore to the shaft, a distance of nearly 120 fathoms, and a great number of men momentarily menaced with an inundation of the sea, which continually drains in no small quantity through the roof of the mine, and roars loud enough to be distinctly heard in it." The working of this mine was wholly given up in the year 1798.

Such is the mineral wealth of Cornwall, that it contains more men, who possess fortunes, sprung from the mines, of five and from that to twenty thousand pounds, than there are in any other county of England excepting the metropolis and its vicinity; and there are some instances of indiuals acquiring from fifty to two hundred thousand pounds, from the mines, and by a fortunate course of trade.

Why should tin be chosen for its lightness?

Because its purity is in exact ratio with its levity; while gold, on the contrary, unless alloyed with platium, is fine in proportion to its density.

Why is tin so important to the dyer?

Because it is employed to give brightness to cochineal, archil, and other articles used in forming reds and scarlet; and to precipitate the coloring matter of other dyes. For these purposes it is previously dissolved in a peculiar kind of aqua-fortis, called dyers' spirit.

Tin is consumed in large quantities by the dyers; it is also used for covering sheet iron to prevent its rusting, and in forming plumbers' solder, speculum metal, pewter, and some other alloys. Its oxides are used in polishing glass, in glazing some kinds of earthenware, &c.

Why is tin plate so called?

Because it is made by dipping clean iron plates into melted tin. When tin-plate is washed over with a weak acid, the crystalline texture of the tin becomes beautifully evident, forming an appearance which has been called moire metallique.

Why are pins whitened by boiling in grain-tin and supertartrate of potash?

Because tartaric acid first dissolves the tin, and then gradually deposits it on the surface of the pins, in consequence of its greater affinity for the zinc, of which the brass wire is composed.

LEAD.

Why is lead employed in refining the precious metals?

Because when mixed with them in a great heat, it rises to the surface combined with all heterogeneous matter. Lead is employed to cover buildings, to form water pipes, (though Vetruvius, the Roman architect, in the time of Augustus, condemned this practice,) and to make a great variety of vessels for economical purposes. Its oxides are used for dyeing and calico printing, in the manufacture of glass, earthenware, and porcelain; and lead is capable of forming various alloys. There is also a large consumption of lead in making shot.

Why is lead employed in making white metal buttons?

Because it has been discovered that a certain proportion of lead may be mixed with the metal formerly used, without injuring the appearance of the button; thus affording a very considerable additional profit to the manufacture.

Why is lead employed to correct hash wine?

Because it has the property of imparting a saccharine taste when dissolved in acids, as in that of the wine. The ancients knew that this metal rendered harsh wine milder, but it was not universally known to be poisonous. According to Pliny, the Greeks and Romans proved the quality of their wines by dipping a plate of lead in them. Lead will also take off the rancidity of oils.

Why were blocks of lead called pigs?

Because they might be distinguished from larger blocks, called sows, which latter term is still retained in the sow-metal. In 1773, a pig of lead was dug up near Tamworth, with an inscription of the date 76, A. D., or 1697 years old; thus proving lead to have been used by the Romans in England.

Why is lead cast in such regular sheets?

Because the melted metal is suffered to run out of a box through a long horrizontal slit upon a table prepared for the purpose, while the box is drawn by appropriate ropes and pulleys along the table, leaving the melted lead behind it in the desired form to congeal. The lead thus cast is then passed between two iron rollers placed at such a distance from each other, as will reduce it to the requisite thickness.

Why is common lead changed into red lead by melting in ovens with a free access of atmospheric air?

Because the lead absorbs so much oxygen as to become converted into an oxide. Thus, the melted lead is exposed until the surface is covered with a pellicle; this pellicle being removed, another is formed; and thus, by successively removing the pellicle as it forms, the greater part of the lead is soon changed into a yellowish-green powder. This powder is then ground in a mill, and when it has been washed and properly dried, is thrown back into the furnace; and this, by constant stirring for thirty or forty hours, so as to expose every part to the action of the air, becomes red lead, and is taken out for use. Twenty cwt. of lead generally give 22 cwt. of red lead; so that 2 cwt. of oxygen are absorbed from the atmosphere during the process.

The only important alloys of lead are those with tin. Common pewter consists of about 80 parts of tin and 20 of lead.—Equal parts of tin and lead constitutes plumbers' solder; and what is termed pot-metal, is an alloy of led and copper.

Plumbago, graphite, or black-lead, is generally regarded as a true carburet of iron; it is not uncommon, though rarely found sufficiently pure for pencils; the coarser kinds, and the dust, and melted sulphut, for common carpenters' pencils; it is sometimes used in manufacturing crucibles, and in compositions for covering cast-iron, and for diminishing friction machinery.

Why is common white-lead made by exposing sheet-lead to acetic acid?

Because the fumes of the acid oxidize the metal. Thus, a number of crucibles, holding from three to six quarts each, and nearly filled with vinegar, are placed in hot beds to tan; upon those crucibles thin sheets of lead, rolled up in coil, are placed one coil over each crucible. The heat of the bed occasions the vinegar to rise in vapors, and this attaches itself to the lead, and oxidizes its surface to considerable depth. The oxide which has ben thus formed, is scraped off, and the coils of lead replaced; in this manner the operation is repeated, until the whole of the metal is oxidized. This oxide, which contains a portion of carbonic acid, is afterwards washed, and ground for sale.

Because the oxygen of the metal combines with the oil, imparting to it the property of drying quickly.

A PASSAGE IN HUMAN LIFE.

BY WILLIAM HOWITT.

In my daily walks into the country, I was accustomed to pass a certain cottage. It is no cottage orne;—it was no cottage of romance. It had nothing particularly picturesque about it. It had its little garden, and its vine spreading over its front; but beyond these, it possessed no feature likely to fix in the mind of a poet, or a novel writer, and which might induce him to people it with beings of his own fancy. In fact, it appeared to be inhabited by persons as little extraordinary as itself. A good man of the house it might possess, but he was never visible. The only inmates I ever saw, were a young woman, and another female in the wane of life, no doubt the mother.

The damsel was a comely, fresh, mild-looking cottage enough; alwas seated in one spot, near the window, intent on her needle. The old dame was as regularly busied, to and fro, in household affairs.—She appeared one of those good housewives, who never dream of rest, except in sleep. The cottoage stood so near the road, that the fire at the further end of the room showed you, without being rudely inquisitive, the whole interior, in the single moment of passing. A clean hearth, and a cheerful fire, shining upon homely, but neat and orderly furniture, spoke of comfort; but whether the dame enjoyed, or merely diffused that comfort, was a problem.

I passed the house many successive days. It was always alike—the fire shining brightly and peacefully—the girl seated at her post by the window—the housewife going to and fro, catering and contriving, dusting and managing. One morning as I went by, there was a change; the dame was seated near her daughter, her arms laid upon the table, and her head reclined upon her arms. I was sure that it was sickness which had compelled her to that attitude of repose; nothing less could have done it. I felt that I knew exactly the poor woman's feelings. She had felt a weariness stealing upon her—she had wondered at it and struggled against it, and borne up, hoping it would pass by; till, loth as she was to yield, it had forced submission.

The next day, when I passed, the room appeared as usual; the fire burning pleasantly—the girl at her needle, but her mother was not to be seen, and glancing my eye upwards, I percived the blind close-drawn in the window above. It is so, I said to myself; disease is in its progress. Perhaps it occcasions no gloomy fear of consequences, no extreme concern; and yet who knows how it may end? It is thus that begin those changes that draw out the central bolt which holds together families; which steal away our fire-side faces and lay waste our affections.

I passed by, day after day. The scene was the same. The fire burning; the hearth beaming clean and cheerful; but the mother was not to be seen—the blind was still drawn above. At length I missed the girl; and in her place appeared another woman, bearing considerable resemblance to the mother, but of a quiet habit. It was easy to interpret this change. Disease had assumed an alarming aspect—the daughter was occupied in intense watching, and caring for the suffering mother; and the good-woman's sister had been summoned to her bedside, perhaps from a distant spot, and perhaps from her family cares, which no less important event could have induced her to elude.

Thus appearances continued some days. There was a silence araund the house, and an air of neglect within it;—till, one morning, I beheld the blind drawn in the room below, and the window thrown open above. The scene was over—the mother was removed from her family; and one of those great changes effected in human life, which commence with so little observation, but leave behind them such lasting effects.—The Rose for 1842.

'My dear friend, that man has been talking about you again! He has been telling the most awful lies you ever heard—why he railed away at you for a whole hour!'

'And you heard it all, did you?'

'Yes.'

'Well, after this, just bear it in mind, that it takes two to make a slander—one to tell it and one to listen to it.

To endeavor the conversion of a heretic by force, is as absurd as to attempt storming a castle by logic.

Virtue knows no distinction of sex.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To Families and Invalids.

THE following indispensable family remedies may be found at the village drug stores, and soon at every country store in the state. Remember and never get them unless they have the fac simile signature of Comstock & Co. on the wrappers, as all others by the same names are base impositions and counterfeits. If the merchant nearest you has them not, urge him to procure them at 71 Maiden-lane, the next time he visits New York, or to write for them. No family should be a week without these remedies.

BALDNESS.

Balm of Columbia, for the hair, which will stop it from falling out, or restore it on bald places; and on children make it grow rapidly, or on those who have lost their hair from any cause. All vermin that infest the heads of children in schools, are prevented or killed at once. Find the name of Comstock & Co. on it, or never try it. Remember this always.

RHEUMATISM AND LAMENESS

Positively cured, and all shrivelled muscles and limbs are restored, in the old or young, by the Indian Vegetable Elixir and Nerve and Bone Liniment, but never without the name of comstock & Co. on it.

PILES &c.

Are wholly prevented, or governed if the attack has come on, if you use the only true Hay's Liniment, from Comstock & Co. All sores and every thing relieved by it that admits of an outward application. It acts like a charm. Use it.

HORSES that have Ring-Bone, Spavin, Wind-Galls, &c., are cured by Roofs' Specific; and Foundered horses entirely cured by Roofs' Founder Ointment. Mark this, all horsemen.

DALLEY'S
MAGICAL PAIN EXTRACTOR SALVE—

The most extraordinary remedy ever invented for all new or old Burns and Scalds and sore Eyes. It has delighted thousands. It will take out all pain in ten minutes, and no failure. It will cure the Piles.

LIN'S SPREAD PLASTERS.

A better and more nice and useful article never was made. All should wear them regularly.

LIN'S TEMPERANCE BITTERS

On the principle of substituting the tonic in place of the stimulant principle, which has reformed so many drunkards. To be used with Lin's BLOOD Pills, superior to all others for cleansing the system and the humors affecting the blood, and for all irregularities of the bowels, and the general health. Bother O. C. Lin.

HEADACHE.

DR. SPOHN'S ELIXIR OF HEALTH,

For the certain prevention of Fevers or any general sickness; keeping the stomach in the most perfect order, the bowels regular, and a determination to the surface. Colds, Coughs, pains in the bones, hoarseness, and dropsy are quickly cured by it. Know this by trying.

SARSAPARILLA.

Comstock's Compound Extract. There is no other preparation of Sarsaparilla that can exceed or equal this. If you are sure to get Comstock's, you will find it superior to all others. It does not require puffing.

LIN'S
CELESTIAL BALM OF CHINA.

Fellow-Citizens,—Perhaps you think that this Balm is intended to cure too many diseases, but we assure you that all diseases of this character, and many others that might be mentioned, are speedily cured, or in truth persons greatly relieved, by the use of this medicine. We earnestly request the afflicted to give it a fair trial.

Entered according to act of Congress, in the year 1842, by Comstock & Co., in the Clerk's office of the Southern District of New York

By applying to our agents in each town and village, papers may be had free, showing the most respectable names in the country for these facts, so that no one can fail to believe them.

Notes from a Traveler.

MR. EDITOR.—This day has been a proud and memorable one for me. My first step into the broad and foaming Atlantic created feelings within my proud heart which ordinary scenes would fail to inspire. To witness the foaming and breaking waves, as they rolled fearfully high, and dashed upon the sandy beach, was truly a picturesque scene to a "land-lubber" like myself. It called up before my mind the majesty and power of HIM who holds, as in the hollow of his hand, the Sea, and all that in it is. It appears to me that the veriest Atheist, who scoffs at the idea of a GOD, would be at once and forever silenced in his scepticisms could he but witness the majestic "deep,"—and in the language of the fair poetess, he would exclaim,—

> "The sea! the sea! the deep blue sea!
> Thou speak'st of God in majesty,
> And who shall thee contemn!"

The scene melted my proud heart, and I could but stand still and adore the Great Creator of the Universe, for this wonderful display of creating and sustaining power!

"Watch-Hill" is a high point of land extending out into the sea, and is noted for its Light-house, and as being a place of resort for all classes and grades of people. There is a large Hotel kept here by Mr. Nash, for the accommodation of visitors; and he informed me that, very often during the summer season, he prepared and furnished dinners for 200 people in one day. From this point the eye can roam at large over the vast expanse of water spread out before it. On the one hand, it takes a fair view of Block Island, which peers above the watery expanse, somewhat resembling a pyramid or cone in the dim distance. This Island is about nine miles long, and six broad, containing a population of about 2,000 if my memory does not betray me. Its soil is fertile, producing all the luxuries common to this climate in great abundance. It is remarkably healthy on the Island, so much so, that they will not allow a Physician to remain there for a length of time, for fear of his influence in bringing disease upon its inhabitants; and, I was informed by a gentleman, that some years since a Physician was located on the Island, and disease, such as fevers, increased to such an extent that the poor doctor was obliged to leave the Island, since which time no sickness has been known among them!—This was evidence to the mind of my friend that people depend too much upon the Physician for help, when they might as well, or perhaps better, preserve themselves from disease, and thus live to enjoy a long and happy life, and finally go down to the grave, like a shock of corn fully ripe in its season, with no fearful dreams to haunt the departing spirit of "Doctor's Bills" unpaid, with the thousand "et ceteras" attendant on such a course.

Long-Island, is also discoverable in the distance on the other hand, which is remarkable for the fertility of its soil. This Island has a numerous population, and furnishes the city of New-York with perhaps more of the luxuries of life than any other portion of the globe. Who has not heard of the luxuriant gardens of Long-Island, and of her thousand delicacies and rare productions, which throng the markets of our eastern cities?

Finally, Mr. Editor, "Watch-Hill" is truly classic ground. Here, Nature unfolds herself to the scan of mortals in her sublimest and loveliest aspect. Here, even, the mind of man is led instinctively from Nature up to Nature's God! Here, while the breaking waves are dashing rudely upon our frail barks, and immersing the gray rocks in livid spray, which have stood as faithful sentinels to the bounds of the "vasty deep," ever since the deluge, we can discover the hand of God in his mighty works. Let mortal man, the creature of a day, adore Him for His wonderful works.

X. Y. Z.

There is something very winning and endearing in confidence. Who could take away the life of a bird that fled to his bosom from the pounce of the hawk? Or who could take advantage of having him in his hand to deprive the little trembler even of his liberty! Nothing is ever lost by trusting in the ingenious and noble-minded: they always feel a responsibility to repay the confidence reposed in them. What, then, may we not expect from the God of all comfort? William Jay.

THE DIGNITY AND DEGRADATION CONNECTED WITH THE SUFFERINGS OF CHRIST.

A FRAGMENT.

Extremes often meet; but never has there been such a union of dignity and degradation, of glory and ignominy, as were seen in the agony and sufferings of our blessed Lord. When he instituted his sacred supper, though he was their master, he took the office of a menial and washed his disciples' feet; but he did this to set them an example of condescension and love. After celebrating the sacred rite, offering a prayer such as none but he had the right to present, he went out unto Gethsemane. Then what agony he felt! His 'soul was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death;' the deepest anguish overspread his spirit—the shafts of divine wrath pierced his heart—the cup of sorrow was drained unto the dregs. He might have been the vilest of men under the lacerating scourges of inward compunction and heavenly justice; or rather, the accumulated guilt of an apostate race might have concentrated on his soul both in its anguish and its punishment, his woes were so heavy, and his astonishment so extreme. This was indeed his condition; but 'he was holy, harmless, undefiled and separate from sinners;' the woes, and guilt, and sins of others were laid on him; and as none but he could bear them, and he was voluntarily submitting to them for the redemption of a lost world, this gave a dignity to his degradation, a glory to his shame. His cries were deep, earnest and repeated; his sweat was, 'as it were, great drops of blood;' but these, while they demonstrated the inconceivable intensity of his agony, displayed also the sublime majesty of his patience, and as his woes sprung from love to lost men, his cries and tears cloth his sufferings with divine grandeur, which is in beautiful keeping with the fact, that an angel, one of his own servants, came and ministered unto him. An armed band came on him as a felon, but they fell backward to the ground in his presence. One of his disciples, flushed with a singular kind of zeal, smote off an enemy's ear, but his Lord healed the hurt. Led at midnight as the most desperate of a felon band, he made no resistance but meekness; and placed before his enemies and accusers, 'he held his peace.' Though taunted, insulted, accused and scourged, his unoffending spirit neither murmured nor complained. He confessed—but it was that he was a king—the Messiah—the oracle of truth—the Son of God! He was led away to be crucified, but his chief judge declared him faultless. Followed by an infuriated multitude uttering yells of infernal cruelty and execrations, there were those who mourned and wept for him and received consolation from his lips. He was crucified, and derided by his murderers, but he prayed for them. One of the thieves crucified with him railed at him, but the other acknowledged his glory; and while he did not return railing for railing, he promised the penitent eternal life. His accusation was written, but it was a title of dignity, 'This is the King of the Jews.' He cried with a loud voice, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' and expired, but all creation sympathized with the scene. The earth trembled, the rocks rent, the sun hid his face, and darkness covered the whole land. The veil of the temple was rent and the way to the holiest was made manifest. Hell groaned to the centre of its darkest caverns and the king of darkness shuddered at his own deed, while the spectators on earth smote their breasts, and a heathen soldier said, 'Truly this was a righteous man, truly this was the son of God.' His body was not broken on the cross, because his anguish had hastened his death. He was laid with honor in a rich man's tomb. A guard of soldiers was set over his sepulchre to secure his corruption, but they were the witnesses of his awful glory. They saw the angels descend, the stone rolled away and the Savior rise. He died for sin, he rose to save, the triumphant conqueror of death and hell.—The shadows now are passed—the true glory of christ appears. He is seen by his disciples, they have every evidence of his identity, he shows that he ought to have suffered and to enter into his glory. He reveals to them his supreme majesty, sends them to the four winds to publish his mercy, and rises to heaven out of their sight! How low, how high! how degraded, how dignified! how shameful, how glorious the suffering Son of God! His purpose invests his shame with glory, his ignominy with honor, his voluntary poverty with incalculable wealth. But in all sufferings how does his real dignity shine forth—like the gleams of sunshine which fringe the skirts of a dense thunder-cloud, only to burst forth with renewed effulgence on a refreshed and ransomed world. I BELIEVE IT, BUT DON'T PREACH IT.

Certain remarks from "Irenæus," in the New-York Observer, have called out from another correspondent the following anecdote, of "old father Haynes," the colored minister of Vermont, who, he says, while he lived, was a perfect "thorn in the flesh" to all Universalists.—Ch. Reflector.

After Mr. Haynes was dismissed from his charge in Rutland, which he had held more than twenty years, he was employed about two years as a stated supply to the Congregational church in Manchester. In this town was a Universalist society, which was supplied with only occasional preaching; but, as in most other cases, its adherents were very fond of discussing their sentiments with other denominations. One of these took frequent occasion to dispute with Mr. Haynes: and though he generally, not to say always, came off second best, he seemed determined to renew the controversy on every convenient occasion.

At the close of one of these interviews, apparently under the full conviction of his own inferiority, he said said: "Mr. Haynes you are a learned man, and I cannot argue with you; but I expect one of our ministers here before long, and I intend to bring him to see you; he will be able to defend our doctrine." Mr. Haynes replied, in his usual good natured way: "O, well: bring him along; I shall be pleased to talk with him."

Some weeks afterwards the Universalist minister arrived; and the parishioner embraced the first leisure hour to take him up to the village to see Mr. Haynes. On their way, they were met by one of the brethren of their own faith who, after learning whither they were bound, advised them to turn back; 'for,' said he, 'he is an old fox, and you can't get to the windward of him.' They, however, persisted in their purpose, and soon arrived at the parsonage.

Mr. Haynes was called from his study, to receive the visitors, without knowing or receiving the least intimation who they were. As he entered the room, the parishioner, after exchanging compliments, said: 'Mr. Haynes, this is Mr. X——, my minister, whom I promised to bring to see you.' 'How d' do, how d' do?' said Mr. Haynes, taking the minister familiarly by the hand; 'well, you are the man, then, who preaches that men may swear, and lie, and get drunk, and commit adultery, and all other abominations, and yet go to heaven after all,—ain't you?' 'No, no,' said the Universalist minister, 'I don't preach any such thing.' 'Well,' said father Haynes, 'you believe so: don't you?'

This was a blow that completely annihilated all desire for theological discussion, and well nigh took away the power of utterance from both minister and layman.—After a few remarks on the state of the weather and the pleasant situation of the village, the minister said to his attendant: 'Is it not time for us to be going?' and both withdrew, apparently satisfied to dispense with all further intercourse.

The saints are all men of prayer. The prayer of all saints, (Rev. 8: 3.) not of some but of all. They are the generation of them that seek Him. The spirit of grace is always the spirit of supplication, and praying is as essential to the divine life, as breathing to the natural. Vain, therefore, is every pretension to religion, without a devotional temper. The wicked restrain prayer before God. The hypocrite will not always call upon Him. The formalist, who dares not wholly decline it, cries, what a weariness it is to serve Him! How is it with us? Do we live without God? Do we pray only when urged by fear of affliction? Do we feel the duty a drudgery rather than a privilege? All saints pray, in the temple, in the family, alone, habitually, as long as they live; and find it good to draw near to God. Wm. Jay.

THE SECOND ADVENT.

MR. EDITOR.—I have recently fallen in with a 'Biblical Chronology from Adam to Christ,' or 'the age of the world,' by William Miller, the originator of the modern advent theory. Mr. Miller offers this to the world as an evidence that Christ will make his second appearance in 1843; as the world will then (according to his reckoning,) be 6,000 years old. As Mr. Miller and his adherents are quite positive in regard to time, they can not expect that full credence will be given to their theory, if there be any room for doubt in their mode of reckoning, And that there is room for doubt in the following chronology, is very evident.

From Adam to the journey through the wilderness, the account is correct as furnished by the different portions of scripture referred to. But, then, it should be borne in mind that whole numbers are frequently given in the scriptures, where there may be odd weeks and months. In the 5th chap. of Genesis there are no odd weeks or months given, when there probably was in many of the cases referred to, weeks and even months of such time This is a perfectly natural inference. In regard to Joshua, the time of his reign is fixed at twenty-five years. Mr. Miller says he was eighty-five when he entered Canaan, and one hundred and ten when he died, leaving twenty-five years. But the scripture referred to authorizes no person to be thus definite and positive. It is true, we hear Joshua saying, (Josh. xiv. 10,) 'I am this day four score and five years old;' but the probability is, that this was said sometime after having entered the land. In regard to the time of the 'elders and anarchy,' the Bible is silent; hence Josephus is here depended upon.—But Josephus is not always a safe guide. As evidence of this, he tells us that Solomon reigned eighty years; (Book 8, chap. 7,) whereas the scripture informs us that he reigned only forty years. The reign of the Judges, from Cushan to Samuel, is correct as given in whole numbers, in the portions of scripture referred to. There was probably odd time which is not reckoned. And this is confirmed by the language in Acts xiii. 20: 'And after that he gave them Judges about the space of four hundred and fifty years.' The reign of Samuel is fixed at [illegible] years. But in 1 Sam. vii. 2—17, nothing like this is said. And Mr. Miller says—As it respects Samuel, I have no doubt of as long a period as twenty-one years. But in matters of this kind, something more than Mr. Miller's doubts or affirmations are needed. In the reign of the Kings, Mr. Miller says Jehoram reigned five years; but in 2 Kings viii. 17, we are told that he reigned eight years. The 'interregnum' between Amaziah and Azariah is fixed at eleven years. But the most that can be said is, that it was about that time. Mr. Miller tells us that Cambyses reigned seven years, and refers to Rollin, 1 vol. p. 354. On that same page, Rollin says he reigned seven years and three months. He also tells us that Darius Hystaspes reigned thirty-six years, and refers to Rollin, 2 vol. p. 9. But Rollin says he reigned thirty years. Mr. Miller says that Artaxerxes Longimanus reigned seven years, and quotes as proof, Ezra vii. 10—13. But nothing like this can be found. We are, however, told in the Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge that he reigned from the year of the world 3531 to 3579.

These are a few of the actual mistakes and doubtful points in Mr. Miller's chronology, and enough to show the folly of confiding in it as a true account. But, even if it were true, nothing more is proved than that the world will be 6,000 years old in 1843. Men may have conjectured that the end of the world will then come, or some other great revolution take place. But it is mere conjecture, after all. How much better for preachers of the gospel to pursue the 'good old way' of preaching faith and repentance, in view of considerations plainly furnished in the scriptures, than to spend all their time and energies in giving publicity to an uncertain theory. It is said we wish to arouse a sleeping world, and this is well adapted to effect the object? I reply, 'If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead.' ETIAM.

AGE OF THE WORLD.

Popular opinion has long been and is still very sanguine, that when our world shall be six thousand years old it will experience some great revolution. Mr. WM. MILLER thinks at that time Christ will make his second appearance, and perform all the mighty acts of the day of his coming; and offers the following Chronology as a strong evidence that it will take place in A. D. 1843. The biblical scholar will eagerly examine this Chronology, and point out its errors if any shall be detected: and all are most earnestly solicited to turn to the references and satisfy themselves whether we are verging so near this momentous crisis. On this subject Mr. Miller remarks: 'That if this Chronology is not correct, I despair of getting from the Bible and history a true account of the age of the world. As it respects the text in 1 Kings vi. 1, it can not be reconciled with the history of the Judges, and the statement of Paul, Acts xiii. 20. I have therefore followed two witnesses instead of one. As it respects Samuel, I have no doubt of as long a period as 21 years.'

"WE SAY IT RIGHT OFF, AND THEN SCHOOL IS DONE."

We have often taken occasion to animadvert upon the superficial preparation which many teachers make for their Sabbath duties. Some, it is to be feared, make no preparation at all, but take their places in the school with hearts and minds alike unfurnished for useful services. We need not say that a reference to the defects or neglects of teachers is never made without pain, or without a deep conviction that the exposure will contribute to a correction of the evil. Some teacher who reads this may be reminded of his own remissness, and may make a specific application of a general reproof.

A few weeks ago we spent a Sabbath in one of the interior cities of the country. We were informed that all the Sunday-schools were opened at 9 o'clock, and closed at 10 1-4. Supposing that strict punctuality would be observed, where the whole period of instruction was so limited, we repaired, in company with a friend, to one of the churches, near our hotel, at least fifteen minutes before the hour, that we might be witnesses of the assembling of the children, and the opening services of the school. To our surprise, we found ourselves first at the church, and immediately supposed we had been misinformed respecting the hour, or that this school was an exception to general custom. We improved the opportunity to examine the library, and about ten minutes past nine our solitude was interrupted by the appearance of a little boy. He was neatly dressed, had a hymn-book and Testament, and his face was lighted up with smiles, as he swung back and forth upon the gate in front of the church door. As the sun was intensely hot, we invited the child into the vestibule, and with him held a conversation in substance as follows:—

Q. Well, boy, what time does your Sunday-school begin?

A. Nine o'clock, I believe.

Q. What time is it now?

A. I don't know—I guess about that.

Q. Does the school open pretty punctually?

A. Pretty punctual.

Q. What do you study?

A. The Question Book.

Q. What Question Book do you use?

A. I don't know—here it is.

Q. Can you answer all the questions?

A. Yes sir. I guess so.

Q. Well, now, will you let us ask you a few, and then we can judge of your progress. We then asked one or two of the first questions, to which he could make no reply. By this time, two or three teachers and half a dozen children had passed into the church. We made some inquiries of the lad, in order to ascertain the degree of his intelligence; but he soon became rather impatient, and we desisted. The school was now about to begin, at 22 minutes past nine! We asked the boy how much time his teacher spent with him. 'Not long,' he laughingly replied! We say it right off, and then school is done.'

We tarried long enough after the opening of the school, to see that the boy's picture was not overdrawn; and, hanging our heads with grief and shame, we hastened to another school.—S. S. Jour.

IDLENESS NOT A PLEASURE.—Particular care should be taken that children do not associate the ideas of idleness and pleasure. The mind and the body both need occasional recreation; but there is no necessity that either should ever in our waking moments be idle. Proper employment not only promotes good, but prevents evil; so also, idleness has its positive as well as its negative effects.

Nature, or rather the God of nature, has so formed the human heart, that it cannot be happy in a dormant state. Nothing is so grateful to the mind as the consciousness of being well employed. There is a principle in man which disposes him to be proud of responsibilities, and pleased with the idea of discharging them aright. This principle is early developed. Children are never so happy as when invested with some responsibility. It is of great consequence that this should be encouraged.—Children should be taught, as much as possible, to derive pleasure from usefulness.—Maine Cult.

LAST WORDS OF A SUNDAY SCHOLAR.—James Brown, a little boy belonging to the High Felling Sunday School, near Newcastle, (England,) who met his end by an accident in the coal-pit, when asked by his teacher if he thought he should die, replied, 'Yes.'

'To heaven,' was his answer.

'And why?'

Here he called his mother and the rest of the family, and said, 'I love you mother, and you father, and my brothers and sisters, and my teachers, but I love Jesus Christ above all! and I am going to heaven that bonny (beautiful) place.' Here he ceased, his voice failed, and his happy spirit took its flight to the realms of eternal bliss.

How deficient are they in their religious views and concerns who do not look to the Lord Jesus as the sanctifier as well as the Redeemer! If I wash thee not, says he, thou hast no part in me. Without holiness no man shall see the Lord.

De Ruyter, November 9, 1842.

"If ye love me, keep my commandments."

This is the test that Jesus Christ requires of love to himself. And when we take into the account the fact that all his commandments like God's are reasonable, and in themselves calculated to be of service to those to whom they are given, we are constrained to feel that an easier and fitter test could not have been given. It is also in accordance with man's habits to pay homage to that which he loves. So that it is both consistent and natural for the Christian to keep the Savior's commandments. Beside this, it must be acknowledged that the true disciples of the Savior are anxious to do his will strictly in all things. It is nevertheless true that among Christians there is an almost endless variety of sentiments, and systems of religion differing in some respects from each other. And it is equally true that these are not all right. Now whatever may be conjectured as the cause, yet it must appear evident that Jesus Christ is not the author of the divisions, and that a candid examination of his requirements, with a desire to do them, would lead all to embrace the same views. The words of Jesus Christ are in no case ambiguous or of doubtful import, but are made so plain that all may understand.

From these considerations, we conclude that all who do sincerely love the Lord Jesus Christ, will enquire with an honest heart after his will, and that considerations of selfish nature will be laid aside, and the word be received with gladness. And while the time-server cavils, and substitutes, and changes, and nullifies whatever does not meet his wishes, the true disciple is ever inquiring like Saul, "Lord what wilt thou have me to do?" and is as ready to obey as to know the will of God

The commands of Jesus Christ are unchangeable. Men may change, but one jot or tittle shall not pass from the word of God. 'Tis is in vain, therefore, that men seek to modify or construe God's word so as to make it conform to their wishes. The words of Jesus have gone forth, and by them shall men be judged at the last day. 'Tis the part of wisdom to receive the gospel as it is, and be swallowed up in the will of Christ. Deviations from this, may, perhaps, for a time, better a man's temporal circumstances, and render him popular, and his way easy, but in the end it will pierce his soul through with many sorrows. They will meet with favor from the world who conform their conduct to its rules, and a man may make a smooth passage through life by yielding to the dictation of the world, but in doing this, he may lose the favor of God, and perish beneath his rod.

South Western Association.—We have received in manuscript the S. W. Association Minutes, with a request that we should publish them in the Register. We shall do so next week. The Association has been strengthened this year by the addition of four churches, viz: Port Jefferson, and Jackson, Shelby Co.; Sciota, Pickaway Co., and Stokes, Logan Co., the latter of which we have had no knowledge of before. Neither have we learned from the minutes the time of its organization or number of members. Will some brother give us an account of its time of organization, location, number of members, &c. The Association seemed to posses the right spirit, and is fast gaining ground as will be seen from their minutes.

Ordination.—Br. Richard C. Bond, of Lost Creek Church, Va., was ordained to the work of the gospel ministry at the session of the S. W. Association. We rejoice with the brethren in having a Minister among them who is worthy of their confidence.

The Sabbath Tract, No. 2, has reached us from the Agent at New York. The subject, "The Moral Nature and observance of the Sabbath." It contains 48 pages. It is, we believe, from the pen of Br. T. B. Brown.

Paul Stillman, will act as Agent of the Hierophant in New-York—or any other paper—as may be desired. A per centage or commission, will be applied to the Tract fund, for whatever subscriptions are sent to him.

Br. Bailey,—When on my return from Conference I came in contact with a member of a Baptist Church in Philadelphia.—I introduced the subject of the Sabbath to his consideration, and gave my views in relation to it. Truth obtained a lodgment in his heart. On the 6th day following the conversation, he called on me at my residence, having resolved to keep the Sabbath. He did not confer with flesh and blood.—Learning his duty, he did it. Returning to Philadelphia, he introduced the subject to his wife, and she cordially embraced the Sabbath. Subsequently his son has commenced keeping the Sabbath, and being acquainted with the science of music, we have employed him to teach our youth in that department. The old gentleman is about 53 years of age. He appears like a very devoted ard spiritual man. He and his son are both well informed, and we trust they will prove a valuable accession to our denomination. The old gentleman is anxious to see a Seventh-day Baptist Church in Philadelphia. I am yours, &c.

Br. Bailey,—As I pass from place to place, and read the news from different parts, I am struck with deep solemnity by the many changes which occur, and especially by the ravages of death. How true it is that "the fashion of this world passeth away;" and that "our life is but a vapor that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away!" How many of those with whom we were once connected, and with whom we took sweet counsel are gone the way of all the earth. Others are removed to distant parts; so that, in a few years, the face of society is almost entirely deranged. And we are hereby presented with a striking mirror, through which we may see our own liability to be summoned away. In a short period, our work will be done, and our race finished. How then are we admonished to fidelity and persevearance!—How vivid should be our impressions of the shortness of time, and of the importance of being ever ready to meet the affecting call to give up an account! Whether ministers, editors, or private citizens, we should be careful to have the work allotted us done in its proper season, and done thoroughly. Our own personal wants and obligations, and the relations which we sustain to a dying world, require as to "be up and doing." There is no time for sloth. Nor should any opportunity for labor and usefulness be neglected. We should be ready to do and to suffer the whole will of God. In addition to the shortness and uncertainty of life, the important period in which we live, and the many doors which are opened for usefulness, require the utmost vigilance. There is much to be done for the correction of error, and the purging of the church from easily besetting sins. There is much to be done preparatory to the Millennial reign.—And the Lord has laid his claim to the prayers and efforts of each one of his servants, as we see the scriptures unfolding, and the prophecies fulfilling, new motives press upon us to abound in the work of the Lamb. Let us, then, be "faithful unto death," and we shall receive "a crown of life."

Having recently removed my family to Lansingville, Tompkins Co., you will please forward the Register to that place instead of Weedsport. Also, give notice that I wish my friends to address me at the said office.

Dear Brother Bailey.—After an interim of nearly three months, I am gratified in being able to send you the second number of the Sabbath Tracts. This long delay has been mostly from circumstances beyond my control; but three or four weeks were taken up unnecessarily in the process of Stereotyping—a delay I hope to avoid in the next, and a couple more by an error on the cover, which would subject them to double postage. You will find a few typographical inaccuracies, all of which, however, will be corrected quite easily for the next edition. I find the stereotyping quite a relief to the expense of getting them up; for this tract, though quite as large again, without the covers, as number 1, has cost for the stereotype plate and printing 1,000 copies, about $65, whereas I had to make an outlay for number 1, in order to distribute the expense of composition, as much as possible, of above $100. You will, of course, perceive that this edition costs much more than what they will sell for ($6,50 per 100.) But the future editions will cost but about half of these, or less, say $3,00 per 100, being a fraction less than the price established, (15 pages for one cent.) I hope to have the next one out in about two weeks from this time. In regard to the Society report, I know not what to say. The Society, as you know, authorized the directors to publish it with their proceedings, and you know it was my desire to make a respectable pamphlet of it for general distribution, as it was thought that the subject of it was not only celebrated to encourage our own people, but would be highly useful in vindicating us from the charge of making a trifling schism in the church, by showing the necessity of coming to the plain unsophisticated Bible truth in regard to the Sabbath, if we would save it from general desecration. But we have no funds to appropriate to its publication; and we neither have credit, nor wish it—I speak for the Society, as for my own self, I would that I were able to put it forth upon my own expense, relying upon my brethren for remuneration; but I have not persuaded myself, that with the other burdens that I have taken upon myself, it would be prudent or duty so to do.

The Brethren here have [illegible] as you know, extended me their [illegible] the expense of publication of the series of tracts to an extent some $200 or $300 above the receipts of the Society, and as there are but four or five of us to bear it, I must be excused from asking more of them at present. In this dilemma what shall I do? You have already published the Minutes of Conference without any notice of this Society, I suppose, and the Brethren were promised a report of my "stewardship," which not having seen I fear they will hold back worse than they have the past year. But I should not mind it so much, as the less money they furnish to me, the less service they will expect of me, did I not see and feel the need of more tracts in this long neglected field. The tracts now in hand are not all that are needed. These are lengthy, and, except the first calculated for enquirers such as are willing to read a 100 pages if necessary to come at the knowledge of the truth; but we want others to excite attention to the subject, such as, at a small expense, may be sown broad-cast; others to meet the sophistry and cavil of the advocates and defenders of this bantling of papacy, and to follow them up, and to drive them from the holes into which they sometimes creep, and these you know are sometimes very small, and to a "clean heart" somewhat dirty. We want tracts expressly for such work, for it would be unfair to make and honest hearted enquirer wade through such stuff in their enquiries for the truth, as we should if we put it in a fair argument for the Sabbath, and would be even an imputation upon their honesty.

Such are the present wants of the Society, and not of the Society only, but of very many scattered but fearless advocates of the Sabbath through the length and breadth of our country—yes of ALL CHRISTENDOM. Can our brethren be awaked to the subject, and induced to part with some of the paltry dross which God owns, and needs for his truth's sake, but unfortunately, perhaps, in the time of need is lent into poor hands or covetous stewards? I did hope that the offer I made to superintend the getting up and publication of these tracts gratuitous, a labor, by the by, which I believe but few appreciate, but which, for one in my circumstances, I had the vanity to think was generous, would induce some of the brethren to be liberal. But when I see the names of some, I hoped to see a corresponding liberality from, returned with 25—not dollars but cents! if even at all, or perhaps $1, or $2, if they were pretty well above suspicion of want, it, —— I will not say what effect it had upon me; but it did not discourage me, for my hope is, and was in the onsent, in God—not in man. I would make honorable exception of one young brother who has paid $10, and two who have paid $3, each.

Our brethren have now a fair specimen of the "matter and manner" of the tracts, and I should be glad if they would avail themselves of such opportunities as they may have to send for a supply, such especially as are entitled either by pecuniary contributions or what is better claim perhaps, inability. It is, however, well for me here to say, that I, as the Agent of the Society, am entitled to no more of the tracts printed than the funds of the Society will pay for at the cost of publication. I have sent a specimen to all the Societies of S. D. Baptists, of which I have the P. O. address. I wish you to stir up our brethren sharply upon the subject if you can feel it right to do so. Affectionately yours,

PAUL STILLMAN.

The Hierophant or Monthly Expositor of Sacred Symbols, and prophecy by Geo. Bush, Professor of Hebrew in New-York city University. The work is published monthly at $1,50 per annum in advance. The following review of it we take from the Daily Tribune. Will the Brother who has forwarded us the three numbers, secure the others for us.

The subject of Prophecy has within a few years awakened unusual interest in the religious portion of the community. The various conflicting theories with regard to its interpretation and fulfilment were discussed from pulpits, in lectures, in books and through the periodical press, with a vigor and earnestness before quite unknown. How much of this excitement is owing to the bold doctrine of Miller, who proclaims the physical destruction of this Earth to be within the events of the coming year, we shall not undertake to say. We regard it as fortunate in all respects that the time which is to determine finally the truth or falsity of his interpretations is so near at hand, though we deem his doctrines, and especially his confident mode of proclaiming them, as calculated to work serious injury to the cause of religious truth. His followers are taught to believe that if the Bible be an inspired volume, and its prophecies the declarations of Him who seeth all things from the beginning, the Earth will be burned in 1843: if, therefore, this even should not take place, the conclusion to which the great body of them will arrive will be, that the Bible is not true. But in the midst of this excitement we are pleased to learn that Prof. Bush finds a growing encouragement in the prosecution of his Biblical labors. It is a relief, to find a competent judge of the Sacred letter taking entirely different views of these disputed matters, and without naming the wild vagaries afloat, laying down and ably supporting principles of interpretation which inevitably overthrow and scatter them to the winds. We are glad to learn that to this calm discussion of the subject the public are beginning to lend an attentive ear.

The present number of the Hierophant is mainly devoted to the chief point involved in the controversy—the Conflagration of the Heavens and the Earth. We have already stated, in our notices of the Lectures of Prof. Bush some time since, the prominent points of his belief. He endeavors to show that the Scriptures, so far from affording any countenance to the doctrines of Miller respecting the speedy destruction of the Earth by fire, do not, when rightly understood, announce any such catastrophe as ever to occur. Upon this point, as well as with regard to the general character of the Bible, the following extract will be read with interest:—

"It appears to be but little in accordance with the general scope of revelation to deal in matters of physical science. The grand drift of the sacred volume is moral. The design of its author is to teach man his duty; and whatever he may impart on the great theme of destiny, it is the destiny of the human race inhabiting the earth, rather than of the earth itself. It does not appear to come within the compass of the divine counsels to instruct men in the absolute verities either of Astronomy, Geology, Physiology, or Chemistry. On all subjects of this nature, the Bible speaks in accommodation to the then existing state of knowledge, or to the popular notions generally entertained, without assuming to pronounce upon them as correct or incorrect. Thus in regard to the origin of our globe, it does not appear that we are required by the canons of a sound exegesis, to put any construction upon the record of Moses which shall preclude the conclusions forced upon us by the facts and demonstrations of Geology. It is a grand moral truth of the utmost moment that God was the Creator of the Universe; and this truth is most unequivocally taught us in the words of the sacred historian; but as to the time, order, and details of the creation, these are points on which God has left the human intellect free to exercise itself, and to gather the true genesis of the earth from the earth itself, from the nature of its elements, the order of its strata, and the intrinsic character of its various phenomena. The result in this case is well known. The unanimous voice of all practical Geologists traces back the commencing date of this terraqueous sphere to a period infinitely beyond the era of Adam. So in like manner, it would not be surprising if the conclusion should at length be adopted, that the physical futurity of our globe should as far transcend the letter of prophecy as its physical antiquity does the letter of history. That this planetary ball is eventually in some way to be destroyed by the same power that called it into being, we think in the highest degree probable; but if such is to be its doom, we look for the annunciation rather in the discoveries of Astronomy than of Revelation—rather in the Apocalypse of Newton, Laplace, or Herschell, than in that of John."

With this general view of the nature of Revelation, Prof. Bush proceeds to show that, throughout the Old and New Testaments, great moral and spiritual movements are often represented in the language of physical changes and overturnings. He states it as a formidable objection to the prevailing views on the subject, that the literal interpretation of the passage in Peter chiefly relied upon to prove the destruction of the heavens and the earth, brings him into irreconcilable conflict with other portions of Scriptural prophecy.

"For ourselves we are utterably unable to put any other construction upon the statements respecting the new Jerusalem, than that which recognizes the present material globe as its seat and scene. If we have not wholly failed in the array of Scriptural evidence attempted on this subject, we have shown that the characters of this dispensation do inevitably imply the continued existence of the globe and of its mortal inhabitants during the dominance of that blissful economy. What else is to be inferred from the kings of the earth bringing their glory into this city, which we have shown to be identically the same with the 'forces of the Gentiles' being converted to Zion, as prophetically announced by Isaiah. Is the earth to be burnt up before Isaiah's predictions are fulfilled? But Isaiah and John have identically the same period in view. At any rate, he that denies this is bound to disprove it. Until this is done we must contend that no one has a right to charge our interpretation with doing violence to the language of Scripture. Again, the leaves of the mystic tree of life in the New Jerusalem are to be for the healing of the Gentile nations. Are these nations to be healed in heaven? If so, then Ezekiel also is describing a heavenly state of things in his closing chapters, where precisely the same objects and results are portrayed with those of John. Has it been—can it be—evinced, that these Old Testament prophets have any other state in view than the New Jerusalem state? And are they setting forth any other than the glories of the earthly Zion in its latter-day triumphs and prosperity? Has it ever entered into the thoughts of any commentator, ancient or modern, that the destruction of the globe by fire was to precede the consummation which they announce? Yet that consummation is assuredly posterior to the elementary dissolution predicted by Peter, for it is the same with the New Jerusalem, and this no one doubts is subsequent, in the order of events, to that passing away of the heavens and the earth—whatever it be—which the apostle sets before us. We see then to what extremities we are reduced by the common construction put upon the words of Peter. It inevitably brings the apostle into literal conflict with other portions of the inspired volume, equally infallible and authoritative with his own. This apparent discrepancy we have simply stated. We exhibit it merely as a fact of revelation; and one which concerns every believer in revelation as ultimately as it does us. We protest with uplifted hand against the charge either of idle speculation, skeptical cavilling, or heretical teaching on this account. Our readers will draw such inferences from the fact as they deem requisite, but for ourselves we hesitate not to hold it as the safer alternative to construe the apostolic announcement as descriptive of a figurative rather than literal conflagration."

Prof. B. then presents the subject in another light. Peter, after describing the melting of the elements, and the passing away of the heavens and the earth, immediately adds: "Nevertheless, we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth." This promise is found Is. 65, 17—25, and by the very terms of it, as may be seen by reference, supposes the continued existence of the earth in its present state, and of its mortal inhabitants.—Upon this Prof. Bush comments as follows:

"This, then, is the announcement of the state which is to follow the catastrophe described by the pen of the apostle. We propound the question, whether the conditions of the prophecy are not such as to force upon us the conviction of the continuance of the present material fabric of the globe and of its mortal inhabitants? Here is the dying of young and old, the building of houses and planting of vineyards, the enjoyment of longevity like the days of a tree, the lying down together of the wolf and the lamb, and the prevalence of peace in all God's holy mountain. The expressions are many of them undoubtedly figurative, but they are still of a character to indicate an order of events of a terrestrial locality. The most obvious interpretation unquestionably is that which is most common—viz: that of a grand spiritual renovation, the effect of gospel influences under the benign reign of the Messiah in the latter ages of the world, and during that halcyon period which is the chief burden of all prophecy. In this view of the passage the great mass of commentators unite their suffrages, with scarcely a dissenting voice.

The question now comes distinctly before us, whether Peter is necessarily to be understood as giving a sense of this prophecy utterly and entirely diverse from that which lies upon its face, and which the great mass of commentators, Jewish and Christian, have by common consent adopted. In adopting this sense has any violence been done to the mind of the Spirit? Is not this sense fairly to be recognized in the words? Is it not a true sense? And taking this passage by itself, with all the analogy of the prophetic diction throughout the whole Scriptures before us, are we not capable of fixing its legitimate import with a very great degree of assurance? Certain it is, that no one would ever think of interpreting this language of a physical renovation of the heavens and the earth, or of any thing else than a grand spiritual reform, were it not for the passage in Peter which appears to give another turn to the Old Testament oracle, and to shut us up to the physical construction. What then shall be our alternative? As both writers speak equally under the prompting of one and the same Spirit of inspiration, we cannot allow ourselves to question for a moment that there neither is nor can be any real discrepancy between their several utterances. If rightly understood they must harmonize.—But it is clear that the literal statements of each are directly inter-repugnant, and that one or the other must receive a spiritual interpretation. Which shall it be? Shall we make Peter conform to Isaiah, or Isaiah to Peter? Shall we read Isaiah as predicting a physical change in the visible heavens or earth, or Peter as announcing a spiritual one?—for upon one horn or the other of the dilemma we are inextricably fixed. The point is one on which, for ourselves, we do not hesitate. The evidence is to our mind convincing that whatever may have been the apostle's private personal views, the Holy Spirit, who spake by him, designed to set forth the same great moral change in the state of the world which is depicted in the earlier prediction of Isaiah.

The Apostles, for the most part act the part of mere expositors of the true sense of the Old Testament writings, and the very title of the closing book of the sacred canon—'Apocalypse'—is doubtless adopted for the reason that it contains a revelation or developement of the hidden purport of the ancient prophets. It is much seldomer than is generally imagined, that we meet with any original and independent disclosures. The germs of all New Testament truths are to be found in the Old, and it is only by a deadly violence that one moiety of the great body of revelation is sundered from the other."

Our extracts have been somewhat copious, but we are conscious of having done but partial justice to the strong vein of argument that runs through the Professor's Essay. To those who take an interest in a discussion of this nature—and who does not, or should not?—we cordially commend the work itself as a rich treat in the line of Biblical exposition. The concluding article in the number is a caustic reply to the New York Evangelist.

News of the Day.

Sentence of Sarah Freeman.—On Wednesday last, at New Haven, Chief Justice Williams pronounced sentence of death on this unhappy woman, (mulatto,) convicted before the Superior Court of Connecticut, of destroying her child by throwing it into a vault. She is to be hung on the 15th day of June next. The following is an extract from the sentence, which was solemn and impressive:

The separation of the soul and body, so wonderfully united, when effected by human means, is always calculated to make the stoutest heart tremble. Murder in its least offensive form indicates dreadful depravity.

But what must be thought of the depravity, which in a Christian land would lead a mother to destroy her first born child, when opening its eyes upon this new world, and looking for assistance from her who gave it birth!

The brute beast will watch around its offspring, and assumes unwonted courage in its defense; but you have not only abandoned your infant child, but have placed it where you knew it must perish by a most loathsome death.

In doing this, you have violated the laws of the State as well as the laws of God, and that holy law of love which he has implanted deep in a mother's heart.

For the sake of concealing your guilt in one offense, you have, as is too common, fallen into another far more black and sinful; a crime for which you can make no atonement, and for which the law demands your life; blood for blood, so it is written.

White Cows.—A correspondent of the Maine Farmer, Mr. J. H. Fuller, of La Grange township, furnishes that paper with the following observations upon the color of cattle:

'Much has been said in regard to the color of cattle. Some people say if everything else is right they care nothing about the color, while others are very particular.

"It has not been proved to me, by experience, that white cows are less valuable than any other color, although they are said by common report to give poor milk, and it is often asked, 'why do you keep so many white cows?' We have now three, and have made butter from pure white cow's milk, and don't see any difference in mixing it with a lot of other milk. So far as white cows stand in our estimation, they have been second to none as to milk, and they have been in the family for forty years.—They are not all white, but the popular name is the 'old white cow breed.' Color is not everything, although it is something. Among the humankind, color is said to be only skin deep, and whether it is among the cattlekind any more than hair deep, I cannot say. I don't fancy white oxen, but a white cow looks well, and they are sometimes handy to find in a dark night. I believe their butter is as yellow, and their milk as rich of course. I should think little of color as relates to the dairy properties of cows."

The citizens of Pittsburgh are alive to the advantages which will be conferred on their city, hitherto called par excellence, 'the Birmingham of America,' by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The Pittsburg Gazette of the 19th ult. recommends that on the completion of the railroad to Cumberland (which work is now accomplished within eight miles,) that communication be opened with Cumberland by stages, for the purpose of enabling Pittsburg to avail itself of some of the advantages contemplated by the execution of this work.—*Jour. The number of daily papers in the U. S. is larger than one would imagine: and the number of what are called periodicals is much larger than can be profitably supported.

It seems there are but five States in the Union which have not daily papers; there are but four which have not periodicals.

In the following table will be found the proportion between the newspapers of the United States and the white people. Had the blacks been included, it would have made a change in the proportions of the slave States.

The table, however, developes some instructive facts.

1. Three of the oldest and most influential States of the American Union, viz:—Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina, have the smallest proportional number of newspapers, (as they have also the fewest persons who know how to read,) to the white population; but if the blacks be included, they fall far behind hand.

2. Where newspapers most prevail, as in Massachusetts, New-York, &c., there also are most schools—most enterprise—most wealth, and most progress. The conclusion is not, that newspapers occasion these results, but that the press and intelligence go together—mutual helps to each other.

The proportional number of papers appears large in Louisiana and Mississippi; but, this is caused by two evident facts.—Each of them has large commercial towns, and each has more blacks than whites; the proportion being taken only in respect to the latter.

The subject is important in more respects than one. If the press be thus numerous and powerful, how is a nation to be purified in its morals unless the press be purified? That which is seen, read, heard every day, like the air we breathe, will communicate strength or weakness, healing or disease.—Cincinnati Chron.

There is a great deal of counterfeit U. S. coin in circulation, of all the small denominations, and it is very difficult to detect it. As to cents, they are manufactured and sold by the keg, just like nails. The privately manufactured cents are worth just as much as those made by the Government, but in silver coin the free trade plan gets in too much copper.

The Dead Sea.—The water was not only very salt, but exceedingly bitter. The great density of the water was amply proved by its power to bear up the body. I could lie on my back in the water, with my head, hands, and feet all out at the same time, and remain thus as long as I pleased without any motion. This I could not do in any other water that I have been in.—Paxton's Letters on Palestine.

Spicy Pun.—The following toast was given at a dinner in the nutmeg-producing State of Connecticut: 'The Nutmeg State. Where shall we find a grater?'

Progress of the English Language.—It is curious to trace the progress of the English language through a few centuries, and to mark its slow improvement. In illustration of this I will take the Lord's Prayer, specimens of which are given at different periods. In the year 700 it began thus:

"Uren fader thic arth in heofnas, sic gekalgud thin noma, to cymeth thin ric; sic thin willa sue is in heofnas and in eartho."

Two hundred years after this, but small advancement had been made in the language. It ran thus:

"Thee ure fader the earth on heofenum, si thin namage hal god: cum thin ric. Si thin willa on earthen swa, swa on heofnum."

In the reign of Henry II., about 200 years after this, it was rendered thus, and sent over to England by Pope Adrian, a native of that country:

"Ure fadyr in heaven rich,
Thy name be haliyed eber lich,
Thou bring us thy michell blisse;
Als hit in heaven y doe
That in yearth beene it also," &c.

About one hundred years later, in the reign of Henry III., it ran thus:

"Fader thou art in heaven blisse,
Thin Holye nam is wurth the blisse,
Cumen and mot thy kingdom
Thin holy will it he all don
In heaven and in earth also,
So it shall be in full well, Ie tro," &c.

In the reign of Henry VI., it began thus:

"Our fader that art in heavens, hallicwid be thi name; the kingdom come to thee; be the will don in eerthe as in havene," &c.

In 1537, it began thus:

"O, oure father which art in heaven; halowed be thy name. Let thy kingdom come. Thy will be fulfilled, as well in earth as it is in heaven," &c.—National Intelligencer.

New Haven, always distinguished for its philanthropy, has contributed for the twelve months past, $6,000 for foreign missions.

Shipwreck.—Capt. Andrews of the British brig Hector, arrived at Charleston, S. C., reports that on the 11th inst., in lat. 33, lon. 77, he fell in with schooner John Hughes, Captain Lewis, of and from Newbern, (N. C.) for Barbadoes, loaded with lumber, bottom up, and took on from the bottom Jack Glin, one of the crew, a slave. He states that the schooner was capsized on the 8th inst., whilst lying to under a storm staysail. The whole of the crew were in the cabin at the time. Capt. Lewis, one of the crew, and himself, drove through the cabin windows, but he, only, succeeded in gaining the bottom of the vessel. The survivor, when fallen in with by the Hector, had been on the bottom of the vessel four days.

Robbery in the Harbor.—On Friday afternoon last, a singular robbery was attempted on board a Provincetown fishing schooner, while lying in the stream. The crew had gone ashore, leaving the captain and a boy abroad, when two men, who had come up as passengers in the vessel from Provincetown, made an attack on the captain, knocked him down, and robbed him of $200, which they knew previously he had in his possession. They then jumped into a small boat which upset, one clung to the boat and other to the schooner, until they were discovered by Mr. Thayer, a boatman, who picked them up and took them aboard the U. S. ship Ohio, where they were put in irons. The money was recovered. The names of the two robbers are John Amber and Jeremiah Tazier.—Mail.

Whirlwind at Sea.—The Barque Emily Wilder, Brown, which arrived at this port from Malaga, on Saturday, in lat. 38, lon. 45, on the 8th inst. was struck with a whirlwind, which lasted only about forty-five seconds, but carried away her fore topmast and fore topgallant mast, breaking the yard in two pieces; also carried away the main topgallant mast and main topmast head, split mainsail, fore topgallant sail and several others. The gaff topsail, which was hauled down, was torn from the hoops and rigging and fell upon deck, while the spanker, which was set, was untouched. A ship was seen about three miles distant, which carried studding sails all the time.

It is stated in an English paper that two men in Birmingham were bitten by a small spaniel in the month of March last. No notice was taken of the wounds, as they soon healed and no serious effects were observable until early in September, when they both died of hydrophobia.

It appears by a table in the Southern Churchman, that the number of Clergy of the Episcopal Church in the United States has somewhat more than doubled in the last ten years. The number of bishops has increased from 12 to 21 in the same time.—The present number of Clergy is 1142.

It appears that the robbery at the office of the United States Quarter-master, which took place at New Orleans on the night of the 8th inst., was perpetrated by a gang of slaves, who have been apprehended, and a large amount of the money recovered.

According to the late census, the population of Cuba is 1,015,674, of whom 318,291 are white, and 727,383 are colored. The city of Havanna contains 383,073, being about 39 per cent of the whole population of the Island.

Self Devotednes in Low Life.—We take the following from an English Journal, as a noble instance of heroism:

"A few weeks ago two miners, Verran and Roberts, were at work in South Caradon new shaft (which is intended to be sunk perpendicularly, through a granite country to intersect that lode at the depth of 140 fathoms.) The present depth is about 10 fathoms, and they had prepared a hole for blasting, the fuse inserted, tamped up and all ready for firing. On these occasions the men are drawn up by a windlass, and as they are only three in a corpse, there is only one man at the brace, and he can only draw up one at a time; consequently, after the whole is ready one man is drawn up and the kibble lowered ready to receive the last man, who has put fire to the fuse, and then both men at the windlass draw him up with the utmost speed, in order that all may get out of the way when the explosion takes place, which is sometimes so violent that large stones are thrown up at the top, carrying with them part of the roller and windlass to considerable height. It unfortunately happened that as the safety fuse with which the hole was charged was longer than was necessary, they inconsiderately took a sharp stone to cut a piece of it off, and ignition immediately commenced. They both flew to the kibble and cried out to the man at the brace to wind up; but alas! after trying with all his might, he could not start them. At this awful moment (when the furious hissing of the fuse assured them that their destruction was within a half a minute's march of them) Verran sprang out of the kibble, exclaiming to his comrade, Roberts, 'Go on, brother, I shall be in heaven in a minute!' consequently, Roberts was drawn up, and Verran threw himself down, and placed his poor devoted head under a piece of plank in one corner of the shaft, awaiting the moment when he should be blown to atoms. Just as Roberts got to the brace, and was looking down with trembling apprehension on the fate of poor Verran, the whole went off with a tremendous explosion, and a small stone struck Roberts severely on the forehead as he was looking down the shaft.—To the inexpressible surprise and joy of the man at the brace, they heard Verran cry out, 'Don't be afraid, I am not hurt!'—Roberts immediately descended, and found that the great burden of the blast was thrown in every part of the shaft except the corner where poor Verran was coiled up. This extraordinary circumstance has produced a considerable sensation throughout the district. Not only do they view the escape as a miraculous interposition of Divine Providence, but the conduct of Verran a noble instance of what a real Christian will do in a moment of extremity."

Effects of too much Wine.—Wine heightens indifference into love, love into jealousy, and jealousy into madness. It often turns the good-natured man into an idiot, and the choleric into an assassin. It gives bitterness to resentment, it makes vanity insupportable, and displays every little spot of the soul in its utmost deformity.—Addison.

Milk Silkness.—This fearful disease, we learn rages to some extent in the northern parts of Indiana. People are taken with vomiting, which continues until death. It is generally supposed to be caused by the water being impregnated with some mineral; but this fact has never been fully ascertained.

Returning to the Bottle—A Warning!—Drowned, in the lock at Mohawk, Herkimer county, on Sunday night, Mr. Daniel Osgood, aged about 60 years. Sometime last winter, this unfortunate man, who had been for many years intemperate, signed the Washingtonian pledge, and we learn that down to last week he had remained true to his engagement. In an evil hour, it seems he was induced to return to the accursed beverage, and it has cost him his life! A fearful warning to others, 'in like cases offending.'

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and traveling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, trouble and expense. The principal advantage to be derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inkstand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents.—Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

Christian Review.

A GOOD PROPOSITION.

THE importance of the Christian Review is admitted. It was commenced nearly seven years since in obedience to an urgent and almost spontaneous call from different parts of the land, and in compliance with that call, has been sustained through six successive volumes, only by special effort, and considerable sacrifice (previous to the present volume) on the part of a few individuals. The number of subscribers, however, has gradually increased, so as to inspire the hope that ultimately, the list would become such as to place it above "want," and on a basis that should insure its perpetuity; and with proper exertion on the part of its friends, it is believed such a result might easily be accomplished.

The work is put at the low price of three dollars per annum, in order to bring it within the means of as large a number as possible. Yet, many who are able, and who would be benefited by its perusal, are not now subscribers, and need, it is thought, only to be reminded of the facts to become so.

The work occupies a high position among the religious quarterlies of the country, and in the estimation of intelligent men of all Christian denominations, is contributing a good share of the religious periodical literature of the age. To the Baptist denomination, in particular, it is an auxiliary in defence and illustration of the truth, with which it is believed, we cannot afford to dispense. And, since the committee and the publishers have resolved, never again to make an appeal for pecuniary aid, but to discontinue its publication whenever the subscriptions cease to be sufficient to sustain it, it becomes every well-wisher of the Review to exert himself now in its behalf.

☞The publishers having a number of the past volumes on hand, propose, in order to interest some who may be desirous of possessing it, yet feel unable to subscribe, to exert their influence to obtain new subscribers, and by so doing not only secure it for themselves, but, by increasing its circulation, extend its usefulness, and help also in insuring its perpetuity—to offer a PREMIUM for new subscribers, as follows.

☞Any person obtaining TWENTY NEW SUBSCRIBERS and remitting the publishers sixty dollars, shall be entitled to a complete set of the Review in seven volumes, the subscription price of which is, TWENTY ONE DOLLARS!

⁂ For FIFTEEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS the last five volumes will be given—subscription price FIFTEEN DOLLARS!

⁂ For TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, the last TWO VOLUMES, subscription price, SIX DOLLARS!

For FIVE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, either of the last three volumes, subscription price, THREE DOLLARS!

It is hoped that this very liberal premium, may induce many of the friends of the Review to make a renewed effort in its behalf, and thus not only reap benefit themselves, but aid the great object the Review is intended to sustain.

SUBSCRIBERS are reminded of the terms of subscription, "three dollars per annum IN ADVANCE." Have you paid your subscription? The money is much needed.

GOULD KENDALL & LINCOLN, Publishers,
59 Washington Street.

N. B. The publishers of any religious paper who shall give the above advertisement three insertions in their columns (and send a copy to the publishers) shall be entitled to a selection of either two of the last four volumes.

Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done up in a style not surpassed by any of the "Craft" in this "village or county;" and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the students; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each; the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

HOLIDAY GIFT FOR THE YEAR 1843.

A BOOK FOR EVERY FAMILY IN THE UNITED STATES

AGENTS WANTED.

ONE Hundred Dollars given for every one hundred copies sold!—Agents—responsible men—wanted in every town and village throughout the United States and British Provinces, to sell 'Sears' Bible Biography,' the most splendidly illustrated and Cheapest work ever issued on the American Continent, containing several hundred Engravings, entirely new and original, designed and executed by the most eminent artists of England and America. Cost of preparing the work, $5000. This beautiful and important work contains upwards of 500 pages royal octavo, is printed from new stereotype plates, handsomely bound in gilt and lettered, and retails readily at the low price of $2 50 per volume. The following extract is from a lengthy Review, written by the Rev. W. C. Brownlee, D. D., and is only one out of several hundred recommendations, from the clergy and the press, that the work has already received.

New-York, August 6, 1842.

"This is, beyond question, one of the most elegant books ever presented to our fellow citizens in this Republic. It ought to be in every Christian family for its innate value; and in every patriotic family as a splendid specimen of our progress in domestic manufactures, and the advancement of our artists and manufacturers in their rivalship with those of Europe. W. C. BROWNLEE."

POETRY.

From the Southern Champion.

My Father.

BY H. R. JACKSON, ESQ. OF GEORGIA.

As die the embers on the hearth,
And o'er the floor the shadows fall,
And creeps the chirping cricket forth,
And ticks the death-watch in the wall;
I see a form in yonder chair,
That grows beneath the waning light;
There are the wan, sad features—there
The pallid brow and locks of white!

My Father! when they laid thee down,
And heaped the clay upon thy breast,
And left thee sleeping all alone
Upon thy narrow couch of rest,
I know not why, I could not weep—
The soothing drops refused to roll;
And oh! that grief is wild and deep,
That settles tears on the soul!

But when I saw thy vacant chair,
Thine idle hat upon the wall
Thy book—the penciled passage where Thine eye had rested last of all;
The tree, beneath whose friendly shade
Thy trembling feet had wandered forth;
The very prints those feet had made
When last they feebly trod the earth;

And thought, while countless ages fled,
Thy vacant seat would vacant stand;
Unworn thy hat thy book unread,
Effaced thy footsteps from the sand;
And widowed is this cheerless world,
The heart that gave its love to thee;
Torn, like a vine whose tendrils curled
More closely round the failing tree!

Oh, Father! then for her and thee
Gushed madly forth the scorching tears,
And oft, and long, and bitterly
Those tears have gushed in later years;
For as the world grows cold around,
And things take on their real hue,
'Tis sad to learn that love is found
Alone above the stars with you!

"THE CHARITIES THAT SWEETEN LIFE."

Pleasant words! Pleasant words! Do you know kind reader, how potent a spell lies in a pleasant word? Have you not often thought of its power to soothe—to charm—to delight, when all things else fail? As you have passed on through the journey of life, have you not seen it smoothing many an aching bosom? Have you not noticed it in the house and by the way—at the fireside and in the place of business? And have you not felt that pleasant words are among the "charities that sweeten life?" Ah! yes, and their influence has come over your own soul.—Not long since, when you went bending to the earth, oppressed, and weary with life's manifold sorrows—when dark clouds have hovered over you, and blackness of darkness covered you—when you were ready to yield in despondency the pursuit of happiness, and give yourself up to unmitigated gloom—when no object of life seemed desirable, and even the friendships of earth were worthless in your eyes—when you would fain have passed the companion of your childhood unnoticed, as you met him in the way—oh! you can tell how, in such an hour, the sound of a cheerful voice—one pleasant word has dispelled the gloom, and given you to the world again—a man—a hopeful, trusting man. You can tell us how like an angel-whisper was the kind inquiry of that companion, and how the tone of cheerful sympathy sent the dark clouds rolling from your sky, and revealed the bright light of day, showed you that earth is not all a wilderness, nor man a being utterly deserted to wretchedness.

Or, when you have come from the counting-room or the office, care-worn and weary,—when your brow has been furrowed and your thoughts perplexed—when troubles of the present and anxieties for the future have crowded every peaceful feeling from your heart, and when you almost dreaded to return to your own fireside, lest the sight of dear ones there should increase your distress—tell us what has been the influence of pleasant words at such a time. Tell us how that, ere you opened your door, the sound of glad voices reached your ear, and as you entered, how the troubles of your soul were laid to rest; and cares for the present and for the future fled before the pleasant words of your smiling children and the gentle greeting of your wife.

Or, when the ire of your spirit has been roused, and indignant feelings have reigned supreme in your breast—when the angry threat was just risisg to your lips, or the malignant wish about to burst from your heart—what mighty spell caused the storm so suddenly to subside, and spoke the turbulent waves so quietly to rest? Was it the whisper of a pleasant word that restored calmness to your tempest-tost soul? Did the soft answer turn away your wrath?

Reader, we might write a volume on this delightful influence. Go where we will, abide where we may, we feel its power. In every place we find some, who have but to speak, and gloom, unbidden, unwelcome guest, departs in haste, and the raging waves of passion are hushed, as by His voice, who once said, "Peace, be still."

But they are few. Among the multitudes of earth how small the number who habitually, and from principle, speak pleasantly. You have met them. Now and then they have crossed your path, and I doubt not your whole soul has blessed them, as it ought, for the words which were balm to your wounded spirit. And did you not wish all were like them? Did you not feel that earth would be a paradise indeed, if all the tones of that matchless instrument, the human voice, were in harmony with the kind thoughts of a thoroughly kind heart?

But, friend, while you thus wished, did you resolve to add one to their number?—Did you determine to imitate their example? Would I could persuade that it is your duty so to do—that henceforth you should make it a study. You think it a small matter requiring little effort. But I assure you it might cost you many a struggle ere you should learn to speak in pleasantness to all whom you might chance to meet, even in one short day; and if you accomplished it, perhaps it would be a better day's work than ever yet you did, and you might lay your head on the pillow of rest at night with feelings akin to those of spirits round the throne.

Oh! learn this art yourselves, all ye who have felt its kindly influence from others. Speak pleasant words to all around you, and your path shall ever be lighted by the smiles of those who welcome your coming and mourn yor parting footsteps

Mother, speak pleasantly to the little ones who cluster around you—speak ever pleasantly, and be assured that answering tones of joy and dispositions, formed to constant kindness shall be your reward.

Sister, brother, friend—would you render life all one sunny day, would you gather around you those who will cheer you in the darkst hour? let the law of kindness rule your tongue, and your words be pleasant, as the "dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended on the mountains of Zion."

Chistian, follower of Him who is passed into the heavens—heir of immortal glory—would you honor the Lord who bought you—show yourself worthy the crown that awaits you, and the society in which you expect soon to mingle? Strive to catch the tones which gladden that celestial city to which you haste. No discord mars those tones. No discontent nor fretfulness mingles with the sounds which by faith we hear. Would you prove that, beyond a doubt, you belong to that company—that you will not be a stranger then, when you have laid aside the vestments of mortality? Then imitate them in this thing. Go—from this hour speak to those whom had you already taken your place among the happy ones on high, and believe me, your Christian character shall rapidly improve. And you may hope to win many a soul to love and seek the religion which can so transform the spirit, and so rule the lips, that, amid all the vexations of this vexing world, no sound shall proceed from them but such as angels might delight in, and even He, whose name is Love, shall always approve. Mother's Magazine.

SCENE IN THE SLAVE MARKET AT NEW ORLEANS.

The following sketch is by one of the popular writers of the day. Notwithstanding the heartless style in which it is written, it exhibits some of the horrors and realities of those scenes where human beings are sold like brutes.

I could not help feeling deeply interested in the fate of one young woman, who, with a child about two years old in her arms, was placed upon the stand, and offered to the highest bidder. She was very sprucely dressed in a dark bombazine gown, which set off her waist and shoulders to great advantage while the apron in front whiter than the new-fallen snow, greatly heightened her appearance: the abundance of lace knots and ribbons, somewhat coquettishly displayed on a cap of similar whiteness, spoke volumes in favor of her former mistress' liberality; and as for the child, the very picture of a thriving little vagabond, spoiled by coaxing and comfitures, he looked as though he would snap his fingers at the whole white creation, the Great Mogul not excepted. The auctioneer was profuse in his commendations of the womans qualities; the list was as a welch pedigree, which is saying a great deal. He praised her character in general terms, and shadowed forth both the perfections of her mind and her body, in a manner that would have reflected credit on the most accomplished inditer of novels that ever handled a goosequill. After this preamble, no one being willing to bid, he put the lot up—mother, child lace cap and all, at one hundred and fifty dollars! Then the tug of war was commenced.

"Two hundred dollars!" screamed out a swarthy looking individual from the crowd, probably an agent for some other establishment.

"Gentlemen," said the auctioneer, I am offered two hundred dollars for this excellent lot; deux cent gourdes! Why bless me! the mother alone is worth a thousand—not a picayune less; elle en vau au moins mille. And then look at that boy! Dans quelque ans il sera fort comme un lion ce gamin la?" And so he went on with astonishing volubility of tongue, sometimes flowery, frequently witty, and every now and then interlarding his sentences with a due mixture of French and Spanish, as the case in his opinion seemed to require.

"Four hundred dollars!" at last bawled out another voice.

"Thank you, sir," observed again the knight of the hammer. "That's what I call driving into the marrow of the subject at once. You show your good sense, sir,; on voit que vous y connoissez. Four hundred dollars I am oid, gentlemen; but that's a trifle not worth speaking about. It is like—"

"Four hundred and fifty!"

"That's better; that shows a decided improvement; but still it is not like—Amanda Mix, step forward a little; there, set the child down, and let the gentlemen see how firm you stand on your cornstalks! There is a beautiful picture! You need not blush, Amanda, (a shout of laughter, in which the ebony beauty joined,) you deserve the compliment. Why, gentlemen, there has not been so splendid a lot as this in the market within my recollection; she is—"

"Five hundred dollars!"

* * * * * * * *

"Sir, I hope you will get the lot; you deserve it, sir, you have evinced a proper spirit of appreciation. But, as I was saying Amanda Mix, where is your certificate?" (Here the lady pulled out a neatly folded slip of paper from her bosom, and good humoredly handed it to the auctioneer.)—"Gentlemen, listen to this instructive document: This is to certify that Amanda Mix, is a most excellent servant, always obedient, and never grumbles, is seldom sick, and is exceedingly fond of children."

Here the auctioneer gently passed his hand behind the knowledge-box of both mother and son, and having ascertained the fact to his own entire satisfaction, triumphantly exclaimed, "Philoprogenitiveness strongly developed in both!" then proceeded with a swelling catalogue of the fair Amanda's virtues.

"She is moreover a christian and an accomplished cook; understands the art of baking and needle work, and is generally useful in every thing. Gentlemen, you now have before you a sworn affidavit of this woman's extraordinary qualities; will no one bid more than—

"Six hundred and fifty dollars!"

"Really, sir, you surpass yourself; indeed you do. I shall always have one eye on you when something really choice comes in the market. Gentlemen, remember what a blessing it is to have a sober and well contented woman about your wives and daughters, on whose unblemished character you can so entirely rely! Gentlemen, is it not for the sake of—"

"Six hundred and seventy dollars!"

"Gentlemen, the matter is drawing to a close; allons courage encore une foi! Six hundred and seventy dollars for a woman that can supply the place of a cook, nursery maid, lady's maid, and maid of all work! A woman who has never had—"

"Seven hundred dollars!"

"I see you are determined to have them sir! Providence smiles upon you! they are worth at least twice the money on a rainy day! A woman that—did I hear you say seven hundred and fifty? No? then I wish I had—that's all; for it goes against my conscience to let my friend here get them on such easy terms; it is a terrible sacrifice, sir; but it is getting late, and unless some one bids quick, I shall have to knock them down if the were to get up again. Seven hundred dollars only for this spiend lot! will no one bid more? Gentlemen, have you lost your voices? Once, twice, seven hundred dollars! Must I knock them down for seven hundred and fifty? Go-o-ing—go—"

I was gone myslf before he had time to accomplish his brutal threat; for, however reconciled I might have been to the mother's undergoing that heartless operation, I had no heart to see the helpless infant, albeit obnoxious to my sympathies, exposed to so cruel an ordeal.

A SUBDUED TEMPER—EXAMPLE OF ROGER SHERMAN.—Roger Sherman was naturally possessed of strong passions; but over these he obtained an extraordinary control. He became habitually calm, sedate and self-possessed. He was one of those men who are not ashamed to maintain the forms of religion in his family.—One morning, he called them together, as usual, to lead them in prayer to God; the 'old family Bible' was brought out and laid on the table. Mr. Sherman took his seat, and beside him placed one of his children a small child—a child of his old age; the rest of the family were seated round the room; several of these were now grown up. Besides these, some of the tutors of the college were boarders in his family, and were present at the time alluded to. His aged and now superannuated mother occupied a corner of room, opposite the place where the distinguished judge of Cincinnatti sat. At length, he opened the Bible and began to read. The child, which was seated beside him, made some little disturbance, upon which Mr. Sherman paused and told it to be still. Again he proceeded; but again he paused, to reprimand the little offender, whose playful disposition would scarcely permit it to be still. At this time, he gently tapped his ear. The blow, if it might be called a blow, caught the attention of his aged mother; who now, with some effort, rose from her seat, and crossed the room. At length she reached the chair of Mr. Sherman, and, in a moment most unsuspected to him, she gave him a blow on the ear with all the power she could summon. "THERE," said she, "YOU STRIKE YOUR CHILD, AND I WILL STRIKE MINE!"

"For a moment the blood was seen rushing to the face of Mr. Sherman! but was ONLY for a moment, when all was calm and mild as usual. He paused—he raised his spectacles—he cast his eye upon his mother—again it fell upon the book, from which he had been reading. Not a word escaped him; but again he calmly pursued the service, and soon after sought in prayer an ability to set an example before his household, which should be worthy of their imitation. Such a victory was worth more than the proudest victory ever achieved in the field of battle.

Sir Isaac Newton's temper, it is said, was so equal and mild, that no accident could disturb it; a remarkable instance of which is related as follows: Sir Isaac had a favorite little dog which he called diamond. Being one evening called out of his study into the next room, Diamond was left behind. When Sir Isaac returned, having been absent but a few minutes, he had the mortification to find that Diamond had overset a lighted candle among some papers, the nearly finished labor of twenty years, which soon were in flames, and almost consumed to ashes. This loss, as Sir Isaac was then far advanced in years, was IRREPARABLE; yet without once striking the dog, he only rebuked him with this exclamation: O, Diamond! Diamond! you little know the mischief you have done!" —Chr. Fam. Mag.

MATTHIAS AND THE INDIAN.—A few years since, that notorious deceiver, Matthias, made his appearance one evening at the door of Keokuk's (chief of a neighboring tribe) 'waikeop' or cabin. He wore a long beard, which was parted on each side of his chin, a long gun was on his shoulder, and a red sash around his waist.—Keokuk demanded who he was, to which question he replied that he was Jesus Christ, the only true God, and that he was come to gather the Indians, who were of the seed of Israel. "Well," says Keokuk, who is a very dignified man, "perhaps you are Jesus Chris, and perhaps you are not. If you are Jesus Christ, you cannot be killed. If you are not Jesus Christ, you are a rascal, and I deserve to be shot. Look at these two fine rifle pistols; they were made in New York; they never miss their aim. Now see me sound them with the ramrod. The have a tremendously heavy charge. Now I point them them at you. Now I am going to fire." At this Matthias suddenly bolted, being unwilling that his claims should be tested by so novel and striking a mode of theological argument.

THE GENTLEMAN AT CHURCH may be known by the following marks:

1. Comes in good season, so as neither to interrupt the pastor nor congregation by a late arrival.

2. Does not stop on the steps or in the portico, either to gape at the ladies, salute friends, or display his colloquial powers.

3 Opens and shuts the door gently, and walks deliberately up the aisle or gallery stairs, and gets to his seat as quietly, and by making as few people remove as possible.

4. Takes his seat either in the back part of the seat, or steps out into the aisle when any one wishes to pass in, and never thinks of such a thing as making people crowd past him while keeping his place in the seat.

5. Is always attentive to strangers, and gives up his seat to such; seeking another for himself.

6. Never thinks of defiling the house of God with tobacco spittle, or annoying those who sit near him by chewing that nauseous weed in church.

7. Never, unless in cases of illness, gets up and goes out in in time of service. but if necessity compels him to do so, goes so quietly that his very manner is an apology for the act.

8. Does not engage in conversation before commencement of service.

9. Does not whisper, or laugh, or eat fruit in the house of God.

10. Does not rush out of church like a tramping horse the moment the benediction is pronounced, but retires slowly, in a noiseless, quiet manner.

11. Does all he can by precept and example to promote decorum in others.

ANECDOTE.—A good story is going the rounds of the news-papers, about a man in New York, who had a singular passion for buying quantities of second-handed furniture, and any other articles, at auction, that were sold cheap, whether he had actual use for them or not and therefore dear at any price. Having filled his house with useless and antiquated articles, his wife, a prudent and careful woman annoyed at his extravagance, very quietly, and without consulting him, "took the responsibility" of sending a quantity of the useless truck to an auction room to be sold. Great was her dismay and astonishment, when on the evening of a sale, a large majority of the things came back to the house. Her husband had unfortunately stumbled into the auction room, and not recognizing his own furniture, had purchased it at better bargains than at first!

The French Atlantic Steamers.—The Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer says:—"The fourteen French Trans-Atlantic steamer, of 450 horse power, are in forwardness; three have been launched, the rest, it is believed, will be ready for sea in the course of next year. Four besides, of 220, are on the stocks.—Twelve years ago the French steam navigation was scarcely worth mention. At present, there are thirty-five vessels from 400 to 220 horse power, twenty-two of 160 or thereabouts, and nine of lower number. The Ministry or Department of Finance emplys, or rather pays, ten steam packets; the Ministry of War is constructing ten steamboats as transports, in which the soldiers will enjoy special accommodation. The whole number of boats of different dimension employed by private or company enterprise, is given at three hundred."

THE GREAT WONDERS IN TAE WORLD.—It has, for ages, been a mystery in the minds of men, that such vast quantities of water as are constantly flowing into the Dead Sea, from the river Jordan and many smaller streams, should not fill up this lake and cause it to overflow; and the only manner in which the phenomenon could be consistently accounted for, was by supposing the Dead Sea had some subterranean outlet, through which its water escaped to the ocean. But even this supposition has become wholly invalidated by the result of observations taken by a committee of English gentlemen, by which this lake is proved to be 1400 feet below the level of the Mediterranean! The plains surrounding this lake are thus proved to be the lowest lands on the face of the earth. We have hopes that as civilization is progressing in that country, this subject will be further investigated, and that even the bottom of this lake will be in some measure explored, by means of the most perfect diving bell, and other sub-marine apparatus.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To Families and Invalids.

THE following indispensable family remedies may be found at the village drug stores, and soon at every country store in the state. Stokes, Job Vanhorn, Deacon; James Simpson, Clerk; Job Vanhorn, James Simpson, Wm. Fenton, Messengers. Communion 1st Sabbath in June, and once in three months.

Adjourned to meet at 9 o'clock to-morrow morning, and spend an hour in prayer; prayer by Elder P. Davis.

Sixth-day morning, met agreeable to adjournment. After spending an hour in prayer, went into the business of the Association. The corresponding letter was brought forward, read and approved—the circular letter was brought forward, read and approved.

Resolved, That Elder P. Davis, A. Bond and D. Loofborough, be a Committee to report on the state of Religion.

Resolved, That Jacob D. Maxson, Caleb Ayres and Job Kennedy, be a Committe to arrange the preaching hours during the course of this meeting.

Resolved, That Joshua Hill be Treasurer.

Resolved, That R. C. Bond, be Corresponding Secretary.

Resolved, That Wm. F. Randolph, write the circular letter.

Resolved, That L. A. Davis, write the corresponding letter.

Resolved, That L. D. Ayres and R. C. Bond be our delegates to the next General Conference.

Resolved, That L. A. Davis be our delegate to the next Western Association, and J. Hill be his alternate.

Resolved, That the delegates to the next General Conference, have an order on the Treasurer for the available funds in his hands, to defray their expenses.

Resolved, That it be the duty of the Treasurer, upon application of the members of the Pike church, to refund to such individuals the amount unexpended and in his hands, as such individuals have heretofore paid into the Treasury, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the delegates heretofore appointed, to attend the Western Association.

Met agreeable to adjournment.

It is the opinion of this Association, that the wants of our churches require the constant labor of a missionary in the bounds of this Association, therefore,

Resolved, That we recommend earnestly to our churches, the adoption of some efficient measures to keep a missionary constantly laboring within the bounds of this Association, and that the delegates be requested to present this resolution to their respective churches.

Resolved, That L. D. Ayres, R. C. Bond, L. A. Davis, J. Hill and D. Loofborough be a Committee to draft a plan for missionary operations within the bounds of this Association, and forward it for consideration before the adjournment of the present session.

A letter was forwarded from Lost Creek church, requesting the ordination of Richard C. Bond to the Gospel Ministry.

Resolved, That this request be referred to the Presbytery.

Resolved, That this Association appoint an Agent, whose business shall be to preach the doctrine that we hold, relative to the Sabbath, whenever proper opportunity shall offer, and that Br. Joshua Hill be our Agent.

Whereas, it is proposed by the Agent of the Seventh-day Baptist General Tract Society, to publish a quantity of tracts upon the subject of the weekly Sabbath—

Resolved, That this Association recommend to the churches and brethren comprising this Association, to lend their cooperation, by giving their support to its operation.

Resolved, That we adjourn to meet First-day morning, at 8 o'clock; prayer by Eld. P. Davis.

The Association met First-day morning. agreeable to adjournment; prayer by Elder P. Davis.

The committee on missionary operations reported as follows:

Your committee in drafting a plan, propose that the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars be raised by the churches comprising this Association; one fourth of which shall be cash, and the rest in such trade as the missionary needs, at the market price, and that a committee called an Executive Committee, shall be appointed by this Association, whose duty it shall be to apportion to each church their respective shares, proportioned to the number of members thereof; and also shall have authority to employ a missionary for said sum or less, to labor for the term of one year, and also it shall be the duty of this committee to correspond with the churches of this Association, and have the field occupied as soon as practicable. And also that this plan provides that the churches shall each appoint an agent, whose duty it shall be to receive and pay the missionary employed, the sum contributed by said churches, and further, this plan provides that the churches shall pay one fourth of the sum (which they agree to,) quarterly into the hands of their agent, to be paid into the hands of said missionary, when he shall present an order from the Executive Committee—and further, this plan provides that the agents appointed by said churches, shall be entitled to a written receipt for the sum paid to the order of the Executive Committee. And also, this plan provides that the committee shall have the supervision of the affairs of the mission, and make a report to the next Association.

Resolved, That this report be adopted, and printed with the minutes.

Whereas, this Association passed a resolution at its last session, that it sustain the cause of Temperance, as advocated by its friends in the United States—

Resolved, Therefore, that this Association recommend to their Ministers, that they lecture on temperance, at least once in twelve months, within its bounds.

Resolved, That the Secretaries furnish Elder J. Hill with a copy of the resolution appointing him an agent to preach the doctrinal views we hold, relative to the weekly Sabbath.

Adjourned to meet at 4 o'clock P. M.; benediction by L. A. Davis.

We the committee, report the following:—

After examining the several churches by letter, as far as we have received them relative to the state of religion, we find that Stokes township church is enjoying much of the outpouring of the spirit of God, while the other churches complain of apathy; but have cause to rejoice that there is a good degree of union existing among them, and steadfastness of faith, and an inflexible reliance on God.

Resolved, That this report be adopted.

Whereas the Pike township church have by a vote, rent themselves from this Association,

Resolved, Therefore, that Elder P. Davis and L. D. Ayres, be a committee to visit, enquire the cause, and admonish the brethren of said church, and report to the next Association.

Resolved, That Abel Bond 2d, Levi H. Bond and Wm. F. Randolph, be the Executive Committee for the ensuing year, to carry out the measures as proposed for employing a missionary within the bounds of this Association.

Resolved, That when this Association adjourn, it adjourn to meet with the Lost Creek Church, Va., Fourth-day before the third Sabbath in October, 1843, at 10 o'clock A. M.

Resolved, That we express our thanks to the First-day Baptist brethren at this place, for the free and liberal use we have enjoyed of their commodious meeting-house, during the present session of this Association.

Resolved, That this Association recommend to each individual member of its churches, that in common conversation they use the word Sabbath, and not the word Saturday, on any occasion, except for sake of explanation.

Resolved, That the Secretaries revise and send on the minutes of this Association, with the corresponding and circular letters for publication in the Seventh-day Baptist Register.

Adjourned to meet this evening, at the call of the Moderator.

Met agreeable to adjournment.

The minutes were read and approved.

Resolved, That we adjourn to meet at Lost Creek, as above mentioned; concluding prayer by Abel Bond.

The ordination of Br. R. C. Bond, took place First-day. Appropriate discourse by Elder L. A. Davis, from Matt. ix. 37—38, The harvest truly is plenteous, &c. Consecrating prayer by Elder P. Davis; charge by Elder L. A. Davis; right hand of fellowship by Elder J. Hill; benediction by the candidate.

Preaching through the course of the meeting as follows:

Fifth-day evening by R. C. Bond, from Col. iii. 1—2, If ye then be risen with Christ, &c. Sixth-day by Thomas Babcock, from Deut. xxxii. 47, For it is not a vain thing, &c. In the evening, by Elder P. Davis, from John xv. 12, This is my commandment, &c. Sabbath morning, 11 o'clock, Elder L. A. Davis, from Matt. ix. 6, But that ye may know, &c., followed by L. D. Ayres, from Heb. iii. 1, Wherefore holy brethren, &c. In the evening by Elder S. Babcock, from Isaiah xxxii. 1—2, Behold a king shall reign in righteousness, &c. First-day evening, Elder R. C. Bond, from Romans viii. 1, There is therefore now no condemnation, &c.

CIRCULAR LETTER.

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN:—Through the beneficence of a merciful Providence, we are again permitted to assemble in our associated capacity. Another year has passed, and with it many have been brought by the cold hand of death, to realize the unalterable laws of eternity, while we have been spared to meet again, to enquire after the prosperity of the Church of our kind Redeemer. May the good spirit of the great head of the church, preside over our hearts, and guide us in all our deliberations. In the review of our Association during the year past, though we have reason to mourn that we have been so deficient in the cause of our Redeemer; yet we have cause to rejoice and praise the Lord for his goodness, in manifesting his saving grace in bringing sinners into the fold of Christ, and stirring up his people in some parts of the connection, while others have embraced the Sabbath of the Bible, and have become fellow helpers with us. And seeing God makes use of his people as instruments in saving sinners, and in building up his kingdom in the world.

And while other denominations are laboring for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, shall we not take hold with more zeal and energy in the good work? Have we not the truth to hold forth to the world, which others do not? The Savior has taught us to pray, "thy kingdom come," again, "pray ye the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth more laborers into his harvest."

This well considered, we will learn two thing; first, that it is the order of heaven, to realize its blessings, we must pray. And second, for what we must pray, in order that the kingdom of Christ might bebuilt up in the world. That his laborers, chosen of God, possessing the principles of Christ and fully authorized by the church, to be laborers in God's vineyard, for the building up of his kingdom, and that our prayer be continually, to bless their labors—our lives corresponding therewith—that by our conduct we do not counteract our prayers.—Being mindful that we are not our own, but bought with a price; consequently all we possess is his, and should be used for the advancement of truth and right in the world. It will be seen that at the last sitting of the General Conference, a committee was chosen to devise the best plan for our missionary operations. And we think it would be well for us to consider the subject, and be ready to act in concert with the denomination.

Our Eastern and Central Associations are beginning to be more engaged in enforcing the Sabbath of the Bible—and we think it of vital importance to holy religion that we have a Sabbath, and that we observe the one God has given us. And as this makes us singular from other denominations, we should be engaged in the defense of the truth. But in order to do good, we must be very humble and exercise the spirit of meekness, and be strict observers of the Sabbath as is enjoined in Isaiah lviii. 13, If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day, &c.; then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord, and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places, &c.

In view of our singularity, the eyes of the world are upon us; therefore it becomes us to walk with great circumspection, and stand opposed to every evil work and custom of the world, that operates against the kingdom of Christ, especially the sin of intemperance, which is a powerful means in the hands of the enemy, in opposing the cause of Christ; rendering mankind most wretched and miserable on earth—engulphing its tens of thousands of precious souls into unutterable and irrecoverable ruin.—Let us therefore, cast our influence on the side of reform, and be studiously engaged for the downfall of the kingdom of darkness. Let us patronize every institution that has for its object, the glory of God, and good of mankind—that we may be faithful stewards of our master, and be found with the faithful at his coming, which may the Lord grant.

CORRESPONDING LETTER.

The South-Western Association, to the Sister Associations.

DEAR BRETHREN:—We feel that we cannot be too grateful to God, for the blessed privilege of associating ourselves in another Association. The representation is tolerably full, but we regret that we are not favored with the presence of delegates from any of our sister Associations. Although the state of religion in most of the churches, does not sustain that degree of zeal and activity which we would desire, yet the general firmness of our churches, and the particular manifestations of mercy bestowed on some, fill us with encouragement,—and we are determined, through the assisting grace of God, to live and die in his service.

And in conclusion, suffer us to say to our brethren and sisters in the Lord, let us walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called—let us endeavor to grow in grace, that we may be more spirited in our lives, and be more and more assimilated to the image of our blessed Redeemer, that our light may shine before the men, that they may see our good works, and glorify our Father which is in Heaven. We desire an interest in your prayers—and may the God of grace and mercy, grant us overcoming faith, that we may win the race, obtain the crown, and enter into the full fruition of glory above, through our blessed Redeemer. Amen.

Religious Department.

WHICH WILL YOU CHOOSE?

The mind of man cannot be governed by opposite principles. A worldly temper, that is, a disposition to prefer worldly satisfactions and advantages to our immortal interests, has been justly called the essential soul, the living principle of evil. A heavenly disposition, which is implanted by the Divine Spirit, is the sole spring of genuine piety. These two principles can never harmonize. It is a vain task to aim at impossibilities. If you will be a friend of the world, you must be an enemy to God. To think that a worldly spirit can produce the effects of true religion, is as absurd as to think of making fire freeze, or ice burn. Where your treasure is, said Christ, there will your heart be also. If you can move a body at the same moment towards the east & west, you may reconcile sordid gain and sincere godliness, or at once cleave to the dust, and set your affections on things above. Is it not truly astonishing, that any should repeatedly make the foolish and fruitless attempt? But that conduct which would be thought to betray insanity in other things, often gains credit in religious matters. We should consider that man a lunatic or an idiot, who labored to make day-light and thick darkness dwell together, or perpetually wearied himself in trying to make a balance stand even, while feathers were put in one scale, and large masses of lead thrown into the other. It is the positive declaration of infallable truth, that no man can serve two masters, for either he will love the one and hate the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon. These masters have not one will and one end. Their authority widely differs; their commands continually clash.

What is the religion of worldly men?—It matters little in what party or denomination they choose to be classed. "They sacrifice to their net, and burn incense to their drag; because by them their portion is made fat, and their meat plenteous," Hab. i. 16. Whatever brings them gain, wins their homage. If it be trade, the counting-house is their closet, and the leger their Bible. If it be usury, the bank is their temple, and their feelings are regulated by the rise and fall of stocks. If it be politics, the newspaper is their guide and companion, the statesman their guardian genius, and the paradise for which they long is the court, rich in places, pensions, titles, and honors. While they are either trafficking in the mart of business, or bowing bare-headed at the great man's door, they have but one end in view. Their anxieties, petitions, adorations and vows, though varied by circumstances, have the same low origin and secular stamp. In a word, they have the creed of Balaam, and the devotion of Demas.

It appears then clearly impossible to serve God and Mammon. And do you waver in uncertainty and doubt which to prefer? How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord is God, if his authority is supreme, if his favor is better than life, then serve him; but if the Bible be false, if a future state be only the dream of enthusiasm, if your riches and delights can fully satisfy, then serve Mammon. It is surely necessary to settle speedily a point which is the very hinge on which your wo or welfare turns. Your best interests are at stake. It is high time to determine a question which involves in it consequences of eternal moment. Let me, however, faithfully and earnestly urge upon you the Divine command: "Love not the world, neither the things of the world; if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." Will you now be a slave of Mammon, or a servant of God? Do you choose a portion below, or an inheritance above? O may you see and prefer, like Mary, the better! May you resolve to cleave to the Lord with full purpose of heart.—Sears' Bible Biography.

A BOATMAN'S OPINION.—Last Sabbath, as several boatmen were seated together in the shade, engaged in conversation on the subject of Sabbath desecration, one of them was heard to say, 'The owners of these lines that oblige their men to run their boats on the Sabbath, will be damned at any rate.' This was doubtless a very profane and irreligious man, and yet, who can say there is not much reason to fear that what he said will prove true, in the end. It certainly becomes those boat and vessel owners, and forwarders, to be solemn and attentive hearers, when the men in their employ, whom they oblige to work on the Sabbath, preach sermons like this, and especially when so well supported by the Bible.—Bethel Flag.

The ideas of Christian theology are too simple for eloquence, too sacred for fiction, and too majestic for ornament; to recommend them by tropes and figures, is to magnify, by a concave mirror, the sidereal hemisphere.—Dr. Johnson.

RESOLUTION.—There is nothing in man so potential for weal or woe, as firmness of purpose. Resolution is almost omnipotent. Sheridan was at first timid, and obliged to sit down in the midst of a speech. Convinced of, and mortified at the cause of his failure, he said one day to a friend, 'It is in me, and it shall come out.' From that moment he rose and shone, and triumphed in a consummate eloquence. Here was true moral courage. And it was well observed by a heathen moralist, that it is not because things are difficult that we dare not undertake them, but they appear difficult because we dare not undertake them. Be then bold in spirit. Indulge no doubts, for doubts are traitors. In the practical pursuit of our high aim, let us never lose sight of it in the slightest instance; for it is more by a disregard of small things, than by open and flagrant offences, that men come short of excellence.

There is always a right and a wrong; and if you ever doubt, be sure you take not the wrong. Observe this rule, and every experience will be to you a means of advancement.

It was a wise speech of Charles the 5th to the Duke of Venice, who when he had showed him the glory of his princely palace, and earthly paradise, instead of admiring it, or him for it, only returned him this grave and serious memento—"Hæc sunt quæ faciunt invitos mori," "These are the things which make us unwilling to die."—It is a double death to him who is alive to the world to part with it.

Children's Department.

THE AGED WOMAN.—Never despise the aged; if their manners seem to be disagreeable, remember they have had much to try their feelings and perplex their minds; remember they are almost friendless—and there are few to whom they can open their hearts. They have no children to protect them—to sympathize in their sorrows, or to bestow upon them the necessaries of life. In fine, treat them just as you would wish to be treated, if you should grow old and be left in destitute circumstances.

We respect and love an aged woman—and when poor and despised, we respect and love her the more. As with downcast eye she walks the streets, she seems to feel the loneliness of her situation. The companions of her youth—those who once loved her—her parents, her brothers, her sisters, have all gone before her, and still she lingers, still striving to obtain her daily food and be kept from the poor house. Who does not love an aged lady? We should not forget that our mothers—our dear and honored mothers—are growing old. They will soon need much care and attention. What if we should die and leave them alone to the scorn of the world? Such a thought would plant with sorrows a dying bed. Perhaps the aged ladies of our acquaintance have had sons and daughters who have all been called away before them. If so, much more do they need our care and our sympathy. The young lady, or the young man even, who treats with contempt an aged matron, is unworthy of a place in decent society, and would forsake a poor mother, solely because infirmity and poverty had overtaken her. If there is punishment in a future world, it will fall the heaviest upon that soul who turns a deaf ear to the cries of the infirm, or with a contemptuous frown, spurns the aged matron from his door. Love, protect, cherish the old women around you, and give them no occasion to say, in the language of the poet—

> I have lived long enough; my way of life
> Is fallen in the sere, the yellow leaf;
> And that which should accompany old age,
> As honor, love, obedience, troops of friends,
> I must not look to have; but in their stead,
> Curses, not loud, but deep, mouth-honor, breath,
> Which the poor heart would fain deny, but dare not.

By honoring age, by endeavoring to smooth their pillow of adversity and cheer their adverse paths, you do that which elevates human nature, and is well pleasing in the sight of high Heaven. And if you grow old, you will not be left in sorrow, for scorn to point her finger at, but like the sun after his journey is over, as he sinks in the west, and appears more full and glorious, so bright will be the evening of your days, harbinger of a blessed state of existence beyond the tomb.—Portland Tribune.

SABBATH SCHOOLS, AND THE PUBLIC WORSHIP OF GOD.—It was Sabbath morning—cold, boisterous, and snowy. A Christian father who lived about four miles from the house of God, was quietly composing himself to stay at home.

'Father,' said his son, a lad some eight summers old, 'are you going to meeting this morning?'

'No, child, it is too rough.'

'Oh, father! what shall I do? If you do not go I cannot get to Sunday School to-day, and I shall be so sorry!'

The father sat thoughtfully a few moments. His child's earnestness roused him. If my child would go, I ought to go too, he thought, and jumping up he fixed his sleigh, and when the man of God stood in the sacred desk, that family sat cheerfully in their pew.

Reader! behold the influences of Sabbath Schools on public worship. If you are a teacher, be in earnest to have your schools continued through the winter months.—S. S. Messenger.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, November 16, 1842.

Revenge.

The spirit of this wicked world under the infliction of injuries, cries revenge. The depraved heart calls for revenge; and even the Christian, forgetful of his high calling, sometimes when enemies are numerous and slanders are rife, undertakes to avenge himself. But the Christian, under the influence of the spirit of Christ, remembers that it is written, "vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord." In this single thing, Christians do sometimes most seriously wound the cause of piety. Let them take the exhortation of scripture, "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves." How beautiful is the Christian character when exemplified in all its meekness and glory. He who patiently endures and freely forgives, and never inflicts or revenges an injury, is a spectacle of admiration and a pattern of excellence, no where to be found but among the sincere followers of the meek and lowly Lamb of God. The Christian has nobler business to attend to, than to avenge himself. He is a witness for Christ and his Gospel, and the labor entrusted to him, is to show forth the divine excellency of religion in all its features. This he does, by possessing the mind of Christ and following his example. Christ forgave and did not avenge himself. Christians are to show their union with him, by patiently enduring the vile slanders of those who would rise against them. But when they descend to contend about worldly matters and engage in strife, they forsake Christ and dishonor his religion.

"Men of Israel, Help."

As in the days of the Apostles, so men now who are unreconciled to God, possess a hatred to religion and religious teachers, that prompts them to band together to oppose them. Paul could not be permitted to remain in the temple like others, to signify the accomplishment of the days of purification, without exciting the Jews so much, that they stirred up the people against him, crying out, "Men of Israel, help."—If a Christian now, moved by love to the souls of men and zeal for his Master's cause, is fearless and untiring in rebuking sin and persuading men to be reconciled to God, he is almost sure to be met with an organized opposition. The enemy at any time, can marshall his hosts in opposition to truth. And it requires but little to stir up the unregenerate heart to determined opposition. These facts are worthy of consideration, as indicative of a prospect of usefulness. Satan is earnest to strengthen his forces, whenever the spirit or word of God is likely to induce repentence in sinners.

When the Christian sees men enraged against religion, calling upon each other to help, it is then time for him to awake and call upon God, and let there be a strife for God and religion. The Christian is never called upon to quail before opposition and flee before the enemy, but he is commanded to be strong and arm himself with the whole armor of God, and live and die in defense of the truth. At all times, is the soldier of the cross to be doing battle against sin, but he is specially called upon to exert himself when God and religion are opposed, and men blaspheme and despise the name of Jesus. The sinner contends with carnal weapons, and in every effort he maks to resist truth, or despoil it of its glory, he is compelled to use unholy weapons. But the weapons of the Christian warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God. Here is the inequality of the combat. While the sinner moved by the arch deceiver, contends with unholy weapons for an unholy purpose, the Christian planted on the eternal principles of right, stands forth in the name of God to contend for truth, and for the undying interests of the soul. And well may Christians contend earnestly, for their labor is not for a perishable reward, but to secure the favor of God and the salvation of the soul. Let Christians then, awake and labor as best they may, to reclaim those who are opposed to God. "For our God is a consuming fire," and they who contend against him or his truth, must fall beneath his rod. Satan is all the time strengthening his kingdom and hardening men in infidelity—sinners join hand in hand in iniquity and confirm each other in their sins, and shall not Christians be as much more active as their cause is better, and the end to be obtained more glorious? The arm of the Lord is strong and it shall get him the victory, and the name that men despise shall be set on high, and he who is rejected of men, shall reign in righteousness, and subdue all those who would not have him rule over them.

ERRATA.—An unusual number of typographical errors, may be found in last week's paper. We trust the good sense of the reader will correct them. As an apology, we would say that the "proof reader" worked off the paper in a great hurry, on account of the election.

ELECTION.—We have received as yet, but partial returns. Enough is known to render it certain that Bouck is elected by something near 20,000 majority. The vote on Governor, is probably a fair specimen of the votes given for other officers.

Nelson on Infidelity.

We have never been better pleased with the perusal of any work, than the above named. The author, Dr. Nelson, was several years a decided infidel, and has a perfect knowledge of the "cause and cure of infidelity." He represents ignorance and depravity, as the cause of infidelity. Every one who will take the pains to carefully read his work, will readily assent to the statement as true. Almost every man's observation teaches him this fact, that infidels abound most among the ignorant and depraved. A mere moiety of modern infidels, if indeed any, are in any degree acquainted with the word of God, and however well informed they may be on other subjects, on this, they exhibit most culpable ignorance. Young sprigs of infidelity, occasionally prophecy the destruction of the Christian religion, thereby showing themselves entirely ignorant of its character. Who is there that has once opened his eyes, that does not know that the church has been increasing and extending itself, and that God's word is pledged for its triumph? Having shown beyond contradiction, that ignorance and depravity are the cause of infidelity, the author proposes a cure, viz, knowledge and obedience. A candid examination of the evidences of Christianity, will in almost, if not quite every case, effect a cure. But should this fail, obedience to the will of God will never fail. We cordially invite any who may be inclined to scepticism, to examine the arguments pro and con, before he decides. We invite every Christian to read Nelson's Cause and Cure of Infidelity. We invite every parent to place it in his childrens' hands. This may be done for the trifling sum of fifty cents, and it may, and doubtless will be in many cases, worth more than gold and silver in untold sums. Read it, one and all.

The New Village Grave-Yard.

MR. EDITOR.—You will recollect, as will also your readers, that in the spring of 1841, considerable was said in regard to the propriety of opening a new Village Grave-Yard, as the old one was nearly filled. A lot in the rear of the S. D. B. Meeting-house was supposed to be very suitable for the purpose, and was to be had very cheap, as was supposed, for that purpose. In the mean time, an infant, the joy and solace of its parents, was taken by the cruel hand of Death, and its remains were deposited, solitary and alone, in the New Grave-Yard; it was the first inhabitant of this newly-consecrated Charnel-house of Death.

Time passed on, and soon a Revolutionary soldier and his consort departed this life, and their sleeping dust now rests near by the grave of this little infant. And, yet a little while, and another hero of the Revolution follows in the footsteps of his predecessors to this new resting-place for the dead. And still on, the Scarlet Fever, that awful scourge to the rising generation, makes dire havoc in the families of some young parents, and they lay side by side four, of their lovely offspring in the new Village Grave-Yard.

Well, a subscription was now circulated, and lots were taken up to an amount, it was supposed, sufficient to pay for the whole, and secure a title. But time passes on, and nothing is done to secure a title to the lot. And now, shall the hearts of those be wrung two-fold, by seeing their new-made graves ploughed over, who, in all confidence supposed when they committed the dust of their offspring, and their parents, and their friends to the embrace of the new Village Grave-Yard, that it would in due season be secured for the purpose? Or, shall they be compelled to disturb the ashes of those they love, and remove them to some other place, all for the want of a little systematic action? I hope the better feelings of our friends, who have in good faith buried their dead in the new Grave-Yard, may not be torn and crushed afresh in their feelings by either of the above alternatives.

A very trifle of systematic action on the part of our citizens, will serve to secure the new Grave-Yard from intrusion by those who would trample it under foot, and up-turn the green grass which covers the dust of some noble departed spirits. Let there be a public meeting, and let those who have subscribed for lots,—and especially those who have buried their friends there,—attend, and all may be secured from the ravages of the plough, or whatever else would intrude itself upon the resting-place of the dead. Will the subscribers move in this matter? or, have they no interests at stake? Are there no paltry "dollars and cents" to call them to action in this matter? Or, do they expect always to remain upon the face of the earth, and will therefore need no burial-place, where the "Weeping-Willow" may wave mournfully over their graves, and where the myrtle and the amaranth may be trained and cultured by the hands of those who loved them?

Inconsistency and Presumption.

MR. EDITOR,—Many professed ministers of Jesus Christ, do proclaim from the pulpit and the press, that the fourth commandment, as it was written by the finger of God upon tables of stone, and recorded in the 20th chap. of Exodus, is of universal and perpetual obligation; that it is now binding upon all the nations of the world, and upon every individual. By the moral power of this precept, they are endeavoring to overcome the giant sin of Sabbath profanation. With this precept in their hand, and its language upon their lips, they cry aloud and spare not. With great earnestness and zeal, they reprove the world for living in open violation of its authority. Now, mark their inconsistency and presumption. Having enforced the obligation to obey the precept, upon others, they refuse obedience themselves.—They not only refuse obedience, but presumptuously proceed farther, and mutilate in a most shocking manner, this sacred precept, for which they profess so high a regard. The Supreme law-giver, in the commandment declares that the Seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. They, in opposition, affirm it is not the Sabbath, and will not regard it as such. The command unequivocally prohibits labor on that day. Notwithstanding the prohibition, they presume to labor on that day, and teach others to do the same. Is not this a mutilation of the Divine injunction? Is it possible that those who practice and teach thus, do really believe that the precept is binding upon the present generation, as Jehovah first announced it from Sinai's smoking summit, to the thousands of Israel? If they do not, how inconsistent to make such a profession. But they do make such a profession, and after proving that this ancient precept is binding at the present day upon every one of us, and its observance enforced by the most solemn sanctions, they not only come out in opposition to the section of the law to which I have just referred, but unhesitatingly declare that another important item of this law is not correct. The commandment informs us without the least ambiguity, that the first day of the week is a day for labor, and makes it our duty to secularize it. They, on the contrary, affirm that the first day of the week is the Sabbath, and that it ought not to be secularized. Thus we see, notwithstanding all their professed attachment to the Sabbatic law, they go counter to the written direction of the Great Jehovah, and oppose the Divine enactment, at least in two particulars. If the ancient Sabbatic law is now binding, as it was written by the finger of God upon tables of stone, and recorded in the inspired volume, it is of vast importance that we yield implicit obedience to the sacred injunction. "He that keepeth the law, happy is he." Prov. xxix, 18. May the Lord preserve us from error, and enable us to have respect unto all his commandments.

Profanity.

Among the long catalogue of vices, with which we are surrounded, there is none perhaps, so low and degrading as profanity.—And still, it is surprizing to witness the extent to which this vice prevails in civilized community, and among those who would fain pass themselves off for gentlemen! But there is no mark of a gentleman about that young man who, with all the pomp and majesty of an aristocrat, will swagger out his oaths that would make the heart even of a tyrant tremble; far from it. He would better class himself with the "loafers" and the vulgar black-guard, than with the refined and excellent in society. For the "loafer" chooses such language as is the most disgusting to the refined ear, and hence the profane swearer ought in justice to be classed with the "loafer," in all our associations and intercourses with him.

I rejoice exceedingly, that there is one point where an influence may be brought to bear against this class in community, which may be the means of working a reformation in the rising generation at least. The point I refer to is in the Department of Common Schools. No would-be-gentleman, who is in the habitual use of profane language, can be licensed to teach a District School, however brilliant may be his acquirements otherwise, according to a recent decision of Hon. SAMUEL YOUNG, Superintendent of Common Schools, of the State of New-York. He says, in answer to a correspondent, "I cannot imagine under what construction of law, or code of morality, an individual addicted to habitual profanity, could ever have obtained a certificate as a qualified teacher. But such a certificate having been procured, no matter by what means, I should deem it the imperative duty of any tribunal having the power, to affix upon it, at the earliest moment, the blot of annulment, and if possible of oblivion.

"'Good moral character' is made by the Statute an indispensable requisite to the qualification of a teacher. 'Profane cursing and swearing' is a legal offense, punishable by fine, and in default of payment, by imprisonment. Can ebony be mistaken for topaz? Can 'good moral character' be ascribed to him who 'habitually' puts both the laws of God and man at defiance?" He continues, "I can conceive of nothing more horrible or repulsive than to send innocent little children to a school where they will be taught, either by precept or example, to stammer oaths and lisp profanity. This is to poison the whole stream of life at its very source."

Inspectors of Common Sschools are directed not to license such as are addicted to the low and vulgar vice of profanity, and if any are now known to be guilty in this matter, who hold certificates, the Inspectors are required to annul such certificates immediately. Thus, in accordance with the dictates of humanity and reason, a protecting arm is thrown around the eleven thousand School Districts in this State, and the six hundred thousand children who are annually taught in our District Schools are to be preserved from this foul stain upon the character of a gentleman through the influence of their respective teachers.

This is an honorable step in reforming the profane swearers who would pass for "gentlemen school teachers" throughout our State, and I would that every State might adopt the same rule, in this respect, and profane swearing would soon become unpopular among all who have any respect for their character and influence in society, however reckless they may be in reference to the laws of God. You touch a young man's dollars, and you touch his interest. Dry up this source of profit and employment to the "profane" young man, and you strike an effectual blow at the fountain-head of his prosperity and influence.

BROTHER BAILEY.—I have recently been engaged in a protracted meeting in the village of South Otselic, which was commenced by Elder Wm. Clark, in Cazenovia; but he being obliged to leave in a few days after the meeting commenced, to attend to his pastoral duties, the labors and responsibilities of the meeting devolved upon others. I participated in the duties of "preaching the word," and visiting from house to house, for the term of about four weeks in succession, and was assisted by faithful brethren in the ministry. The Lord by his spirit met with his people, and revived and blessed them in a conspicuous manner; backsliders were reclaimed, and sinners were hopefully converted, and the name of God was praised; for we were convinced it was the "Lord's doings, which were marvellous in our eyes." But while we rejoiced with numbers who professed to have found peace in believing, we regretted to leave those without hope, who like Felix waited for a "convenient season." Some have already been baptized, and we hope others will do likewise.

Another meeting was held a few miles north of that place, which we hear has resulted in the conversion of several souls to God, to whom be ascribed all the praise and power forever.

Yours in the gospel,
S. M. BURDICK.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the New-York Evangelist.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN.

FOURTEEN DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND.

Since our last, the steamers Caledonia and Great Western have arrived, bringing news from Liverpool to the 22d ult. The most important news is the Ratification of the Treaty.

This gratifying event took place on the 14th ult. The London papers do not mention the ratification, but letters have been received by Mr. Webster from our Minister, Mr. Everett, which assert the fact positively.

The promptness with which the British Government has acquiesced in the stipulations of the treaty, in the face of the protestations of a large portion of the English press, and in the face also of the ridicule and taunts of the French and Belgian press, is a conclusive indication of an earnest desire, not only to preserve peace with the United States, but to conciliate our friendship.

Mr. Featherstonhaugh, one of the Commissioners who explored the Northeastern Boundary on the part of Great Britain, in 1840, undertook in an after-dinner speech at Plymouth on last week, to defend the treaty lately concluded between England and the United States. He expresses it as his opinion that the settlement that had been made, was the best for both parties that could be made. He strongly condemned the attacks made upon the terms of the treaty by the English press.

The Manufacturing Districts.—There is no favorable change in the prospects of trade—large masses of the laborious population continue out of employ.

From the manufacturing districts very gloomy reports are received as to the operations of the factories and mills, while the Liverpool Cotton Market remains dull and inactive.

The National Anti-Corn-Law league have determined to organize the whole country, by dividing it into twelve districts, for the purpose of bringing its strength to tell in Parliament.

The Queen.—The reported delicate state of her Majesty's health has become a subject of interest to her loyal subjects, and is confirmed beyond doubt. The little Prince of Wales and his sister are in good health and spirits.

The preliminaries for the marriage of her Royal Highness the Princess Augusta of Cambridge, have been finally arranged, and the nuptial ceremony will take place at no very distant day.

The losses of the corn speculators in England, this harvest, are estimated at £2,000,000 sterling.

English Revenue.—It appears from the official returns, that there is a decrease in the revenue for the quarter ending at the same date last year, of £67,473. But for the Property Tax, the decrease in Taxes would have reached £381,277.

France.

Accounts from the vintage districts represent that the crops, now just about being gathered, are uncommonly abundant in some sections of the country, and will come in in excellent order. In some instances, the vintage has been injured in certain districts of country by destructive storms of rain and hail.

French Revenue.—The favorable state of the French Revenue supplies the leading topic for discussion in the Paris papers. The increase during the first nine months of the year 1842, as compared with the receipts for the same period in the year 1841, amounts to 25,370,000 francs, or about one million sterling.

From the East.

The Sultan of Turkey has accepted the mediation of England and Russia in his difference with Persia.

General Nott has not abandoned the enterprise of reducing Affghanistan, but is marching rapidly to Ghiznee, from which place, after the arrival of troops, he will advance upon Cabul. It is said that negotiations are on foot which would probably put an end to this war.

The attempts to navigate the Euphrates and Tigris by steam, have been abandoned, the impediments to the navigation being found too numerous to overcome.

Abolition of Slavery in Turkey.—Lord Palmerston having complied with the wishes of his anti-slavery friends, by directing the British Ambassador at Constantinople to interpose with the Turkish government some representation on the subject of slavery, received from him the following reply:—

THERAPIA, 27th Dec. 1840.

My Lord:—I have paid the greatest attention to your lordship's several instructions on the subject of slavery in Turkey, with the hopes of arriving at some result that would afford a chance of obtaining in any degree the object your lordship so earnestly desires to accomplish. I have mentioned the subject; and I have heard with astonishment, accompanied with a smile, at a proposition for destroying an institution closely interwoven with the frame of society in this country, and intimately connected with the law and with the habits, and even the religion, of all classes of the people, from the Sultan himself down to the lowest peasant.

The Sultans for some centuries past have never married, and the imperial race is perpetuated by mothers who are slaves.

In all other families slaves may be, and often are, the mothers of legitimatized children, who are in all respects as much esteemed as those of legal wives.

The admirals, the generals, the ministers of state, in great part, have been originally slaves. In most families, a slave enjoys the highest degree of confidence and influence with the head of the house.

To carry what your lordship desires into execution, it will be necessary to limit the law of succession to the crown, and alter the policy that has so long guided the Sultans in that respect, and to change fundamentally the political and civil institutions and laws, and all the domestic arrangements of the people. Universal confusion would, perhaps, be the consequence of such violent changes, and probably those persons intended to be the most benefitted by them would be the greatest sufferers.

I think that all attempts to effect your lordship's purpose will fail, and I fear they might give offense, if urged forward with importunity.

I have, &c. PONSONBY.

News of the Day.

A "Planing Machine for Iron," by Stillman & Co., Novelty Works. A detailed explanation of this master-piece of ingenuity and mechanical skill, would be scarcely possible without diagrams. It combines the following advantages:—The bed is driven by such means as to give to its motion the most perfect uniformity, preventing the least trembling, however deep the 'cut;' the motion of the bed is one-third faster backward than forward; the tool holder (self operating) so constructed as to work in every direction, planing horizontal, vertical inclined, concave and convex surfaces. The method of holding down the bed, of cleaning and oiling the ways, is entirely new. A visit to this machine should not be omitted.

At the farther end of the room, the spectator is brought to an agreeable pause in front of one of Stillman & Co.'s unrivalled steam-engines. This engine, of which we have before spoken, is of twenty-two horse power, yet occupying but little more space than a pianoforte, and answering every requisite of that instrument, excepting music—unless it be the music of graceful motion—for of noise it makes none. Substantial and beautiful as this is, we are assured that it is not above the most ordinary of its pattern produced at that establishment, and that it was but a few days since appointed, from among a number already sold, to fill its present enviable station. Attached to this engine is an adjustible 'expansion valve,' the invention of Horatio Allen, Esq., the able engineer of the Croton Aqueduct Commissioners. Mr. Allen's object has been to obtain for locomotive engines an expansion valve which could be adjusted without stopping—for instance, when the engine is upon an ascending grade, and requiring the maximum effect of the boiler. This object he has well attained.

AWFUL CALAMITY!

SUNDAY, 1 o'clock P. M. Nov. 6.

About 1 o'clock this morning, the Steamboat Vermillion, on her way down the Lake, while at the port of Huron, took fire, and burnt down to the water's edge. The chambermaid and a lady passenger, named Dividson, supposed to be burnt, as nothing can be found of either since.

We are indebted to Captain Wilkison, of the Perry, for this painful intelligence. He says the Vermillion had a large quantity of freight on board, mostly flour, and considerable many passengers. Nothing was saved so instantaneous was the conflagration. It proceeded from one of the hands accidentally dropping a demijohn or can of spirits of turpentine, which bursted over the boilers, and caught fire immediately, enveloping the whole vessel in flames in an instant. The Perry, which arrived soon after, took the Vermillion's passengers on board.

The Vermillion was one of the best class of high pressure boats. No blame is attached to any one connected with this unfortunate affair. She was from 350 to 400 tons burthen. No insurance.

Sudden Death.—A gentleman arrived in the cars yesterday from the east, and proceeded in the baggage wagon attached to the U. S. Hotel, to the wharf, for the purpose of taking passage in the Chesapeake of Chicago; finding the boat had left, he returned and left his baggage at the hotel, and was not again seen till this morning, when just before breakfast time he came in and asked for his baggage, on being shown into the porter's room, he fell on his face, was raised immediately by those present, breathed a few times and then expired.—His trunk and clothing were examined by the coroner; there was a gold watch and 200 in money, also several papers, from which the names had been carefully torn, the marks on his linen had also evidently been picked out, thus involving the affair in some mystery. All attempts to discover his name and residence proved abortive.

He was between 45 and 50 years of age, about 5 feet 10 inches high, stout built, a full face, hair quite grey and bald on the top. He had on a pair of sheep's grey pantaloons, a blue beaver cloth coat and overcoat of the same, and a fur cap.

We have since learned that among his papers was an account of expenses from Southport, Wisconsin, to Buffalo, also an old note of hand, dated Portland, Maine, 1833, drawn to the order of Stanley Ney, and a receipt for money, dated at Boston, Mass., signed Stanley Ney. A pair of boot lasts were also found in his trunk.—Buffalo Courier, Oct. 19.

Oysters.—Last night, (Nov. 1) was a great day for the oysters in our harbor. The law regulating the taking of them, allows the privilege to catch on and after the first of November, for a certain time, and for the last few days every thing in the shape of a boat in this vicinity, has been in readiness for the occasion. As early as four o'clock yesterday afternoon, boat after boat, scow after scow, and canoe after canoe, could be seen steering for the large oyster bed at the mouth of West River, and by 10 o'clock in the evening it is estimated that not less than 1000 persons were on the ground.—The moment the clock told the hour of midnight, the strife commenced, and at sunrise this morning it was estimated that over 10,000 bushels had been taken, and we have no doubt that is less than the actual quantity. We saw several boats containing 40 or 60 bushels, which had been filled by one individual, and were told that many persons took 30 and 40 and some even 70 and 80 bushels. They can be bought from 20 to 75 cents per bushel, according to size.—New Haven Palladium.

First fruits of the Treaty.—The Bangor Whig states that a number of the citizens of Maine are making preparations to engage in the lumber business on the Aroostook and St. John Rivers, this winter. This movement is attributable to the free navigation of the St. John's River, secured by the recent treaty between Great Britain and this country.

Wonderful Preservation.—Mr. Alfred Hitchcock, of this village, and his wife and son, a lad about nine years of age, were so providentially preserved on Saturday evening last, that a statement of particulars will doubtless be interesting. They were returning in a light carriage with two horses from a visit to Niagara Falls, and had arrived within about four miles of home, when it became so dark that Mr. H. thought it unsafe to proceed farther without procuring a lantern. With this view, on ascending a hill, and seeing a light in a house near by, he rose to get out, when the horses suddenly started, jerked the reins from his hands, and rushed furiously down the opposite side of the hill, and nearly upsetting the carriage, and throwing Mr. H., and part of his baggage, to the ground. On recovering from his fall, he could hear nothing of his team. He rallied several in pursuit, and with one of them, in a horse wagon, succeded in reaching the village.

The frightened horses, left entirely without control, had dashed on in the darkness at the top of their speed, "up hill and down dale," over parts of the road extremely rough, with Mrs. H. and her son seated in the bottom of the carriage, crying for help, but crying in vain. Arrived at the village, they crossed the bridge, passed up main street, and proceeded on east about a mile, then turned north, and slacking their pace a little as they ascended a hill, Mrs. H. safely leaped from the carriage. The horses renewing their speed, she could not rescue her son, but could hear his cry, "mother, mother," until the sound died upon her ear. What must have been her feelings at this moment—snatched, herself, from the very jaws of death, her husband, as she thought, either killed or very badly injured, and her child torn from her under circumstances of the utmost peril! The horses continued until they struck the Genesee road, on which they proceeded over a mile, descended into a deep gulf, and then taking a northeasterly course went on nearly a mile f rher, when reaching a sandy piece of road, near the residence of John Adams, Esq, they became exhausted and fell. The boy jumped from the carriage, ran into the house, and with great coollness and presence of mind, told the family his perilous jaunt, and asked for lodgings for the night. In the mean time, scores of people in the village had started in pursuit. The boy was soon found, and the father, mother and son restored to each others embrace, with no other than a slight injury sustained by Mr. H. in his fall. The carriage, too, was unbroken, and the horses only badly fatigued with their race of nine miles.—Skaneateles Columbian, Oct. 27

A Riot in Boston.—Last Sunday evening the Abolitionists of Boston held a public meeting at Faneuil Hall, which was filled to its utmost capacity. There were, however, many present who had no sympathy with the objects of the meeting, and who resorted to hisses, shouts, and yells, with a determination to drown the voices of the speakers, and break in upon the proceedings. They were successful, and at 8 o'clock the meeting was a perfect chaos.

About half-past 9 o'clock the meeting was broken up. The persons who assembled for the purpose of noise and disturbance carried the day. The mob was triumphant. The blackguards and rowdies, whose strange conceptions of the legacies of freedom, led them to suppose that Faneuil Hall was desecrated when a negro was permitted to speak within its walls, had their own way, although they were in a vast minority. No insult, however, was offered to the females on leaving the Hall, and if nothing was attained by the meeting, on account of the obtrusion of those who were unfriendly to its objects, still the assembly dispersed in quietness, without farther molestation from the mob which had broken up its discussions.

Case of Colt again—The Chancellor, like the Judges of the Law Courts, has refused to grant a writ of error in the case of Colt, to carry up to the Court of Errors. So far, the laws have triumphed in the hard controversy with this murderer. The public have generally not believed, at any time, that he would be hanged. The escape of White and Robinson, was calculated to leave the impression that no murderer, however black his guilt, could be brought to the gallows, if only he had pecuniary means. We trust a better state of things will hereafter prevail. There is but one more chance for the arrest of the course of justice, and that is in the Governor, who has uniformly refused to exercise the pardoning power, unless where facts had come to light which were not before the Courts. There are no such facts in this case, and we presume he will, as in other cases, leave the case with the Courts.—Jour. Com.

Mr. Webster in New-York.—Hon. Daniel Webster was recently invited by the Chamber of Commerce of this city to afford them an opportunity at a public dinner, of expressing their high sense of the importance of his successful labors in constructing the Webster Treaty. He answered them, declining to meet them on such an occasion. But on his way to Washington on the 4th inst. he addressed a very large concourse of people from the steps of the City Hall. A salute of 100 guns was fired at 12 M. and at 1 he commenced his speech. It was confined entirely to the objects which the letter of the Chamber of Commerce had suggested, making no allusion, not the most remote, to politics, or his relation to the different parties. His silence here was the occasion of no little disappointment, but evinced his good sense and sagacity.

Sign for a Groggery.—A little boy, seeing a drunken man prostrate before the door of a groggery, opened the door, and putting in his head, said to the proprietor, 'See here, neighbor, your sign has fallen down.'

Trade of Bangor.—The Bangor Whig estimates that more lumber, especially sawed lumber, is shipped from that city than from any other place in the world. The amount of sawed lumber surveyed for shipment the present season has reached to one hundred and six millions of feet. The amount shipped without survey is estimated, at the lowest, at fifteen millions of feet. The average price of this lumber is about ten dollars a thousand, and the total value of all kinds, for a year, is estimated at one million six hundred and ten thousand dollars. The portion of this sum that goes to the owners of the land is about five hundred thousand dollars, leaving the balance to be distributed among the mill owners and their operatives. 'This,' says the Whig, 'is one of our staples of business and commerce, and when taken in connection with our ship building, bark, wood, leather, spars, cedar posts, bricks, barrels, potatoes, &c., helps to give some faint idea of the business of our city of the East."

Brick Making by Steam.—A Steam Brick Press is now in operation at the yard of Mr. Kirk, corner of Schuylkill 3d and Walnut sts. It makes bricks out of dry clay. The clay is finely pulverized between two rapidly revolving rollers, and is then pressed in strong moulds of the size of a brick, by pistons worked by a toggle joint. The machine has six moulds, and in good working order, will make thirty two bricks a minute. Similar machines, the invention of N. Sawyer of Baltimore, have been a long time in operation in that city and in other parts of this country. The bricks made by them have undergone the severest tests, and have been found of excellent quality. The Treasury buildings at Washington are built of brick of this kind.—Phil. North Amer.

N. Y. Baptist Missionary Convention.—Elder Elon Galusha was re-elected President of the N. Y. State Baptist Missionary Convention, by a vote of 76 to 14, after all the talk of Mr. J. M. Peck, in the Tennessee paper, about his 'loss of influence,' on account of his faithful advocacy of liberty, temperance, and moral reform. It is a strong indication of the progress of sound views, and the healthy tone of religious feeling among the Baptists of this State.—Tocsin of Liberty.

The Cunard Steamers.—An article was recently published in the Boston Mail, which, if true, renders it probable that the vessels now comprising the Cunard line of steamers from Liverpool, will, after a few months, proceed from Halifax to New-York, without stopping at Boston at all, and that the line is to be made weekly, instead of semi-monthly.

Indian Difficulties—Col. Taylor has given notice to the Seminoles, who have taken possession of a portion of the Cherokee country, that they must remove by the first inst. Alligator who is at the head of that band of Seminoles, has avowed his determination to remain where he is. He says there are not United States soldiers enough in the country to force him off, and he will not leave. It is, therefore, probable that the war with the Seminoles will be renewed on our western frontier.—Louis. Journal.

Caution to Strangers.—The Journal of Commerce relates the perpetration of a successful piece of knavery played off upon a stranger on the 15th inst., by a rogue who pretended to find a well-lined pocket-book. The pocket-book was apparently well filled with bank notes, but they proved to be only shams. The finder pretended to be in a hurry for the Philadelphia boat, and proposed to make the stranger his agent or deputy in adverising for the owner &c., modestly contenting himself with a reward in hand of ten dollars for his honesty. The stranger luckily had but six in his pocket, so that the swindler was not very expensive. Strangers who are beset in this way, should always be careful to see what has been found before they have anything to do with it.

Texas.—A letter has just been received from Washington, dated Nov. 4th which contains the following passage:

"By news which has just now reached us from Fort Jesup, it appears probable that the Texans have been routed by the Mexican forces, about forty miles south of San Antonio."

Court Martials on board the North Carolina.—The naval trials on board have been brought to a close, after having continued with but little interval for 105 days. Heavy penalties have been visited in some cases and with much justice. The officers composing the court deserve great credit, not only for the patient labor which they bestowed upon the several investigations, but the spirit of even-handed justice which characterized all their proceedings. The head of the Department could not have made a more judicious selection.

The late Marquis of Wellsley.—The Marquis of Wellsley, whose death has been chronicled, derived his name from the family of the Wesleys, so famous as the founders of the Methodist Church. The Earl of Mornington, who was grandfather of the late Marquis and of the Duke of Wellington, inherited some estates in Ireland from Mr. R. Wesley; and on that account, adopted the name. The heirship of these estates was offered to Charles Wesley, while he was at school at Westminster, on condition of his going to Ireland. This he declined; and nearly the whole world, in its commerce, politics, and religion, feels now the effect of the young student's decision.

The Philadelphia Ledger states that the different transportation companies on the Pennsylvania public works, will close their operation for the season on the 12th of this month.

Distribution of the proceeds of the Public Lands.—The Madisonian says: "We learn that the accounting officers of the Treasury have adjusted the accounts of the States and Territories under the Distribution Act, and that the Governors have been notified by the Treasury Department of the amounts payable to their respective States. The amount to be divided is $562,144 18, exclusive of the ten per centum to the States in which the lands have been sold."

Decrease in the use of Wine.—A recent return of the duties on wines, for home consumption in London, from the commencement of the present year to Oct. 1st. shows an extraordinary decrease, compared with last year. In the common wines, Madeira, Sherry, and Port, the quantity on which duty has peen paid for home consumption, is 1,585,186 gallons, 934,221 less than last year. This decrease is not attributed to the spread of temperance principles, but to the hard times, which have affected the resources of the middling classes; and this is infered from the fact that in the costly wines, Champagne, Burgundy, &c. the consumphas increased, the wealthier classes not being affected by the depressed state of trade.

An old man named Henry Stevenson, at Fort Madison, Iowa Territory, was convicted a few days since of horse stealing, and was sentenced by the Court to pay a fine of two hundred dollars, and receive twenty lashes on his back. The latter part of the sentence was carried into execution, disgracing the Court and all concerned.

In reference to the Miller prophecy, the Boston Traveler says: "We learn from good authority that the time hitherto fixed by a large number of our fellow citizens for the end of the world, has been again postponed. Instead of the 23d of April, it will take place on the fourth of July next."

It is stated in the Hamilton (U. C.) Journal, that "The Government are prepared, at the opening of the next session of the Provincial Parliament, to propose a bill levying a certain duty on American cattle, pork, cheese, &c."

Dr. Eldrige, who was so often tried in Philadelphia for forgery, and so often acquitted, now resides in Callowhill street, Philadelphia, and is one of the most active firemen in the city.

A Montreal paper says, "This morning there were upwards of eighty fellow-creatures in the Emigrant sheds; nearly half of them were children, many of whom have been deserted by their unnatural fathers; two women are left with fourteen children—some of them appear very sickly."

The Count and Countess Auguste Harazthy, from Hungary, with their father and mother, and three children, passed through Madison, Wiskonsan, to their new home at Prairie du Lac. Emigrants of this character, possessing refinement, enterprise and capital, will exert an influence of a most favorable nature on this section of the country.

The United States will soon have a formidable force at Vera Cruz. In addition to the steam ship Missouri, and one of the United States vessels which left Pensacola for that port last week, the frigate Constitution and sloop of war Marion, have also been ordered to proceed thither forthwith.

John Markell, Esq., of Andover, Ohio, who is quite deaf, while walking on the Little Miami railroad, on the 22d ult., was run over by the train of cars, which severed both his legs just above the ankles, and injured him much about the head.—He was taken up supposed to be dead, but was living six hours after the accident.

The value of goods exported from Baltimore this year to the 30th Sept., was $3,353,229. Same time last year, $3,408,835. Decrease, $55,606. On domestic produce there is a small increase.

Mr. Geo. Scott, the faithful missionary in Sweden, who recently visited this country, having had his chapel at Stockholm closed by order of the Governor, is now in Kent, England, awaiting in hope the result of an appeal to the King of Sweden.

A Mr. Smith, of Clinton, Mich., was robbed of $340, on his way to Rochester, during Saturday night. He was on board of the packet, and placed the money under his pillow. When he awoke it was missing. Search was made among the passengers, but no clue was obtained of the robber.

The McCoy Murder.—The trials of the five men arrested as parties in this affair are set down for the 21st inst. to be held at Westchester. McClusky is to be defended by David Graham Esq. and Sullivan by Wm. M. Price, Esq.

Indictment for dueling.—The grand Jury of Burlington co., (N. J.) on the 2d inst., found true bills against Robert A Knapp, and Alexander C. Rhind, as principals, and John Guest, Jr., and John Downes, Jr., as seconds in the late duel fought near Burlington, in which, it will be remembered, the former (Knapp,) was wounded at the sixth shot, by his antagonist's ball entering his left cheek.—U. S. Gaz.

By the anual catalogue of Yale College just published, we find that the whole number of students for the current academical year is as follows: theological students 76, law 30, medical 52, resident graduates 3, seniors 99, juniors 111, sophomores 84, freshmen 82. Total 537.

The income of this year of the State of Massachusetts, will exceed its expenditures more than $27,000. And notwithstanding an extra session of the Legislature, the expenses of the State administration are less than for several former years.

Christian Review.

A GOOD PROPOSITION.

THE importance of the Christian Review is admitted. It was commenced nearly seven years since in odedience to an urgent and almost spontaneous call from different parts of the land, and in compliance with that call, has been sustained through six successive volumes, only by special effort, and considerable sacrifice (previous to the present volume) on the part of a few individuals. The number of subscribers, however, has gradually increased, so as to inspire the hope that ultimately the list would become such as to place it above "want," and on a basis that should insure its perpetuity; and with proper exertions on the part of its friends, it is believed such a result might easily be accomplished.

The work is put at the low price of three dollars per annum, in order to bring it within the means of as large a number as possible. Yet, many who are able, and who would be benefitted by its perusal, are not now subscribers, and need, it is thought, only to be reminded of the facts to become so

The work occupies a high position among the religious quarterlies of the country, and in the estimation of intelligent men of all Christian denominations, is contributing a good share of the religious periodical literature of the age. To the Baptist denomination, in particular, it is an auxiliary in defence and illustration of the truth, with which it is believed, we cannot afford to dispense. And, since the committee and the publishers have resolved, never again to make an appeal for pecuniary aid, but to discontinue its publication whenever the subscriptions cease to be sufficient to sustain it, it becomes every well-wisher of the Review to exert himself now in its behalf.

☞The publishers having a number of the past volumes on hand, propose, in order to interest some who may be desirous of possessing it, yet feel unable to subscribe, to exert their influence to obtain new subscribers, and by so doing not only secure it for themselves, but, by increasing its circulation, extend its usefulness, and help also in insuring its perpetuity—to offer a PREMIUM for new subscribers, as follows.

☞Any person obtaining TWENTY NEW SUBSCRIBERS and remitting the publishers sixty dollars, shall be entitled to a complete set of the Review in seven volumes, the subscription price of which is, TWENTY ONE DOLLARS!

 For FIFTEEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS the last five volumes will be given—subscription price FIFTEEN DOLLARS!

 For TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, the last TWO VOLUMES, subscription price, SIX DOLLARS!

For FIVE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, either of the last three volumes, subscription price, THREE DOLLARS!

It is hoped that this very liberal premium, may induce many of the friends of the Review to make a renewed effort in its behalf, and thus not only reap benefit themselves, but aid the great object the Review is intended to sustain.

SUBSCRIBERS are reminded of the terms of subscription, "three dollars per annum IN ADVANCE." Have you paid your subscription? The money is much needed.

GOULD KENDALL & LINCOLN, Publishers,
59 Washington Street.

N. B. The publishers of any religious paper who shall give the above advertisement three insertions in their columns (and send a copy to the publishers) shall be entitled to a selection of either two of the last four volumes.

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers, and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business, in "Mechanic's Hall," in rooms adjoining the "Register Office," in all its various branches, where they will be happy to wait on customers on the shortest notice. Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done up in a style not surpassed by any of the "Craft" in this "village or county;" and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and traveling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, trouble and expense. The principal advantage to be derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inksand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents—Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the first Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

POETRY.

From the Christian Reflector.

Thoughts on the death of McCoy.

O weep ye Heavens! and let this ruined earth
Mourn for her guilty sons. What fearful scene!
What horrid drama from the pit of hell
Is acted on earth's shores! It was a sight
At which a fiend might stand aghast; yet man,
O! God, exalted, reasoning, heaven-born man.
Unshocked, Unmoved, looked calmly on the scene,
Nay, with exulting eagerness beheld
Humanity disgraced, outraged and brutalized;
Behold the image of the Deity
By rage infernal, marred, defaced,
And O! by human brother hands, transformed
Into a lifeless, bloody shapeless clod
Wo for earth's fallen race! If angels ever weep
At mortal sin, sure bitter tear-drops fell,
And horror ran through all the heavenly hosts.
What were ye made of! ye who madly gazed
On such a scene; and lent approving voice?
Claim ye the name of human? have ye souls
That feel, and think, and hope for immortality?
Did the kindly glow of human sympathy
E'er warm your breasts? or tender pity stir
Within your bosoms! Could ye joy to see
Infernal passion rage in human hearts,
And blow that passion into furious flames,
To urge its victim on to bloody death!
If Abel's blood once sent a cry to Heaven,
And called down vengeance on his brother's head,
What fearful cursrs from the eternal One
Must fall on such vile murderers! What dark cloud
Of wrath divine draw o'er this guilty world!
See, duellists, your boasted glory here!
See the dark passion of its veil disrobed,
Which ye call honor and would defy,
And offer up at its unhallowed shrine,
The horrid incense of a brother's blood.
Your boasted honor is your black disgrace.
'Tis Heaven's abhorrence! 'Tis the crime that hurled
The high archangel from his throne of light
Down to the darkest shades of endless night.
It is the seed of wo, by Satan sown
In human hearts to poison human bliss;
To choke the growth of virtue, and reduce the soul
To guilt, and misery, and endless death.

THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

BY REV. DR. STOWE.

It is now two hundred and twenty-two years since there stood on the shores of Holland a little band of Christians, weeping in each other's arms, while the ship which was to bear a part of them away was tossing on the waters, and nearly ready to sail. That whole day had the little church spent in fasting and prayer; and now the hour had come when half of their number must leave, to go and prepare that home in the untried wilderness, where they all hoped to meet again. Eleven years had they been strangers and pilgrims in that country; but despairing to form, in its old and corrupt atmosphere, the Christian community like Abraham they heard a call to go out "unto a place which they should afterwards receive for an inheritance;" and they obeyed and went out, "not knowing whither they went." We need not tell the distress of that cold and gloomy voyage; how they were twice driven back by stress of weather, and long tossed on the ocean; how, through the treachery of their ship-master, who had engaged to land them in a warmer latitude, the were brought on to the bleak New-England coast amid the ice and snows of one of its keenest and hardest winters.—Then, while the vessel lay tossing at anchor, a little party ventured along the inhospitable shore to find where they might land. The bitter cold froze the spray of the sea on their garments, and on the land the jealous Indian met them with showers of arrows. All day they wandered amid frosts and snows, and at night slept under a chance shelter of logs and boughs; and when returning, a storm drove them on to a bleak, cold island, and the sabbath morning found them there. Neither cold, nor hunger, nor the dashing of the sea spray, prevented them from enjoying the rest of the Christian Sabbath. They built fires, and sat around them, and spent the whole day in praying and singing praise to God.

At length, a location being found, the vessel reached the shore; and the rock of Plymouth was pressed by feet as unfaltering and firm as if the entrance to a warm house, and not to a frozen wilderness.—There were in that company women nobly born and delicately reared, ignorant even of ordinary want or hardship; there were little children, standing shivering on the snows; there were the sick and weak, borne in the arms of others; there were husbands, and fathers, and brothers, bearing up firmly and calmly for themselves, and seeking to screen from the cold and pain those who clung to their side. They had built one rude dwelling for all, and that dwelling was first hallowed by prayer and praise.

To this chilling reception followed months of lingering privation and hardship, wherein, as Cotton Mather quaintly tells, "they had a great experiment of man's not living by bread alone," being left entirely without bread for months together; nevertheless the Lord sent them food out of the sea. Cold, hardship, fatigue, and want of suitable food, brought on sickness, and one after another sunk into the grave, till, of the one hundred and one who landed, only fifty remained; and of those fifty, hardly five at a time were well enough to take care of the sick and bury the dead. Grave after grave was dug in sorrow and in weakness; and lest the ruthless Indian should violate the last rest of the beloved, the mounds that covered them were leveled in the spring and sown with grain. So truly may it be said that all the good, which in after times sprang up in New England, was sown like this, in tears and watchings, and over the graves of things dearest and best beloved.

Nor are we to suppose, as many do, that the men who dared and did so much, were of a mould to feel less keenly heart-trials like these; for the restrained and governed spirit takes home with a deeper intensity what the shallow mind evaporates with noise and show. When the lady of Governor Bradford, in very sight of the shore, was by one misstep engulfed in the ocean, and the sons, and brothers, and sisters of numberless others languished and died with cold and want in that forlorn wilderness, we are not to imagine there was no outcry, and because the stricken survivors, with steady and unmoved determination, went on with the great work which they had undertaken for God and posterity.

And what did they do? Before their determined perseverance the snows melted, the beasts retired, the wild Indian was subdued, and fair villages appeared with their church-spires, and gardens, and corn fields; and a race of men and women arose, the like of whom had not before been seen.—We know, indeed, that the present enlightened age thinks itself entitled to speak scornfully of the old, strict days of New England. We hear much of blue-laws, and long visages, and so on. But with all due respect for the wisdom of this improved generation, perhaps even we might be the better for some of the good old homefathers of those days; men who feared their God, governed their households, minded their business, kept their promises, paid their debts, and were addicted to many such comfortable and useful practices, which were, notwithstanding the enlightening of the times, seem to be falling greatly into disuse. We think the world might be the better for some of those good old homemothers, who could spin and weave and knit, who looked well to the ways of their household, who brought up their dozen, nay. like the mother of Sir William Phipps, their more than two dozen sons and daughters, brave, fair, and instructed in every good work, and that, too, with less cost than some in our day expend for millinery and Cologne water. Nor do we think our legislatures and high places would be the worse for men like Winslow, Winthrop and Eaton, men courteous, grave and dignified in manner, blameless in every private relation, fearing God and fearing nothing besides, hating covetousness and shaking their hands from holding of bribes; men who knelt before their Maker, and stood before their country's enemies; men, in the words of old Mather, "so cautious and circumspect in discourse, so modest in expression, that it became a proverb for incontestible truth, 'The governor saith it.'" Perhaps, if one of these old statesmen of our infant liberties should return from the dead, he would think too well fulfilled the prediction of an early governor of Massachusetts: "Blessed hast thou been, O land, in thy rulers; but, alas! for the generality, they have not considered how they were to honor the rules of God, in reverencing them whom God made rulers over them. I fear they will come to want in having set over them those that it will be hard work to honor, and that will be hardly capable to manage their affairs."—Ch. Souvenir for 1843.

MORAL INFLUENCE OF LITERATURE.

Literature has been called the mirror of a nation's character. It is as it were, a panorama where we may behold a people engaged in their business, their amusements and their daily intercourse—in short where we may behold them in every scene of life. In this respect, it is far superior to history; for the latter shows us only the actions of a nation; the former discloses their secret spring.

But while literature thus exhibits to us a nation's heart, the influence which it in turn exerts over the moral character of succeeding ages, it is hardly possible to estimate. It transmits to us the virtue or vice in a garb which commends itself to our approbation, or draws down upon it our severest reprehension. It gives life also to events that would have perished, but for its vivifying touch, and quietly permits oblivion to cover with its sable pall, many of the deeds of man. The scholar has here a power which is denid to the sculptor or the painter, for while the defacing hand of time wipes away these records of noble deeds and virturos action, his records escapes its obliterating touch.

It is thus that the scholar stands before us in a character of solemn responsibility. But besides his power of perpetuating scenes which would otherwise pass away, there is another element which gives him a still wider and deeper influuence over the destiny of man. He does not die, though his body return to its kindred dust. His example lives as long as the imperishable monuments of his genius, and either leads his admirers along the pathway of virtue and truth, or entices them away to the dark mazes of corruption and sensuality.

Who can estimate the influence which the literature of Elizabeth's reign has already exerted, and will continue to exert, over the interests of humanity. The laxity of morals which pervaded the Court of England in her reign, gave rise to the jovial clubs who heated their imaginations over the wine-bottle, and spent the night in revelry and song. The demoralizing effect of their example is seen to the present day. Many an aspirant to the fame of a genius foolishly supposing that wine and revelry are the inseparable attendants of genius, has aped these irregularities of her distinguished favorites, and thus simply believe that he also enjoyed the favor of her smiles; How often has Scholasticus, knitting upon his brow an angry scowl, or throwing his locks into careless disorder, and working himself into a passionate frenzy, for awhile deluded himself into the belief that he was endowed with a genius, kindred to that of Byron. Well would it be for him and others did they apply to themselves, the censure which they so lavish upon those who deny the immortality and profligacy of even the most gifted imaginations in English literature; well would it be for them if they could see in these gifted men, some higher qualities than wine bibbing or profligacy.

The heart sickens while dwelling upon he early ruin to which the corrupt example of the scholar in ages past, has hurried many a promising son of genius. Yet we hope for a brigter day. The time is coming when men will no longer be deluded with the false notion that the splendor of perverted genius eclipses the lusture of virtue and piety. HETH.

IS SLAVERY A SIN OF ITSELF?

A thing may be a sin of itself—in its very nature, or it may be a sin merely by the command of God. The commands of the law are divided, by writers on moral philosophy, into positive moral and naturally. In the first, the sin or duty is not in the nature of the thing; in the second, it is. It was not wrong for instance, to eat "of the tree of life," more than any other tree in in the garden, until God forbade it. It was right to work on the seventh day of the week as much as any other day, until God sanctified and hallowed it for the sabbath of rest. But to worship God—obey him, is the natural duty of all rational beings. Theft, robbery, and murder, are sins in themselves. A positive duty is right just when God commands it. A natural duty was right even before. It goes back to his nature, the principles of which his will expresses. To which of these classes does Slavery belong? This is an important question. If we can find sin in its very nature, then why all this talk about circumstances, always in the mouths of slave-holders and their apologists? Can circumstances make things right of which the very nature is sin? They may change its nature, and then it becomes another thing. But while ever it remains that thing it is sin, and sin continually. Circumstances cannot make a white object black. But more immediately to the question.

What is slavery? "Servitude" say some. Then its right or wrong depends just on its circumstances, and nothing else. A man who starts on a wrong road will be sure to come out at the wrong place. Slave laws call a slave "property," a "chattel personal to all intents and purposes whatsoever—he is nothing and can possess nothing," &c.

Slavery, then, is the making of man an article of property. It was always a sin. It is a sin now, and always will be a sin. No possible circumstance can make it right. If a man changes, and becomes a brute, it may be right; or if God changes, and becomes unjust, it may be right, but not till then, because,

1. Man is not the proper material for a slave.

He is too noble a nature. "He was made a little lower than the angels, and crowned with glory and honor." At his creation, a council of the Trinity was called. He was made in the image and after the likeness of God, and constituted lord over all other creatures.

Man is too exalted a creature to become a slave. We may make slaves of brutes, and even then the law of God requires merciful treatment. We may make slaves of the water and the winds. We may command the elements to labor for us, and labor, too, unpaid. But man is the image of God, never made for this purpose. God gave to man dominion over the beasts of the field, and the fowls of the air, and the fish of the sea, but not over his brother man. There is no mention of man there. But let us examine man a little in order to see whether or not he will make a slave. A Carpenter, you know, cannot make a bureau out of ice, nor can a man build a house with pillars of air. He must have the proper materials. Well, then, first, what need has that part of men designed for slaves of an understanding? Why would not the instinct of beasts answer equally well? It is energy of body not mind, that is wanted. The understanding of the master and the overseer is surely sufficient. These exalted heaven-aspiring powers need not have been given. Why this waste of mind, when they were designed for circumstances where it must forever lie buried?

2. Why has God given them a will, or, at least, more than he gave to brutes?—What need has a slave for human will?—The master's is enough for both. The will is the ruling power but the master's will rules him. These two wills are constanty meeting, conflicting. What great end does it answer? For what purpose was it bestowed? But,

3. A slave has a conscience, an inward monitor, that tells him that this action is right, that one wrong—approves the one, condemns the other. He needs no conscience, if he is property. Property have a conscience! property sin! A horse or cow break the law of God! God surely does not delight in the unhappiness of his creatures. Why then bestow on human "chattels" a conscience, a power to them entirely useless, nay more, a false monitor, continually telling them of sin, and thus tormenting them? What need of a conscience, when they dare not follow its dictates. Suppose conscience says, "go and worship God"—God himself says the same. "No," says the master, with "my good leave, sir!" And thus it is with the whole soul. Its whole make tells that it was designed for a different situation. Suppose we go into a machinery. We see in a moment, by examining its wheels and its different parts, that it was designed for this or that purpose, and every thing looks that way. But here, in this machinery of the soul, no wheel, no part of it looks towards slavery. When put in this situation, its wheels jar, stop, and all the machinery is thrown out of order. The main spring designed by God to move this machinery is the will. Slavery fetters this spring, and substitutes another power, namely, "whip power." This power never will effectually move the soul. And, in fact, the slaveholder has only about half of the slave. He has his body, but the soul is the important thing, the great moving power, but it is more difficult to chain. To make slavery right, man must be made new—the whole machinery made on a different plan. The slaveholder puts his fingers into his soul, and take this and that noble power, diminish others, and insert a few of his own making. While man continues man, slavery must be a sin in all circumstances.

2. Man can never be a slave, because it infringes natural rights.

Man finds himself in possession of a body. It comes into the world without any chain fastened round it. He knows God gave him his body, and therefore he has a natural perfect right, to use it so as not to offend the great Being that gave it to him. This is a fair inference from the fact of God's giving it to him. He can leave it at rest, move it—move it in any direction, and use it for any purpose (not wrong) he pleases. Just so with his soul. For what were its powers given, if not to be used? And who has a right to use them, if not himself? Are not his arms, his limbs, his memory, reason conscience his own. He feels conscious that they are.—he knows it intuitively. He feels it in his very soul. Or more properly, they are not his own but God's. The slave does not own himself in an absolute sense, for then he could sell himself, another could then lawfully buy him and hold him as slave. A man may sell his labor—sell the products of himself. Suppose a man could sell himself, he would be worth more than $100. If the planter, "owning" 500 slaves did actually own so many bodies and souls, he would certainly be about the wealthiest man in the universe. Slavery never was and never can be right, because it breaks down rights founded in the nature of man. We are all along taking for granted that these are men. This too, has been controverted; but those denying it surely prefer to humanitys claims far more questionable.

3. Another obvious reason is, that they are moral agents.

This too, we have a right to take for granted. It is unquestioned. But a moral agent never can be a slave. It is impossible. To be a moral agent, he must be a free agent. Suppose God has put me under a physical necessity of acting in a certain way, or allowed others to do so, my actions while under the necessity, are only physical acts, neither morally good nor evil. They possess no moral character than the blowing of the wind, or the falling of a tree, produced by physical causes.—To be accountable I must be free. If a man can become property, that moment he ceases to be accountable. For this has unmade him—swallowed up his manhood. He is no more a "person" but a thing.—Are things accountable? Is a bale of cotton accountable? Are cows and horses accountable? He is taken from a higher rank, where accountability rests, and placed among brutes, where such a thing is unknown. Every man is accountable, therefore no man can be a slave. He has duties, and he must have as many rights as he has duties—right and duty go hand in hand. To say that such a thing is a man's duty, and yet that he has no right to perform it, is almost an outrage on common sense.—Spirit of Liberty.

A TEMPERANCE GIRL.—A few weeks since a young lady, with a horse and wagon, was driving from Norwalk to Westport. She overtook a young man going the same way, and as her horse became rather unmanageable, she requested him to jump in and drive for her. As he was getting into the wagon, "My," said she, "you have been drinking rum!" and pushing him, she put whip to the horse, and dashed off.—The young man afterwards declared that she must be one of the Smelling Committee for it had been an hour since he had drank any thing. Yes, good sir, all these Martha Washingtonians belong to the "smelling committee," and they can smell liquor, though a pound of spices lay on the top of it.!—Organ.

DON'T BUY A DRUNKEN FATHER.—One of the reformed drunkards of New York, relates the following incident:—By his excessive drinking he had laid himself upon a bed of sickness, and one evening his wife had occasion to go out shopping, and of course had to go alone.

Her child, a boy of four years, was playing about as he had been allowed to sit up for company for his father, while his mother should be away. The boy kept teasing to know what mother would buy for him and laughingly his mother told him, she would buy him another father.

"Oh, mother don't buy a drunken father!" said the child, with great earnestness. This expression set the inebriate to thinking, and resulted in his reformation.

Fall Immigration.—The fall immigration to this territory has commenced, and from the present prospect we should judge that the immigration for the next two months will surpass that of any previous year.—Should a new purchase be effected by the treaty now being held by Gov. Chambers, we anticipate that the immigration will be unparalleled.

To swear, is neither brave, polite, nor wise.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To Families and Invalids.

THE following indispensable family remedies may be found at the village drug stores, and soon at every country store in the state. Remember and never get them unless they have the fac simile signature of Comstock & Co on the wrappers as all others by the same names are base impositions and counterfeits. If the merchant near you has them not, urge him to procure them at 71 Maiden-lane, the next time he visits New York, or to write for them. No family should be a week without these remedies.

BALDNESS.

Balm of Columbia, for the hair, which will stop it from falling out, or restore it on bald places; and on children make it grow rapidly, or on those who have lost their hair from any cause. All vermin that infest the heads of children in schools, are prevented or killed at once. Find the name of Comstock & Co on it, or never try it. Remember this always.

RHEUMATISM AND LAMENESS

Positively cured, and all shrivelled muscles and limbs are restored, in the old or young, by the Indian Vegetable Elixir and Nerve and Bone Liniment, but never without the name of comstock & Co. on it.

PILES &c.

Are wholly prevented, or governed if the attack has come on, if you use the only true Hay's Liniment, from Comstock & Co. All sores and every thing relieved by it that admits of an outward application. It acts like a charm. Use it.

HORSES that have Ring-Bone, Spavin, Wind-Galls, &c., are cured by Roofs' Specific; and Foundered horses entirely cured by Roofs' Founder Ointment. Mark this, all horsemen.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.---NO 39.] JAMES BAILEY, Editor and Proprietor. [WHOLE NO. 143.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—Commandment.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—Jesus Christ.

Two dollars in advance.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1842. [Published weekly.

Sabbath Department.

The Sabbath is no more important than any other precept of the Decalogue or institution of the gospel, but it is deserving of equal attention with them. The S. D. Baptist Denomination feel under no greater obligations to "remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," than they do to conform to all other things binding on Christians. And if at any time more zeal is manifested on this subject than others, it is because the Sabbath is regarded less. These facts should be kept in mind when we are accused of always harping on this subject.

We to-day commence a "Sabbath Department" in this paper, in which we intend to insert from time to time such matters touching the doctrine and practical duties of the Sabbath as we think circumstances call for. We do not expect to keep it up every week, but whatever we publish on this subject, whether extracts, selections, contributions, or editorial, may be found in this Department. We anticipate publishing at some time extracts from Cornthwaite, Carlow, Bampfield, Burnside, and other writers on this subject, and if any matter of interest occurs relative to the Sabbath, it will be registered in this Department. We also invite our brethren to furnish us short and pithy articles on this subject, and not forget to speak out on other subjects.

Our reasons for this course are, that amongst all the religious periodicals of the day there are none that give the subject its due importance, and that open their columns for a full examination of the subject. If this statement is not true, we wish to be informed, and we assure the "corps Editorial" that if they will open their columns, there are those who would joyfully embrace the privilege of presenting the doctrine and duties of the Bible Sabbath. We now freely open our columns to those who advocate the sentiments we adopt, and to those who hold different sentiments, and promise to insert whatever is sent us controverting our sentiments if respectfully and candidly written,—requesting, however, that the article contain multum in parvo, or be brief. And we ask Editors, why not speak out and let the church and world have the Bible doctrine of the Sabbath?

We confidently believe the church is in error on this subject, and it is time that it be stript of this relict of a degenerate church. And we say to our brethren, that to us is committed the Bible Sabbath, and it belongs to us to disseminate light, "to cry aloud and spare not," till God's holy Sabbath shall be kept by all who profess his name. While we join hand in hand with christians to advocate other christian duties, we must not fail to hold up the light we have on this subject. The church will at some time come right, and if we altogether hold our peace, then God will work by other means, and we and our father's house be destroyed. Inducements to labor in this department cluster thick around us. God requires it at our hands. There is now considerable excitement on this subject in different places. During the past year more than half a dozen ministers beside several laymen, have embraced the bible Sabbath, and it needs but the effort that we can make to bring multitudes more to embrace it.

To promote this object, we hereby constitute every Seventh-day Baptist an agent for the Register, and for every new subscriber obtained among those who do not observe the Sabbath of the bible, with advance payment, we will allow them 25 per cent., i. e., 50 cents for each subscriber obtained when payment is made us in advance. A little effort on the part of our brethren would place the Register and the true Sabbath doctrine in the hands of very many who now are in ignorance and error. Who has a mind to work?

Religious Department.

From the New-York Evangelist.

HEARING AND DOING.

"But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only—deceiving your own selves."

'How do you feel to-day, sister Helpful?' said good deacon Softly, opening the pew door, and edging into the seat before Mrs. Helpful, one Sunday noon. 'What do you think of the sermon? Do you think such preaching is a going to do good?'

"Well, I don't know,' replied the matron, with an ominous lengthening of the features, and drawing down of the eyebrows, 'I am afraid there isn't much feeling in the house.'

'Yet I believe Mr. Trueman is a real good man, and wants to do good,' said the deacon, 'but somehow, his preaching didn't seem to take hold.'

'A great want of faith in the church,' said a sharp-faced woman who sat in the next seat. 'It is good seed, and will spring up if it is watered by the prayers of God's people.'

'Well, I don't know—I don't know, sister Waters, somehow I don't have faith to pray for preaching that don't take hold more.'

'But you believe that it is the truth, do you not, and can't you pray that the truth may be blessed?'

'Why, yes, I suppose that it is the truth, but some preachers always have the spirit in them, and what they say does good.'

'Then you think that it is from the man, and not from God's truth, that the blessing proceeds. Now I believe that God is just as willing to bless the truth, when it is preached by one of his servants, as by another, if it is but followed by the faith, and the prayers of the church.'

'Well,' replied deacon Softly, 'if you have so much faith, I hope that you will pray for a blessing;' and seeing that sister Helpful had taken her psalm-book, and was most intently pondering its contents, he rose and went to find some other person to whom he could mourn over the low state of the church, and the want of efficiency in the ministrations of Mr. Trueman, and to whom he whispered that sister Waters had some queer notions, and he feared—he drew a deep sigh as he said it—but he really fear she was not quite right.

'Pretty good sermon to-day, Colonel,' said Esq. Fairly, as he joined with him, and they proceeded on their walk homewards.

'Why yes, Mr. Trueman has done pretty well to-day, and I think that if he continues to preach as he has done this morning, he will give general satisfaction. He is certainly a man of fair talents.'

'O, yes, I think it is best to sustain him by all means, though there is some dissatisfaction. If he will preach as well as he can, I do not think that we shall do better. He is a very good man, a very faithful pastor.'

'Yes; but I think that he had better study than visit. A man must write his sermons, to be acceptable to such an audience.'

'Very true,' observed Esq. Fairly, as they parted.

'Oh, what will become of the church?' said Mrs. Meanwell, as she took her husband's arm. 'Did you notice what a listless audience, and the seats not half filled; and deacon Softly asleep. Such preaching—all addressed to the head—can it do any good? I looked all around, and I could not see any one that appeared to be benefitted or interested. A number were asleep, and I don't blame them; the sermon was entirely above their capacity.'

'Yes,' rejoined the husband, with a sigh, 'all for the head. The heart is let alone. Such studied, elegant sermons, would chill the zeal of Peter.'

'A very instructive sermon, we have had this morning,' said Mrs. Careful, as she was passing. 'I think the doctrine was very ably and clearly established.'

'Do you?' said Mr. Meanwell, in that non-committal tone so often adopted by sermon fault-finders.

'Yes, did you not admire it?'

'It was a well-written sermon,' said Mr. Meanwell, 'but such kind of preaching is not the sort to do good.'

'And why not?' said Mrs. Careful, as she stepped lightly along 'I am sure that all that was advanced accorded exactly with my opinions.'

'You may go where you please,' said Mrs. Hearnought to her husband, as she seated herself in her own house, 'but I go to the Chapel this afternoon. I can tell Mr. Trueman his preaching will not do me much good, while his wife has a new bonnet every summer, and a new dress almost every Sunday. Such pride among church members—let him preach to them.'

'Well,' said a good-natured man, as he offered his arm to his wife, 'you will own that Mr. Trueman has done well to-day,' The lady was a critic. She had written several original articles in albums, and it was whispered among her particular friends that her signature had appeared in the newspaper. She had an undoubted right to be fastidious. She drew up and said stiffly, 'I think the doctrine might have been much more ably stated, and much more clearly illustrated.' The poor husband looked rather disappointed, but he knew that his wife was in the true sense, 'a woman's right's man,' and he thought it prudent to provoke no further discussion.

'I never did hear Mr. Trueman do so well,' said a kind-hearted, but rather sleepy hearer, who came along stretching himself, and rubbing his eyes open after his last nap. 'The same old story, said a sleeper of a different mood, but who had waked often enough to catch his neighbor quietly napping, 'you don't lose much if you do sleep through the sermon!'

'Mother, I don't think I shall go to church this afternoon,' said Miss Fretful, 'Mr. Trueman was so dry this morning. I am sure I don't see why he wishes to preach upon doctrines which we all believe.'

'This preaching seems more like what I used to hear in my younger days,' said an aged and venerable man, as he slowly walked homewards. 'But it does seem to me—there are good men now I know'—and he turned his benevolent face to his companion—'but still it does seem that the ministers now are not quite such as the good old men I used to see at my father's when I was a boy. There was old Dr.——. He preached my mother's funeral sermon. Where shall we find such a man now? Still I like Mr. Trueman. He is a good man.'

'Brother Trueman,' said an aged elder, 'you don't preach that doctrine exactly as I hold it. I am sorry to find you leaning to any of these new-fangled notions.'

'Mr. Trueman,' exclaims a zealous member, 'Mr. P. makes that as plain as day. I wonder you do not enter into his views!'

'Are you not afraid,' said a prim maiden lady, as she drew a wise woman of the church aside—'Are you not afraid that our minister is not quite orthodox? Are you not afraid there is a little leaning to——?' And her voice sunk to a whisper, and whether it was Taylorism or Tylerism, or Finneyism, or what other ism, we cannot say.

'I am sorry not to see your son more steady at church,' said a good man to the pious mother of a professing christian.

'Well, I am sorry too. But Thaddeus never liked Mr. Trueman's preaching, and he says it will never do him any good. So he does not go but half a day.'

'But I don't see him at any of the prayer meetings, or in the Sunday school.'

'No, he does not like Mr. Trueman, he says he will never do any good here.—They have a good minister at Fairydale, Mr. Nonesuch. If we could only have such a man, Thaddeus would feel right. But he don't like Mr. Trueman, and I don't think Mr. Trueman's preaching will ever do him any good.'

'It needs no spirit of prophecy to foresee that, while he pursues his present course,' thought the inquirer.

And these remarks were multiplied, and all were judges—but where were the doers of the word?

THE WEARY FINDING REST.

The following affecting story was related by Mr. Dudley, an agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, at the anniversary of the Birmingham S. S. Union:

In the county of Kent, lives, or lived, a clergyman and his lady, who took a very active part in the Sabbath-school connected with his church. They had in the school a boy, the son of a widow, who was notoriously wicked, despising all the earnest prayers and admonitions of the clergyman, who out of pity to his poor widowed mother, kept him in his school 10 months; at length he found it absolutely necessary to dismiss the lad as a warning to others.—He soon after enlisted as a soldier in a regiment that was soon ordered to America, it being during the last American war. Some time after, the poor widow called upon the clergyman to beg a Bible of the smallest size. Surprised at such a request from an individual who was evidently on the verge of eternity, and who he knew had one or two Bibles of large print, which she had long used to good purpose, he inquired what she wanted it for. She answered, 'A regiment is going out to America and I want to send it to my poor boy: and oh! Sir, who knows what it may do?'

She sent the Bible which the clergyman gave her, by a pious soldier, who, upon arrival at their destination found the widow's son the very ringleader of the regiment in every description of vice. After the soldier had made himself known, he said, 'James your mother has sent you her last present.'

'Ah!' he replied, in a careless manner, 'is she gone at last? I hope she has sent me some cash.'

The pious soldier told him he believed the poor widow was dead; 'but,' said he, 'she has sent you something of more value than gold or silver, (presenting him the Bible,) and James, it was her dying request, that you would read one verse at least, of this book every day; and can you refuse her dying charge?'

'Well,' said James, 'it is not too much to ask, (opening the Bible) so here goes.'

He opened the Bible at the words, 'Come unto me all ye that weary and are heavy laden and I will give you rest.'

'Well,' said he, 'that is very odd. I have opened to the only verse in the Bible that I could ever learn by heart, when I was in the Sunday-school; I never could for the life of me, commit another It is very strange! but who is this me, that is mentioned in the verse?'

The pious soldier asked if he did not know.

He replied he did not.

The good man then explained it to him: spoke to him of Jesus, and exhibited the truth and invitations of the gospel. They walked to the house of the chaplain, where they had further conversation; the result was, that from that hour he became a changed man, and was as noted for exemplary conduct, as before he had been for his wickedness.

Some time after this conversation, the regiment in which he was, engaged with the enemy; at the close of which the pious soldier, in walking through the field of blood, beheld under a large spreading oak, the dead body of James, his head reclining on his Bible, which was opened at the passage, 'Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden and I will give you rest.' Poor James had gone to his eternal rest.

Mr. Dudley said he had frequently held the Bible in his hand; there was no less than 50 pages stained with the blood of poor James. How encouraging, said Mr. Dudley, is this for Sabbath-school teachers to persevere; for, should there be but one seed sown, it might as in the case of the widow's son, produce a plentiful harvest. The only verse he ever committed to memory, was the means in the hand of the Holy Spirit, of bringing him out of darkness into marvellous light; and James is now, we trust, joining the song of the redeemed in heaven.

SECOND ADVENT.

It is well known that the study of prophecy has been subject to a variety of fortunes,—at certain times engrossing a large share of the attention of the church, and at other periods being permitted to fall into almost total neglect. If all 'Scripture be written for our learning,' certainly prophecy must have a lesson for us to study. The same has been the impression of large numbers of biblical students, both in ancient and modern times. The investigation by different minds, of this branch of theology, however, has led to different results.—Two prominent theories have been adopted. These theories relate to the coming and kingdom of Christ, to the millennium, the judgment, the resurrection, and the time of the destruction of the world; and on these points they divide the one from the other, and take directly antagonistic grounds. There are other points on which there are differences of opinion,—such as the restoration of the Jews, the final residence of the saints, the interpretation of the symbolical prophecies which relate to Antichrist, &c., but there are disagreements which belong rather to individuals than to these two systems. The fundamental points we have named, form the strictly dividing lines.

Presuming that to be true of most of our readers, which, till quite recently, was true of ourselves, namely, that they are unacquainted with the peculiarities of these two systems, it will be proper for us to state, in the outset, what we understand their respective advocates to teach.

The supporters of what may be called the past millennial views, maintain that the millennium is to be the glorious consummation, or closing period of the present Christian dispensation,—into which the world will enter, by the gradual, but sublime triumphs of the gospel of Christ over the hearts of men, and during which, for a thousand years, the church will enjoy immunity from oppression without, and blessedness from purity within. They teach that the kingdom of Christ means, primarily, his spiritual reign in the hearts of his people, during the whole of the Christian dispensation, that Christ will come to judge the world at the closing of the millennium; that the dead of all time, the just and the unjust, will then be raised; that the judgment then to take place, will occupy a short period of time, corresponding to a solar day of twelve or twenty-four hours; and that, at that point of time, the world will be destroyed.

On the other hand, the advocates of the pre-millennial system believe that Christ will make his appearance before the millennium; that he will come, according to the declaration of the angels, in the same visible manner that he was seen to go into heaven from the Mount of Olives, that he will come suddenly and unexpectedly, when the world is eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, and pursuing its worldly pleasures, as it was in the days of Noah They hold that 'at the brightness of his coming,' the wicked will be destroyed, the rod of every oppressor be broken, and all antichristian power and influences be prostrated in the dust; that Christ will then establish the kingdom so often spoken of in Scripture, and will himself, personally and visibly, 'reign on the throne of his father David;' that his kingdom will be continued under Christ as king for a thousand years, and will be identical with the millennium. The judgment, they also believe, will cover the same period of a thousand years, synchronizing throughout with the kingly reign of Christ, and answering to what St. Paul calls 'the day of the Lord,' and St. Peter, 'the day of God,' and which the latter declares 'is with the Lord as a thousand years.' On the morning of this day, they think the dead saints will be raised, and the living changed, and both be raised into the air, to meet the Lord; that during their absence in the 'air,' the earth will be renovated by fire, and the righteous be judged; and that then Christ shall return with his saints, and enter upon his kingly government of the world, when, literally, 'his dominion shall extend from sea to sea, and from the river even unto the ends of the earth.' They hold, that at the close of this millennial kingdom, the wicked will be called out of their graves, the earth and the sea will give up their dead, and death and hell the dead that are in them; and that all the dark host of this second resurrection, this harvest of wrath, not having their names written in the Lamb's book of life, will 'be cast into the lake of fire, which is the second death;' and that' then cometh the end;' the work of redemption being completed, a sin-stricken world regenerated, a revolted province of God's government restored to allegiance, the Mediator 'will deliver up the kingdom to the Father,' resume his place in the mysterious Godhead, and God, thenceforward, 'be all in all.'

FORGIVENESS.

There is no feeling more consistent with our better nature, or more in accordance with the dictates of the noble soul, than that which prompts us to forgive and forget an injury inflicted in days gone by. Yet reasonable as this may seem to the intelligent mind, still there are those, who, unsatisfied with all the revenge that they could reap in life, would follow to the silent tomb, and engrave there the sins of youthful days. Yes, and we often even find those who profess to be followers of the "meek and lowly Jesus," in possession of this unforgiving spirit.—Though in vain they search the great volume of inspiration—or gaze upon the broad page of nature's works—no lesson is here taught, save that of forgiveness. And he who would follow the example and precept of his master, must be willing even to forgive an enemy. Some may allege by way of excuse, that it is a task to forgive an intentional wrong; yet the experience of the world has proved that it is less difficult to forgive, than to seek a useless revenge.—Where is the individual who would not seek his pillow with a heart more at ease, after having forgiven an enemy, than he who has imbrued his hands in a fellow-being's blood? The spirit of forgiveness yields more happiness to the possessor, than can possibly be enjoyed by any one deprived of this feeling. Then, if we would enjoy the reward of virtue—and escape the lasting pangs of remorse—let us be ever ready to extend the hand of forgiveness to those who have once wronged us. By taking this course, we shall strengthen the bonds of friendship—give peace to the mind—and prepare the soul for a flight beyond the tomb. If you would learn the fate of the unforgiving heart, go to the prison-house or stand beside the scaffold and you will see the result of revenge and crime. Ask the victim who is about to pay the forfeit of his guilt, by yielding up his life, why in the prime of life he stands upon the verge of eternity: and the answer comes back upon your ear that tells in accents loud "the revenue of an unforgiving injury." But how different the last moment of the dying Christian—he ever prays for those who have revenged themselves on him, and with a smile forgives the world, as his spirit is about to seek a "mansion in the skies."—Whitehall Chronicle.

'Willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord.' 2 Cor. v. 8.

This seems to have been very much, in the beginning of the gospel, a common experience. Hence we read of looking for that blessed hope: waiting for his Son from heaven: loving his appearing: hasting unto the coming of the day of God: and crying amen, even so come, Lord Jesus.—Those also, who were called by divine grace at the reformation in Germany, and at the revival of evangelical religion in our own country, (England) seemed familiar with death, were not shocked to be reminded of their age and infirmities, and loved to talk with each other of going home.

William Jay.

Preaching Christ.—The man does not preach Christ, who does not truly declare who and what he is. On this particular, an error must be fundamental,—not a trivial and harmless mistake, but one which enters deeply into the nature of the Gospel, affecting the very vitals of that system of truth which is comprised in the preaching of the Cross. The supreme divinity of Jesus Christ we hold to be a doctrine of the Scriptures, as clearly and decidedly revealed as the reality of his manhood; and we connect it with the former particular, because we consider the Cross as having derived its atoning efficacy from the dignity of the sufferer—from his having been "God manifest in the flesh." It was He who is "the brightness of the Father's glory, the express image of his person, and who upholdeth all things by the word of His power," who "by himself, expiated our sins."—Wardlaw.

A Picture of Life.—To-day we behold man in the glory and power of his strength: to-morrow, we see him prostrated in the arms of death.

AN AFFECTING STORY.

Jack is a Methodist local preacher. In one of his sermons he told this story.—'When I was a lad, there were no religious people near where I lived. But I had a young master about my age, who was going to school; and he was very fond of me. At night, he would come into the kitchen to teach me the lesson he had learned himself during the day at school. In this way I learned to read.

'When I was well-nigh grown up,' said Jack, 'we took up the New Testament, and agreed to read it verse by verse. When one would make a mistake, the other was to correct him, so that we could learn to read well.

'In a short time, we both felt that we were sinners before God, and we both agreed to seek the salvation of our souls. The Lord heard our prayer, and gave us both a hope in Christ. Then I began to hold meetings for prayer and exhortation among the colored people.

'My old master soon found out what was going on, He was very angry, especially because his son had become pious. He forbid my holding any more meetings, saying that if I did, he would whip me severely for it.

'From that time, I continued to preach or exhort on Sabbaths, and Sabbath nights; and on Monday morning my old master would tie me up, and cut my back to pieces with the cowhide, so that it never had time to get well. I was obliged to do my work in a great deal of pain from day to day.

'Thus I lived nearly a year and a half. One Monday morning my master, as usual, had made my fellow slaves tie me to a shade tree in the yard, after stripping my back naked to receive the cowhide. It was a beautiful morning in the summer time, and the sun shone very bright. Every thing around looked pleasant. He came up to me with cool deliberation, took his stand, and looked at me closely, but the cowhide hung still at his side His conscience was at work, and it was a great moment in his life.

'Well, Jack,' said he, 'your back is covered all over with scars and sores, and I see no place to begin to whip. You obstinate wretch, how long do you intend to go on in this way?'

'Why, master, just as long as the Lord will let me live,' was my reply.

'Well, what is your design in it?'

'Why, master, in the morning of the resurrection, when my poor body shall rise from the grave, I intend to show these scars to my Heavenly Father, as so many witnesses of my faithfulness in his cause here upon earth.'

'He ordered them to untie me, and sent me to hoe corn in the field. Late in the evening he came along, pulling a weed here, and a weed there, till he got to me, and then told me to sit down.

'Jack,' said he, 'I want you to tell me the truth. You know that for a long time your back has been sore from the cowhide; you have had to work very hard, and are a poor slave. Now tell me, are you happy or not, under such troubles as these?'

'Yes, master, I believe I am as happy a man as there is on earth.'

'Well, Jack,' said he, 'I am not happy. Religion, you say, teaches you to pray for those that injure you. Now, will you pray for your old master, Jack?'

'Yes, with all my heart,' said I.

'We kneeled down, and I prayed for him. He came again and again to me. I prayed for him in the field, till he found peace in the blood of the Lamb. After this we lived together like brothers, in the same church. On his death-bed he gave me my liberty, and told me to go on preaching as long as I lived, and meet him at last in heaven.

'I have seen,' said Jack, 'many Christians whom I loved, but I have never seen any I loved so well as my old master. I hope I shall meet him in heaven.'—West. Chris. Advocate.

A PARABLE.

In a solitary place among the groves, a child was wandering whithersoever he would.

He believed himself alone and wist not that one watched him from the thicket, and that the eye of his parent was on him continually; neither did he mark whose hand had opened a way for him thus far.

All things that he saw were new to him—therefore he feared nothing.

He cast himself down in the long grass, and as he lay, he sang till his voice of joy rang through the woods.

When he nestled among the flowers, a serpent arose in the midst of them; and when the child saw how its burnished coat glittered in the sun like the rainbow, he stretched forth his hand to take it to his bosom.

And the child sprang up, and gazed above and around, to know whence the voice came; but when he saw not, he presently remembered it no more.

He watched how a butterfly burst from its shell, and flitted faster than he could pursue, and soon rose far above his reach.

When he gazed and could trace its flight no more, his father put forth his hand and pointed where the butterfly ascended, even into the clouds.

But the child saw not the sign.

A fountain gushed forth amidst the shadows of the trees, and its waters flowed into a deep and quiet pool.

The child kneeled on the brink, and looking in, he saw his own bright face, and it smiled upon him.

As he stooped yet nearer to meet it, a voice once more said, 'beware!'

'The child started back; but he saw that a gust ruffled the waters, and he said within himself, 'it was but the voice of the breeze.'

And when the broken sunbeams glanced on the moving waves, he laughed and dipped his foot, that the waters might again be ruffled: and the coolness was pleasant to him.

The voice was now louder, but he regarded it not, as the wind bore it away.

At length he saw something glittering in the pool; and he plunged in to reach it.

As he sank, he cried aloud for help.

Ere the waters had closed over him, his father's hand was stretched out to save him.

And while he yet shivered with chillness and fear, his parent said to him,

'Mine eye was upon thee, and thou didst not heed; neither hast thou beheld my sign, nor hearkened to my voice. If thou hadst thought on me I had not been hidden.'

Then the child cast himself on his father's bosom and said—

'Be nigh unto me still; and mine eyes shall wait on thee, and mine ears shall be open unto thy voice forevermore.'

Why should the young give their hearts to God?

1. Because God has commanded them to do it.

2. Because youth is the best time to do it.

3. Because life is so short and uncertain.

2. Because the soul is of infinite value.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, November 23, 1842.

I am a Christian.

The most interesting train of reflections accompany the expression at the head of this article. He who can in the light of the searching truths of the gospel, humbly and yet confidently feel that he is a christian, enjoys more than an angel's honor, and feels emotions far above a seraph's power. A Christian! What is he? Not a conqueror, not a statesman, not a man of worldly honor or worldly possessions, not a man whom all honor, not a man to whom the tide of prosperity and freedom from want and suffering flows unceasingly. No these are not the Christian's characteristics. But like him whom he loves, he is a man who treads the humble walks of life, and whose lot is not to be ministered to by obsequious vassals, but to be himself the servant, to comfort the afflicted, to reprove of sin and point sinners to the lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world. He has here no continuing city, neither are his affections placed on things of this life, but on the things that are above at the right hand of God, where he soon hopes to be clasped in the everlasting embrace of his Savior's arms.

The Christian is born of God. He is a new creature. The traits that characterized the Lord Jesus Christ are the principles that he cultivates in his own heart and exhibits in his deportment. He is not satisfied with a name to live while he is dead in trespasses and in sins. He does not simply yield his assent to the doctrines of the gospel and then in practice deny them, but with the Psalmist he devoutly exclaims, "O, how love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day." And again, with an apostle, he is persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, now powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate him from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus his Lord.

The Christian is a redeemed sinner. Once he was plunged low in sin, but now being born of God he aspires after purity of heart and immortal life. His heart despises the things it before loved, and his aspiring soul can not rest under the contaminating influence of sin. And as he contemplates that grace so free and so unmerited that redeems him, a willing and heartfelt song of praise ascends to God. Being redeemed by the blood of Christ, he is an heir of immortal glory, and is "hastening on to the abodes of the blessed, to join the full choir of glorified ones in singing the song of Moses and the Lamb." Who can contemplate the Christian's glorious rest in heaven, and his employment before the throne of God and the Lamb, and the angels of light as his companions, and not wish to be a Christian?—He who can adopt the language, and from his heart feel it to be, "I am a Christian," has this glorious prospect before him. 'Tis no visionary dream. God who has redeemed him has promised it.

The Christian is the temple of the Holy Ghost. How honored! God by his spirit takes his abode in his heart to comfort, to guide, to bless and save. Who would not have such a guest, and who would not hold converse with a being so pure, so lovely and divine?

An infinite variety of motives to holiness and obedience cluster around the Christian. Since all that God requires of him for his redeeming grace, is, simply, that he should be holy and obey him, who can be so regardless of his eternal interests as not to readily yield? The holy spirit will not abide in the heart that is defiled with sin. It can not hold communion with iniquity. How greatly unwise is he who thrusts away the spirit of God that he may enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. If a man be not a Christian, he can have no communion with God, no hope in his death, no joy in his resurrection, no happiness in eternity. But when he can in the light of truth, and in review of his conduct, and from the emotions and aspirations of his heart, feel and say, "I am a Christian," he has arrived at the climax of human greatness, and is so exalted that nothing can add to his honor, his treasures, his peace, his glory, but the fruition of his hope, his eternal repose in the bosom of God, and inseparable union with Christ in his kingdom.

"Mixed Communion."—The Barre, (Me.,) Baptist Association, has adopted as a circular, a lecture of Rev. J. Knapp, against "Mixed Communions," as they are pleased to call them, These objections are, "1. It has no tendency to increase brotherly love. 2. It has no tendency to bring the different denominations together. 3. It is like the fifth wheel of a coach, uncalled for. 4. It compels churches to commune with its excommunicated members, and 5. It compels them to commune with persons guilty of crimes for which they ought to be excommunicated."

There is one other reason which the writer seems to have overlooked; it is unauthorized by the law of Christ. Our Savior and his Apostles established but one church, and they knew of no communion but with that church. With that church, it is the duty of all Christians to communicate. With any other church, there is no authority for communion.—Church Chronicle.

So far, decidedly good. One more item to complete the argument. The church so established by our Savior, was a congregation of baptized believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, to whom "such" only were ever added, "as should be saved." How any church can arrogate to itself the honor of being exclusively primitive, which, by its own confession, is obliged to leave the inspired teachings of Christ and his Apostles to search for so important an ordinance as baptism in uninspired tradition, passes the comprehension of 'simple folk' very decidedly.—Christian Secretary.

Both good as far as they go. But one important item is still left out of sight. That one church established by Christ was a congregation of baptized believers who had separated themselves to the service of God, to obey him in all things, and be followers of Jesus Christ. How then those can claim purity above all others who neither obey the commands of God, nor follow the example of Christ in all things, we are at a loss to see. And further, there is an incongruity in accusing of leaving the inspired teachings of Christ and his Apostles to sustain one theory, when they who do it, resort to the same manner of proof for another thing of equal importance. Our brethren will therefore pardon us for withdrawing from every brother that walketh disorderly and not after the tradition of the Apostles.

"Christian Index."—The paper bearing the above name comes to us this week containing notice of a sale of some fifteen souls, for whom Christ died. What is the difference between selling Christ, or those for whom he yielded up his life on the cross? If the paper publishes such matter, would it not be more consistent to head it Judasism Index.

A Christian Index points to the golden rule, viz: Love to God with all the heart, and love to man as to himself. A Judasism Index we should judge would point to the selling of Christ, or those who are the purchase of his blood for thirty or more pieces of silver. We leave the matter to the reflection of our readers, suggesting to them to "prove all things and hold fast that which is good."

The Baptist Expositor.

We have received the first number of the above monthly paper of 32 pages, published at Columbus, Ga., and edited by Joseph S. Baker. The first volume will be devoted to the principles of church government. The second and subsequent volumes will trace the origin of the leading denominations of the day, and expose their dangerous tendency. We hope our brother may go at the latter part of his work with "clean hands."

☞We especially commend the article entitled the "Slanderer" to the consideration of our readers. Avoid the slanderer as you would the midnight assassin, and be careful not to be one yourself.

Texas.—The Texans are all in arms against Mexico. The Mexicans 3,000 strong were fortifying themselves at Presido del Rio Grand. About 3,000 Texans were to take up the line of march for the frontier on the 10th inst. The people were incited by a lively desire for revenge and justice and the Mexicans.

For the Register.

The Slanderer.

What is Slander? and who is the Slanderer? Slander, according to Dr. Barrow, is "uttering false speeches against our neighbor, to the prejudice of his fame, safety, welfare; and that out of malignity, vanity, rashness, ill-nature or bad design. The principal kinds of slander are these:—1. Charging others with facts they are not gulty of. 2. Affixing scandalous names and odious characters which they deserve not. 3. Aspersing a man's actions with foul names, importing that they proceed from evil principles, or tend to bad ends, when it doth not or can not appear. 4. Perverting a man's words or acts disadvantageously by affected misconstruction. 5. Partial or lame representation of men's discourse or practice, suppressing some part of the truth, or concealing some circumstances which ought to be explained. 6. Instilling sly suggestions, which create prejudice in the hearers. 7. Magnifying and aggravating the faults of others. 8. Imputing to our neighbor's practice, judgment, or profession, evil consequences which have no foundation in truth."

Thus "slander" is portrayed in all its most odious features, and in a style so clear and simple, that the fool, even, need not err, and thus inflict wounds in the hearts of those who are doomed to be the subjects of his hot displeasure. And, perhaps, notwithstanding all the light which has emanated from the Bible, from the pulpit, and from the religious press on this subject, there is scarcely any community, over which the gospel has so completely triumphed, in which the slanderer is not to be met and combatted. There may be some communities and societies, in which the slanderer stands in the back-ground, and is therefore not so easily detected as in others; yet, he is none the less to be dreaded, for of all characters in society the slanderer is the most odious, and the most successful in producing mischief. "His tongue," says the great Massillon, "is a devouring fire, which tarnishes whatever it touches; which exercises its fury on the good grain equally as on the chaff; on the profane as on the sacred; which, wherever it passes, leaves only desolation and ruin; digs even into the bowels of the earth; turns into vile ashes what only a moment before had appeared to us so precious and brilliant; acts with more violence and danger than ever, in the time when it was apparently smothered up and almost extinct; which blackens what it cannot consume, and sometimes sparkles and delights before it destroys."

Indeed, against the "slanderer" there is no adequate defense. Although a judgment of a thousand or two thousand dollars may be obtained against the vile creature in an action at Law, yet this is in no degree adequate to the damages sustained by the slandered person. Dollars and cents will bear no comparison with the character of an honest man—with a christian—with a being created in the image of his Maker! The comparison fails for the want of that dignity which characterizes the man above the brute. In what favorable light, then, can the slanderer be viewed? Why, hell can not boast so foul a fiend, nor man deplore so fell a foe! The slanderer stabs with a word—with a smile. He is like the pestilence walking in darkness, spreading destruction far and wide, and whom the most wary traveler can not avoid; he is like the poisoned arrow, whose wound is incurable; he is as the mortal sting of the deadly adder,—murder his employment, innocence his prey, and ruin his sport. The man who meets me on the public road and robs me of my property does me an injury—he involves me in difficulty and brings my family to want; but he does me an injury which can be repaired. But the man—man do I say?—pardon the inconsistency—fiend in human shape I should rather have said,—who circulates false reports concerning my character; who exposes every act of my life which can be tortured to my disadvantage; who goes to the places of public resort, and there gathers a crowd around him and villifies my name, distorts my public and private acts into shapeless incongruities on some hypothetical or abstract suppositions,—I say the man who "filches from me my good name," in this manner, "steals" not "trash," but does me an injury which neither industry, nor charity, nor dollars untold, nor time itself can ever repair. He has told his tale of slander to an uncharitable world. Some may receive it as truth; others suspect that the half has not been told them; and others dress it in their own highest coloring.—Should I prove myself innocent, and attempt to meet the scandal with contradiction, the story of my disgrace, flying "swifter than a weaver's shuttle," outstrips me, or solicitude to contradict it at once excites suspicion of guilt. I might as well attempt to stop the wind, or disrobe the stars of their brilliancy and hurl them from their throne, as to recall the infamy, or wipe the foul stain from my character, which has been affixed by the tongue of the slanderer.

Happy the community who has not this blighting "sirocco" in their midst; and thrice happy the christian who suffers not the slanders of a gain-saying world to dissuade him from his duty, and his allegiance to the cause of truth in the world. Political "aspirants" may, in their unguarded moments, seek to destroy the influence of those who will not bow the knee to the shrine of party; yet their arrows, when aimed at the virtuous, fall harmless at their own feet. The tongue of such, when directed in such a cause, although emitting the fragrance of their own corrupt hearts to the world, are no slander. The poison will recoil upon the head of its vendor, while the victim escapes unscathed.

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

Inasmuch as information was given through the Register some time since, it may not be improper for me to report myself to the friends of the mission for which I was engaged, through the same channel.

Soon after I received my appointment, I performed a short tour of some two weeks preparatory to farther labor, but immediately upon this I was taken sick of ague and fever which continued with me for six months. Other sicknesses hindered me until this fall. I have now resumed my labors and have just returned from a tour of some three weeks.

I left home Oct. 16th, traveled to Cowlesville, Wyoming County, twelve miles distance from Clarence, preached in the forenoon. In the afternoon rode to Aurora, Erie County, preached in the evening to a large and attentive audience; by request I preached upon the subject of the Sabbath,—preached again the next evening—spent the next day in visiting from house to house, found Atheism Deism, and Universalism the prevailing isms of the place; after comparing the moral features of the three, found it difficult to decide in favor of either. Thought that if Universalism was the religion of Christ, it was very difficult to discover its moral worth.

Oct. 19. Traveled to Springfield 26 miles. I found in this place one family of Sabbath-keepers which has since removed to Clarence—in the evening heard Eld. Augustus Beach, of Pittsfield, Mass., lecture upon the second coming of Christ, which he supposed would be in 1843. He was intelligent and candid, his appearance was grave and solemn, but as to the correctness of many of his interpretations I entertain most decided doubts. My prayer, however, is, that whensoever my Lord shall come I may be found in readiness Preached in the same house the following evening and thought I had help of the Lord.

21. Rode to Persia, distance 25 miles. The next day was the Sabbath, and although it was rainy the congregation was quite large. I preached twice, and we had a refreshing and comfortable season, though piety with many is evidently at a very low ebb.

23. Traveled to Vilanovia, Chautauque County, distance 22 miles—attended meeting in the evening, heard a Free-will Baptist brother preach, and if he might be considered somewhat wanting in sound bible knowledge and logic, he was by no means deficient in zeal, and seemed with all a good man. Preached the next evening to a large, attentive and interesting congregation. There are in this place three families that observe the Sabbath, and I think it a good field for missionary labor. From this I traveled to Conewango, Cattaraugus Co., 16 miles. Here are five families that observe the Sabbath. I traveled here two days and preached once to a full and attentive house. My visit with these brethren was quite interesting and satisfactory, and a better field for Missionary labor I do not know. There are a number of things which render the prospects of the Sabbath cause in this place quite promising.

28. From this place I returned to Persia—preached in the afternoon preparatory to the communion which was to be administered the next day.

29. Sabbath—preached once and administered the Lord's supper—had an interesting time, many tears were shed, some of joy and some of grief. This church is passing through some very severe trials. Solomon said truly when he said, "one sinner destroyeth much good." The next day I traveled to Dayton. 10 miles—had an overflowing house, preached twice, traveled four miles and preached in the evening to a large and attentive audience—the next day went to Perrysburgh and preached in the evening to a full house, and the next day, Nov. 1, started for home where I arrived on the day following, having been gone from home about three weeks, having traveled something more than two hundred miles, preached thirteen discourses, and administered the Lord's supper once.

N. V. HULL.

Clarence, Nov, 8, 1842.

News of the Day.

Distribution of the Public Lands.—Mr. Lewis Benedict of Albany, the agent appointed by Governor Seward to receive New-York's share of the proceeds of the land sales, has returned from Washington with eighty-four thousand nine hundred and seventy-four dollars in his pocket. This is the portion of New-York State.

Indictment of Col. Webb.—The Grand Jury on Monday morning brought in a bill against Col. Watson Webb, on a charge of felony, in leaving the State for the purpose of giving or receiving a challenge to fight a duel, the former indictment having been defective, as has been previously published, on account of the former not having averred that the defendant did either give or receive a challenge to Thomas F. Marshall, and therefore had not committed any offense against the laws of this State. The present bill charges that Col. Webb did receive a challenge, and covers the whole ground. Col. Webb appeared and gave bail in $10,000 to answer the charge.

A merchant left Detroit, Michigan, on the 13th ult. for New-York, to purchase goods. In 17 days thereafter his merchandize was received at his store, at the West. This is quick work.

Re-married at Norwich, Ct., on the 6th instant, by Rev. H. P. Arms, Mr. Asa H. Burchard to Mrs Emily Burchard. In this re-union of ruptured ties is seen one of the triumphs of temperance. A family for years distracted, dismembered and rendered wretched by the demon of strong drink, is by the magic charm of the Washingtonian pledge, restored to 'the walks of virtuous life.' Peace and happiness have returned to their desolate dwelling, and hope beams upon their future prospects.

On the 8th instant, in the Assembly of New-Jersey, the Speaker presented a communication from the Governor, enclosing a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, stating that the share of New-Jersey from the sale of the public lands, being $12,050.42, was ready, and would be paid on application by the authorized officer of the State. On the same day, Isaac Southard was elected State Treasurer.

One thousand one hundred bales of Cotton and a Steamboat burnt.—This morning, the steamboat Maid of Arkansas, bound from Yazoo to New Orleans, took fire below Carrollton, when, so rapid was the progress of the flames, that the crew and passengers had barely time to save themselves. The cargo of cotton, and the boat, down to the water's edge, were burnt.—N. O. Cour. Nov. 3.

Shock of an Earthquake.—The Montreal Courier says: The shock of an earthquake was felt in this city on Monday morning, the 7th inst., between the hours of 8 and 9. The shock was very perceptible, and resembled the rolling of heavy artillery. It was also experienced at Lachine, Three Rivers, and several other places.

Another Indian Treaty.—The Detroit Advertiser says, that Mr. Stewart, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, who left that city two months since, to hold a treaty with the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior, has returned, having concluded the important treaty on terms highly favorable to the United States. Michigan will be particularly benefitted by it. All the Indian lands within the boundaries of the State, are now ceded to the United States. By this treaty, about fifteen millions of acres are ceded; about eight millions of which lie in Michigan, and seven millions in Wiskonsan.

New Jersey.—The Council, by a vote of 10 to 8, (a party vote) have concurred with the Assembly in passing the bill dividing the State into Congressional Districts, and it is now a law of the land. The Districts are as follows:

1st. Cumberland, Gloucester, Atlantic, Salem, and Cape May.
2d. Burlington, Monmouth, and Mercer.
3d. Hunterdon, Warren, and Sussex.
4th. Somerset, Middlesex, and Morris.
5th. Essex, Hudson, Bergen, and Passaic.

Unless a special session of Congress should be called, New Jersey will not elect her members till next October.

Mexico and Texas.—It is stated with confidence, in the Courier des Etats Unis, upon the faith of recent private letters from Paris, that the French and English Governments have determined to unite in offering their mediation between Mexico and Texas to the end of inducing the recognition by Mexico of the independence of Texas, and of consolidating peace between them.

Horrible Murder.—On Sunday night a most diabolical and cruel murder was perpetrated at Old Field, about four miles from Huntington, L. I. The victims were Alexander Smith and his wife Rebecca, both advanced in years. Their heads were found dashed to pieces, evidently with a stone hammer. The perpetrator of this horrible act is unknown, but suspicions are entertained against a German, about 23 years of age, who had been a few days in the employ of Mr. Smith, and is now missing.

The Western Lake Trade.—The following interesting statement is from the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser. The first part of the statement shows the total quantities of the principal article unladed at Buffalo during the single month of Oct. last; the whole number of arrivals during that month being 304, and the departures 341.

The same paper gives a similar statement for the same month, in each of the four years from 1839 to 1842 inclusive, as follows:

Years.	Arrivals.	Wheat.	Flour.	Corn.
Oct. 1839,	247	271,303	54,015

Governor Porter has received official information that the amount due Pennsylvania from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, is $60,000, which will be paid upon application.—Mr. Mann, the State Treasurer, is authorized to receive it.

There was a very serious riot at Schenectady, N. Y., during the election on the 8th inst., originating, it is said, with the Irish, and was not quelled until midnight. Two men were killed and several somewhat injured. It threatened to be a terrible affair at one time, and the militia were ordered out by the authorities.

A Grand Festival.—A letter from Berlin says:—"In the month of August, of the next year, a great festival will take place in our capital, and probably all over Germany. That year will be the thousandth anniversary of the Independence of this country, it being in the month of August, 843, that the celebrated treaty of Vendun was concluded, by virtue of which Germany was separated from France and Italy, to which it had been joined since the time of Charlemagne. It was then placed under the sceptre of Louis the German, (grandson of Charlemagne,) who thus became the first King of Germany."

Singular case of Conscience.—The Bangor Whig relates a curious illustration of the power of conscience, which took place in that city last Thursday. During the session of the Court, a person by the name of Flint, of Lee, came into the Court House and deliberately walked up to the witness-box, and seated himself in it, placing his head on the front rail. After sitting in that posture for a few minutes, he raised himself in his seat and commenced praying for forgiveness for having committed perjury on that stand. The Court here interposed, and the officer took the man from the room. As, however, he seemed impressed with the duty of making confession for his crime in the place where he committed it, the Sheriff kindly offered him an opportunity of doing so during the recess of the Court after its adjournment for dinner. At the time appointed he took the stand, and there made a full confession of the crime, and detailed all the circumstances attending it. The false testimony was rendered in an action tried at the May term, 1819, in which his father was defendant, and one Isaac Hacker, plaintiff. His testimony, though false, did not, however, alter the result of the cause, a default having been suffered notwithstanding the evidence. Since that time it seems the witness had undergone an infinite deal of remorse and trouble on account of the act, and he felt that he could not be forgiven, or at ease till the crime was confessed in as public a place as it was committed. The witness bore no marks of being otherwise insane, and he protested that he was in his right mind, and knew perfectly well what he was about. He came all the way from Lee, 70 miles, for the express purpose of making the confession, and having made it, returned peaceably home. He is known to be a person of respectability and intelligence, and during the recital of the circumstances connected with the case, was frequently overcome with grief and tears.

A Touching Incident.—The Delavan Temperance Society, whose hall is in Cherry street above Sixth, had a most interesting and profitable meeting on Saturday night. Rev. John Chambers and Lewis C. Levin, Esq. were the principal speakers of the evening, and seldom have those gentleman delighted an audience with such powerful and eloquent addresses. The hall was most densely crowded, and the street in front filled with anxious listeners. While Mr. Chambers was speaking, a man who had been occupying a seat in the distant part of the room, arose with a little boy in his arms scarce six years old and came forward to the speaker's stand; all gave way for him. He placed his child on the stand, and while the tears were running fast down his cheeks and with his trembling accents addressed the speakers: "My little boy said to me, 'Father don't drink any more!' Gentlemen I have taken my last drink." The effect produced upon the audience beggars all description. The speakers, with the audience, were bathed in tears; and such was the good effects of this example, that seventeen others came forward and signed the pledge. Mr. Chambers, with tears streaming down his face, caught the boy in his arms, exclaiming, "Well may we say that the grave of Alcohol has been dug by this little boy!" At the meeting held at the hall on the Saturday night previous thirty-five names were obtained to the pledge, one of whom was a tavern keeper. The Society is destined to work a great moral reformation in its neighborhood.—Phila. Ledger.

The American Aloe.—We learn that more than 3,500 have visited the century aloe now exhibiting at Mr Thornburn's, in John street, and the handsome sum of $800 is now in hand for the Orphan Asylum. The committee feel very grateful to the public for their liberality, and hope to raise $1,000, which will gladden many youthful hearts. Those who wish to see it had better avail themselves of this week, as it will be past its beauty after that time.—N. Y. Com. Advertiser.

Sub-marine Telescope.—This is a contrivance for lighting up the dominions of the deep, invented by a lady—Mrs. Mather, of Brooklyn—who obtained a patent for her invention last July. It consists simply of a common lamp, enclosed in a glass globe about eighteen inches in diameter. The lamp thus protected from the water, is, when submerged, supplied with air by means of tubes which rise above the top of the water. There is also a large tube between these two, for the escape of the smoke and gas from the lamp to the surface.

This instrument we saw in operation last evening, at the American Museum, in a vessel of water about four and a half feet deep. A pin at the bottom could be as distinctly seen as though there had been no water in the vessel. The inventor says that objects have been distinctly seen by means of the lamp alone, in our harbor, 22 feet below the surface, at a distance of from fifteen to twenty feet from the light. When the lamp is sunk lower than this a telescope is needed. Objects may thus be discovered at almost any depth.

The apparatus it is thought will be very useful in the discovery of sunken wrecks, in the construction of fortifications, and all works extending to the water. No vessel, it is predicted, will, ere long, go to sea without it, as, by attaching a mirror to the telescope, the bottom and keel of a ship may be examined when under full sail.—This instrument has been seen and approved by several engineers and naval gentlemen. It is exhibited only in the evening.—Com. Adv.

Presence of Mind in a Woman.—The Hartford Courant relates the following expedient by which Mrs. Clark, formerly Miss Perkins of Norwich, Ct., saved her life and that of her two daughters—being on board the steamboat Vermillion lately burnt on Lake Huron. Her daughters were one six and the other twelve years of age. 'They were at the stern of the boat, and finding no other way of escape, she dropped them into the water, giving them directions to seize hold of a chain as they rose, which she pointed out, and which was attached to the boat. Seeing them successful, she jumped into the water herself, and they all three kept hold of the chain until assistance came to their relief.'

Horrible Outrage.—In the Runinsas (Iowa) Gazette we find the most extraordinary and cruel relation of circumstances that we believe ever went forth in type.—An old man lived alone, had forbidden a daughter, who lived near, and her husband, or even their children, ever to approach his place, on account merely of some whimsical pique that the old man had taken against his child. One morning the inhuman being found his grand child, under three years of age, climbing upon his garden rail, and he deliberately went for his rifle and shot the boy dead. The victim fell inside of the fence. The old man reloaded and sat watching. Not long after the mother came seeking her child, and the minute she touched her father's garden rail, as she did with a shriek the instant she perceived her dead child, the old brute shot her in the temple and killed her stone dead on the spot. The hoary maniac (as he is now accounted) shot the father also when he came, and he is now in prison to answer for the three murders.

From Morocco.—Our difficulties with Morocco have not yet been adjusted. They are, if possible, in a worse position than ever—Your Government will have to send a large naval force, and coerce the Emperor into terms of amity and respect. The Bashaw of Tangier, who was appointed by the Emperor to treat with Com. Morgan, has refused to accede to his demands.

The matter has consequently been referred back again to the Emperor, who seems disposed to sustain the Bashaw. The U. S cannot recede with dignity and self-respect. Our Consul, Mr. Mullowny, has not been recognized by the Emperor, and is waiting permission to return home. He will be sent out again, I trust, with demands which the United States will be prepared to enforce.—Corres. Phil. N. Amer.

Protestantism is making rapid strides in France. In some localities the march is marvelous, and, if the movement continues to progress with its present steadiness, a great change will ultimately be effected in the religious character of the French people.

A diamond of the first water is sad to have been lately found in its native state, on the farm of Dr. Grimes, in Orange co. Va. It weighs "half and upwards of an eighth of a carat."

Miss Jane Craighead, of Harrisburg, Pa has just completed a quilt which is composed of 6,521 pieces, all of the same size and shape, but each one of a different pattern. It has occupied all her leisure time for sixteen years! She ought to take the first premium—a leather medal—for time-wasting.

The Westchester (Pa.) Railroad Company, have recently been suffering some for a serious accident that occurred on their road some time since. Last week John Stiles obtained against them a verdict for $3,148 for having two of his ribs broken by the accident. They had previously paid a verdict of $3,500 to John Evans and other passengers, for injuries received on the same occasion.

The Princeton, N. J., paper says, that the farmers near there are employing men at twenty-five cents per day and their provisions.

Mrs. J. Griswold, of Hanover Chautauque co., N. Y. fell into the fire a few days since and was burnt to death.

There was sold under an order of the United States Marshal, on the 7th inst., 673 pieces of cloths and cassimeres, forfeited to the United States by verdicts recently given in the United States Court.—They brought $30,200.

Governor Cass, our Minister, leaves Paris in the steamer of 17th Nov. for home. He has already broken up house keeping.

A Hen Witness.—Two men were lately apprehended in Stamfort market on suspicion of having stolen sixteen hens and nine chickens. Handbills were issued to find the owners; and on Monday, Mr. Peake, of Holme, having had nine chickens stolen came to Stamfort, bringing with him the hen which had reared the brood; she was set down in the room with the other hens and chickens, and the moment she gave one chirp, the whole of the chickens flew to her. Upon this one of the thieves confessed that the fowls and chickens were stolen on that night. He was fully committed for trial.—Stamford Mercury.

The Hon. Justice Story has declined to allow his name to be presented as a candidate for the Presidency, at the coming contest.

The dwelling house of Mr. John Thomas, near Chilicothe, Ohio, was recently consumed by fire, and the mother, a much esteemed elderly lady, perished in the flames.

The citizens of Fulton co., Missouri, were compelled to stand guard for a week, previous to the 22d ult., to prevent an apprehended insurrection of the blacks.—"The wicked flee when no man pursueth."

Two ladies were badly injured—one of them very dangerously, on the 8th inst. by the falling of a gutter from the eaves of the house No. 121 William street, N. Y. as they were passing. The gutter fell from sheer rottenness and weakness.

Singular Accident.—On the 7th inst., when the stage of the Wheeling line stopped at the office in Bedford, Pa., it was discovered that a mare which had been tied to one of the stage horses, had one of her forelegs broken, and it was found necessary to kill her. On a subsequent examination it was ascertained that the entire foot of the other forleg was wholly off, having separated where it united with the pastern joint. Search being made, the hoof was found at the distance of three-quarters of a mile from where the stage stopped, and that the animal had come that distance in the painful situation she was in when her life was taken. The accident is supposed to have occurred at a bridge about two miles west of Bedford, but that the hoof was not thrown off until the animal came to the place where it was found.

Camels.—Sir Robert Peel mentioned in Parliament that 29,000 of these animals perished in the late Affghan campaign, and the Bombay Times affirms that not less than 10,000 would be required for the removal of the troops from Jellalabad, whether in advance or retreat. Besides the army baggage, the pacific animal carries loads of rockets, shot, shells, and ammunition.

Forgery—A Sad Affair.—On Saturday, the 5th inst., it was discovered that Mr Esbon Husted, belonging to Greenwich, Ct., who was doing a large business, and was generally esteemed a man of great wealth, had forged several notes, which had been discounted for him. Thirty-three of the forged notes have already been discovered, amounting to $60,000. Twenty of the forgeries thus discovered, are perpetrated in the name of Mr. O. Peck, and the remainder in the names of the brothers Mead, who are his near neighbors. Mr. Husted was one of the most respected citizens of Greenwich, and a member of the church, and was possessed of property worth $25,000, and previous to the discovery, he was the last man upon whom suspicion could rest.

A Remedy for Smoky Chimneys.—Having examined a model of Espy's ventilator for chimneys, we are free to say that it seems to us, what it claims to be, an unfailing remedy for that terrible annoyance, a smoky room.

The ventilator consists of a hollow cylinder, or large pipe like a stove pipe, set in the top of a chimney, with a hollow cone fitted horizontally at the top of the pipe and turning like a vane with the wind, so that the mouth of the cone is always to leeward. This not only prevents the wind from ever blowing down the chimney, but as the wind sweeps along the sides of the cone a slight vacuum is produced just at its mouth by which the draft of the chimney is increased. This we suppose to be the principle of the ventilator, and we think it must always operate successfully.

A Shocking Death.—The Ohio Repository reports a most horrible affair:—"On the morning of the 3d inst., Mr. Valentine Weaver, a blacksmith of Canal Dover, Tuscarawas county, left that place in a buggy for Massillon, as he said to get some money.—In the evening the horse and buggy returned, with the dead body of Mr. Weaver, with a rope round his neck, and fastened to the axletree, much bruised. His pocket book and hat were found a short distance from town. From facts since disclosed, it appears probable that being unable to get money to pay a debt he owed, he did the act himself. He has left a family."

BY WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Governor of the State of New York.

A PROCLAMATION.

Thursday the eighth of December next is hereby appointed to be observed by the people of this state as a day of public Thanksgiving and Praise to Almighty God for the manifold blessings of the year.—We have tilled the earth in safety and gathered plentiful harvests; relieved labor by inventions of art and new applications of science; brought to successful termination works of physical improvement, designed to promote social intercourse and to guard against accidents to human life and augment its enjoyments; rendered our system of intellectual and moral instruction more equal and efficient, and acquired comprehensive knowledge of the agricultural, forest and mineral resources which Providence has supplied in the territory assigned for our habitation. The savage warfare which so long prevailed on the southern border of our country, scarcely less painful to humanity, whether our arms were victorious or were unsuccessful against a rude and injured people, has ceased. Commotions which threatened to involve a sister state, and even the whole American family, in the calamities of civil war, and thus repress the growing confidence of mankind in their capacity of self-government, have peacefully subsided; and our controversies with a distinguished European nation have been adjusted by a treaty securing reciprocal advantages, and directing the efforts of both states to the removal of a great reproach upon Christendom, by the extirpation of the slave trade. Philanthropy has not abated her zeal within our borders, while extending her visitations to distant regions; and the labors of Philosophy throughout the civilized world have been crowned with discoveries tending to ameliorate human life and elevate the dignity of mankind.

Let us reverently acknowledge that these and all the blessings we enjoy, descend from HIM by whom the nations of the earth are governed in righteousness, and all human affairs are regulated and controlled with infinite wisdom and mercy.

Given under my hand and the privy seal
of the state, at the city of Albany
L. S. this seventh day of November,
in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-two,
and the sixty-seventh year of American independence.

Notices.

At the next meeting of the De Ruyter Lyceum, which will occur on Monday evening 28th inst., the following question will be discussed.

Ought Animal Magnetism to be ranked with the Sciences?

WM. D. COCHRAN, Vice Pres't.
E. P. BLY, Sec'y.

NOTICE TO ALL CONCERNED.

The title of the lot which was designed as the burial ground, near the Seventh-Day Baptist Meeting-house, is yet with the subscriber, and as no arrangement has been made for a change of title, it is thought proper to call the attention of all interested to the subject. The subscriber will hold himself ready to comply with the terms proposed for two weeks from the date hereof, and if at the end of that time no arrangement is made, an opportunity will be given for those who have friends buried there, to remove their remains from the premises, if done within a reasonable time thereafter.

JAMES WHITFORD.

De Ruyter, Nov. 10, 1842.

WANTED,

Any amount of wood, hay, grain, pork, butter, lard, tallow, lumber, apples, &c., at this office, in payment of unsettled newspaper accounts.

PROPOSALS

For publishing a History of the Seventh-Day Baptist Denomination.

It is intended to publish a full and complete History of the Seventh-day Baptists, from their origin to the present time, giving an account of their progress and operations, including short Biographical sketches of some of their most distinguished members, together with a history of their benevolent operations, and a brief manual of the doctrines of the gospel as held by them.

As full an account as practicable will be given of their origin and numbers in England.

The size of the work, price, time and manner of publication, will be determined when the facts are collected. It will be published on individual responsibility.

Such persons as have facts in their possession on this subject are requested to transmit them as soon as convenient; and we respectfully request the Clerk, or some other person, in every Church, or settlement, to give us as full an account as is possible of the origin of their church, number of members, names of Ministers that have been members, their age, time of death, (if dead,) number and time of Revivals, with the number of additions, and whatever else of interest that has been or may be connected with their history.

☞ All communications on the subject may be addressed to the "Editor of the S D. B. Register, De Ruyter, N. Y."

SHERIFF'S SALE.

BY VIRTUE of one writ of Fieri Facias, issued out of the Supreme Court of the People of the State of New York, and to me directed and delivered, against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of Adia Burdick, I have levied on, seized, and taken all the right, title, claim and interest, of the said Burdick, of and to the following described pieces of land, on the 24th day of December, 1840 or at any time since, all that certain piece or parcel of land situate in the 18th township, town of Brookfield, county of Madison, being part of lot No. 60 & 69, and bounded as follows: Beginning at the south east corner of lot No. 69, thence west to the south east corner of J. H. Burch's land, thence northerly along said Burch's line and up the creek to Benjamin Burdick's land, thence easterly along said Benjamin's line to S. P Burdick's land, thence south to the south west corner of said S. P. Burdick's land, thence east to the centre of the highway, thence along said highway to the south east corner of a piece of land on lot No. 69, owned and occupied by Benjamin Burdick, thence east to Jacob Langworthy's land, thence south about 20 rods to the place of beginning, containing about 66 acres of land, be the same more or less. Also, one other piece or parcel of land in the town and county aforesaid, bounded as follows: Beginning at a stake near the corner of the mill dam, near the potash, thence north 79 degrees, east 14 rods to the road, thence on the road easterly six rods to a stake, thence south 68 degrees, west 19 rods to the bridge, thence north 78 degrees, west 16 rods to the corner of the said lot, thence north 15 degrees, east six rods and 5 links between the barn and shed to a stake, thence north 79 degrees west, 3 1-2 rods, thence north 7 degrees, east 13 rods to a stake at the pond, thence around the pond on the westerly side until it comes to the lands of Oliver Brown, at a stake, thence across the creek easterly to a stake on the east bank of said creek, thence down the pond on the easterly bank till it comes to the first mentioned bound, containing 8 acres of land more or less, together with the mills and water privileges thereon and the appurtenances thereto belonging. Also, one other piece or parcel of land, situate in the town and county aforesaid, on which the store stands, bounded, south by the highway, west by Truman Miller's house lot, north by land owned by Roswell P. Dowse, and easterly by the above described piece, supposed to contain one half of an acre of land be the same more or less, together with the buildings thereon, which I shall expose to sale at public vendue, at the inn now kept by Isaac P Miner, in the village of Leonardsville, town of Brookfield, on the 9th day of January, 1843, at 10 o'clock, A. M.—Dated, Morrisville, Nov. the 23d, 1842.

Christian Review.

A GOOD PROPOSITION.

THE importance of the Christian Review is admitted. It was commenced nearly seven years since in odedience to an urgent and almost spontaneous call from different parts of the land, and in compliance with that call, has been sustained through six successive volumes, only by special effort, and considerable sacrifice (previous to the present volume) on the part of a few individuals. The number of subscribers, however, has gradually increased, so as to inspire the hope that ultimately, the list would become such as to place it above "want," and on a basis that should insure its perpetuity; and with proper exertions on the part of its friends, it is believed such a result might easily be accomplished.

The work is put at the low price of three dollars per annum, in order to bring it within the means of as large a number as possible. Yet, many who are able, and who would be benefitted by its perusal, are not now subscribers, and need, it is thought, only to be reminded of the facts to become so

The work occupies a high position among the religious quarterlies of the country, and in the estimation of intelligent men of all Christian denominations, is contributing a good share of the religious periodical literature of the age. To the Baptist denomination, in particular, it is an auxiliary in defence and illustration of the truth, with which it is believed, we cannot afford to dispense. And, since the committee and the publishers have resolved, never again to make an appeal for pecuniary aid, but to discontinue its publication whenever the subscriptions cease to be sufficient to sustain it, it becomes every well-wisher of the Review to exert himself now in its behalf.

☞The publishers having a number of the past volumes on hand, propose, in order to interest some who may be desirous of possessing it, yet feel unable to subscribe, to exert their influence to obtain new subscribers, and by so doing not only secure it for themselves, but, by increasing its circulation, extend its usefulness, and help also in insuring its perpetuity—to offer a PREMIUM for new subscribers, as follows.

☞Any person obtaining TWENTY NEW SUBSCRIBERS and remitting the publishers sixty dollars, shall be entitled to a complete set of the Review in seven volumes, the subscription price of which is, TWENTY ONE DOLLARS!

 For FIFTEEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS the last five volumes will be given—subscription price FIFTEEN DOLLARS!

 For TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, the last TWO VOLUMES, subscription price, SIX DOLLARS!

For FIVE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, either of the last three volumes, subscription price, THREE DOLLARS!

It is hoped that this very liberal premium, may induce many of the friends of the Review to make a renewed effort in its behalf, and thus not only reap benefit themselves, but aid the great object the Review is intended to sustain.

SUBSCRIBERS are reminded of the terms of subscription, "three dollars per annum IN ADVANCE." Have you paid your subscription? The money is much needed.

N. B. The publishers of any religious paper who shall give the above advertisement three insertions in their columns (and send a copy to the publishers) shall be entitled to a selection of either two of the last four volumes.

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers, and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business, in the shop formerly occupied by S. M. House, over I. R. Cook's jewelry store, one door east of E. D. Jenck's store, in all its various branches, where they will be happy to wait on customers on the shortest notice. Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done up in a style not surpassed by any of the "Craft" in this "village or county;" and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and traveling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, trouble and expense. The principal advantage to be derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inkstand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents—Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted to make the expenses of acquiring a good education as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 29th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

POETRY.

For the Register.

"What meaneth thou," &c. Jonah i 6.

BY W. B DOWNER.

"What meanest thou, O sleeper, now?
How canst thou slumber here?
When valient hearted seamen bow,
At sight of tempest drear.

Arise, and call upon thy God,
That so, we perish not;
Perhaps he'll stay his vengeful rod,
And happy make our lot."

What means the Christian sleeper too?
On life's dread ocean tost;
When, if he's not to Jesus true,
His precious soul is lost.

Well, might a heathen then exclaim,
While careless Christians sleep;
Though in eternal, dreadful flame,
The sinner lost shall weep.

Arise, thou careless sleeper, rise,
And call upon thy king;
Perhaps he'll hear thine earnest cries,
And great deliverance bring.

To righteousness and duty wake,
Bid lust and fear depart,
The way of wickedness forsake,
And keep with care thy heart.

From the Anti-Slavery Standard.

LEWIS CLARK.

Leaves from a Slaves Journal of Life.

A polite note from Lewis Tappan, last week, informed me that a fugitive slave, nearly as white as himself, would address an audience at Brooklyn; and having curiosity to hear what he would say, I crossed the ferry, at the time appointed for the meeting. I have seldom been more entertained by any speaker. His obvious want of education was one guaranty of the truth of his story; and the uncouth awkwardness of his language had a sort of charm, like the circuitous expressoin, and stammering utterance, of a foreign tongue, striving to speak our most familiar phrases. His mind was evidently full of ideas, which he was eager to express; but the medium was wanting. "I've got it in here," said he, laying his hand on his heart; "but I don't know how to get it out." However, in his imperfect way, I believe he conveyed much information to many minds; and that few who heard him went away without being impressed by the conviction that he was sincerely truthful, and testified of things which he did know.

Lewis Tappan introduced him to the meeting as Lewis Clark, from Kentucky; saying that he brought satisfactory letters from Ohio, where Judge King, and General somebody, and Esquire somebody, had called meetings for him, and certified their full belief of his story. I would record the individuals if I remembered them; but my organ of reverence, though pretty largely developed, never occupies itself with great names. I should be extremely unpopular in Great Britain; for I should be as likely to recognize the true queen of the nation in a washerwoman, as any way.—Lewis Tappan, luckily had more adaption to the state of the public mind, and doubtless gained the ear of many, by thus propping up his protegee with magnates on either side. Many in the audience, of course, would not perceive so readily as I did, that the man spoke the truth, from what he spoke, and the way in which he spoke it; and I bade them a hearty welcome to all the aid the could derive from Judges and generals.

The fugitive informed us that his father was a soldier in the revolution. Though he was quite a small boy when separated from his parents, he remembered hearing his father tell about fighting battles for freedom; and that he thought all the while that he was to have a share in the freedom, as well as the white folks. But in that, he found himself mistaken. "He thought it was a hard case," said he; "and I that come after him, had reason to think it was a hard case, too. My grandmother was her master's daughter; and I was my master's son; so you see I han't got but one eighth of the blood. Now, admitting it's right to make a slave of a full black nigger, I want to ask gentlemen acquainted with business, whether because I owe a shilling I ought to be made to pay a dollar?"

I was very much struck with the fact, that he seemed to think much less of the physical sufferings of the slave than of his moral and intellectual degradation. The great idea, which formed the basis of Dr. Channing's abolition, and which he expressed in such various forms of eloquence inspired likewise the soul of this fugitive slave, and shone through his awkward language, like fragments of rainbow through a fog. "I an't a going to tell you first about the whippings," said he; "though I'm the boy that's got 'em, times a plenty. But as I was saying, 'tan't the slave's sufferings I care so much to tell about; though they do suffer, some of them a big, vast quantity." The audience laughed audibly, and he at at once understood its meaning. He smiled, as he said, "Now, you ough'nt to expect words out of the grammar from me; for how should I know what's in the grammar?"

"Your words are plenty good enough," said a friendly voice; "go on—never mind your words."

"So I will, as well as I can. I want to tell you, not so much about the slave's being whipped, or about his not having enough to eat; though I could tell you enough of that too, if I had a chance.—But what I want to make you understand is, that A SLAVE CAN'T BE A MAN! Slavery makes a brute of man; I don't mean that he is a brute, neither. But a horse can't speak; and he daren't. He daren't tell what's in him; it wouldn't do. The worse he's treated, the more he must smile; the more he's kicked, the lower he must crawl. For you see the master knows when he's treated his slave too bad for human nature; and he watches him the closer, and so the slave has to be more deceitful. Folks from hereabouts go down to Kentucky, and they send you word that the slaves say that they don't want their freedom. Well, I suppose they do. I daren't swear I han't done that thing myself. I had the privilege of letting myself out and sending my master twelve dollars a month. This was a sort of taste of freedom; for I went round about, and made my own little contracts, and so on. Now, if some Yankee had come along and said, 'Do you want to be free?' what do you suppose I'd have told him? Now, what do you suppose I'd tell him? Why, I'd tell him, to be sure, that I didn't want to be free; that I was very well off as I was. If I did'nt, its precious few more contracts I should be allowed to make, I'm thinking. And if a woman slave had a husband and children, and somebody asked her if she would like her freedom? Would she tell 'em, yes? If she did, she'd be down the river to Louisiana, in no time; and her husband and children never knew what become of her. Of course, the slaves don't tell folks what's passing in their minds about freedom; for they know what'll come of it, if they do. I said a slave was like a brute; and so he is, in many things; but he an't altogether that much like a brute, neither. The fact is, slavery's the father of lies. The slave knows he ought to have his freedom; and his master too, jest as well as he does; but they both say they don't; and they tell me some folks this way believe 'em. The master says he don't want his freedom, and the slave says he don't want it; but they both on 'em lie, and know it. There never was any thing beat slavery, for lying; and of all folks in the world, there's nobody deceived quite so bad, as the master's down South; for the slaves deceive them, and they deceive them and they deceive themselves. Some have thought their slaves were so much attached to them, that nobody could coax them, away; and them very slaves now reside in Canada. Others think the slave are too brutified to think or care any thing about freedom; and them's the worst deceived of any. The masters say the slaves are a lying and thieving set; and so they are; for slavery makes a man lie and steal. It won't let him be honest, if he would.

Some folks go down to Kentucky, and tell fine stories about how well the slaves live; that they dress as nice as any body, and have horses to ride a Sunday. Well, so it is with many of them slaves that are favorites in rich families; but I tell you them favorite slaves are most to be pitied of all. They are obliged to cringe a little lower than any of the others. They must mind and please both master and mistress in every thing; and please the children, and the uncles, and the aunts, and the cousins, and all the relations; for the master wants him to feel that it is alone of his will that he is better off than others, and that he has the power at any moment, to cut his comb; and he is always sort of jealous, too, that the slave will think he has a right to any of the privileges he has been used to having. So he has to mind his P's and Q's right smart; for if he says or does any thing that any of the relation don't like, he's pushed right down below all the slaves. I've seen this many a time. The brighter a slave is, the more he has to lie; for the more the master is jealous of what's passing in his mind, and the harder he has to try to hide it. It an't the lightest colored that are always the brightest and best; for a man's disposition an't in his skin. Yes, it is in his skin, too; because it is in his heart, and his heart is inside his skin; but what I mean is, that it an't in the color of his skin. The slaves used to debate together sometime, what could be the reason that the yellow folks couldn't be trusted like the dark ones could. As a general rule they seemed to be dissipated, devil-may-care fellows; and I'll tell you what we concluded was the reason—we concluded it was because they were the sons of their masters, and took after their fathers. You laugh; but that's what the slaves concluded was the reason; and I declare to you I have heard 'em talk on about it, and bring up this here one, and that ere one, that was the son of a dissipated master, till I felt ashamed of the white blood that was in me. And I tell you, the man that bears the best character in all Kentucky, respect of his morals, has a face as black as the inside of a blacking box. He is engaged in the public works, and takes hundreds and hundreds of dollars. He might run away with the money, if he would; but ever since he was a boy he has walked right ahead, as straight as any crack in this floor. You might ask any body from highest to the lowest, and they'd all tell you that they'd trust him afore any man in Kentucky. White men trust one another, I know; but mind ye, they always have bond and security; now, it be no use for this man to give any security—for he's a slave."

One of the audience here interrupted, saying, "I thought you observed, a little while ago, that slaves couldn't be honest; that they were obliged to lie and steal?"

"So I did; and it was true. But this man you see, was a slave, and then again he warn't a slave. He was a first rate black smith, and worked for the public works, and had money trusted to him; and this made him feel somehow like a man, though he was a slave, too.—They trusted him a good deal, you see."

"You mean said a friendly voice, "that if you trust a man, it makes him worthy to be trusted."

This seemed a little too grammatical for him to understand; and another one said, "You mean that if a slave feels that he is trusted, he may be trusted with anything."

"Not exactly that, neither," replied he, with an arch look; "when a slave knows that he is trusted, he may be trusted with almost anything—except himself!"

When the laugh had subsided, he continued: "But the smarter he is, the more they jealous him, and the more they like to hold him for a slave; and the whiter he is, the grander they feel. As a general thing, if a Kentuckian has a little money, he'd a deal rather vest it in slaves than in any other property. A horse don't know that he's property, and a man does. Ther's a sort of satisfaction in thinking 'You're a man but you're mine. You're as white as i am, but you're mine.' Many a time I've had 'em say to me, 'You're my property. If I tell you to hold your hand in the fire till it burns off, you've got to do it.' Not that they meant to make me put my hand in the fire; but they liked to let me know they had the power. The whiter a man is, the lower down they keep him. I knew a slave that was all white. I might tell you his name, and where he lived. I believe I will. No I won't, either; for if I do, you may perhaps ask me whether I came from his neighborhood; and I don't care to have you know any more than that I came from Kentucky. Her borders are pretty broad, you know, and it's not so easy to guess what part I came from. But what I wanted to say was, that this white slave was stolen from Virginia when he was a very little boy, and he had been kept in slavery ever since. He was brought up more ignorant than any of the slaves, and if any whipping was to be done on the plantation he was sure to catch it. The slaves use to say to him, 'Massa had a great deal rather whip you than Steve.'—Now Steve was the blackest man of the whole lot. Knowing he was a white man, I suppose they was afraid he'd find out his rights, if they did'nt keep him down right hard.

Kentucky is the best of the slave States in respect to the laws; but the masters manage to fix things pretty much to their own liking. The law don't allow 'em to brand a slave, or cut off his ear; but if they happen to swich it off with a cow hide, nobody says anything about it.—Though the laws are better than in other States, they an't anyways equal. If a negro breaks open a house, he is hung for it; but if a white man does the same thing, he is put in the penitentiary, unless he has money enough to buy himself off. And there is one crime for which more black men are hung than for any other; and if a white man does it, it is no crime at all.—The law gives him a full swing; and he don't fail to use his privilege, I can tell you. Now, if there was nothing else but this, it would make a slave's life as bad as death, many times. I can't tell these respectable people as much as I would like to; but jest think for a minute how you would like to have your sisters, and your wives, and your daughters, completely, teetotally, and altogether, in the power of a master. You can picture to yourselves a little, how you would feel; but oh, if I could tell you! A slave woman an't allowed to respect herself if she would. I had a pretty sister; she was whiter than I am, for she took more after her father.—When she was sixteen years old, her master sent for her again, she cried, and didn't want to go. She told her mother her troubles, and she tried to encourage her to be decent, and hold her head above such things, if she could. Her master was so mad, to think she complained to her mother, that he sold her right off to Louisiana; and we heard afterward that she died there of hard usage.

There was a widower in Kentucky, who took one of his women slaves into the house. She told her master one day that seven of the young girls had poked fun at her for the way she was living. This raised his ambition. I'll teach 'em to make fun!' said he. So he sent the woman away, and ordered the young girls to come to him, one by one." [An illmannered and gross laughter, among the boys of the audience, here seemed to embarrass him.] "Perhaps I had better not try to tell this story," he continued; "for I cannot tell it as it was; though surely it is more shameful to have such things done, than it is to tell of 'em. He got mad with the girls, because they complained to their mothers; but he didn't like to punish 'em for that, for fear it would make a talk. So he ordered 'em to go out into the field to do work that was too hard for 'em six of 'em said they couldn't do it; but the mother of the seventh, guessing what it was for, told her to go and do the best that she could.—The other six were every one of 'em tied up naked, and flogged, for disobeying orders. Now, who would like to be a slave even if there's nothing bad about it but such treatment of his sisters and daughters?—But there's a worse thing yet about slavery; the worst thing in the whole lot; though it's all bad, from the butt end to pint. I mean patter-rollers (patrols.) I suppose you know that they have patter-rollers to go about o'nights, to see that the slaves are all in, and not planning any mischief?—Now, these are just about the worst fellows that can be found; as bad as you could pick up on the wharves. The reason is, you see, no decent man will undertake the business. Gentlemen in Kentucky are ready enough to hire such Jobs done; but if you was to ask any of them to be a patter-roller, he would look upon it as a right down insult, and likely enough would blow out your brains for an answer. They're mighty handy with pistols down there; and if a man don't resent any thing that is put upon him, they call him Poke-easy. The slaves catch it, too; and them as won't fight, is called Poke-easy. But as I was telling ye, they hire these patter-rollers, and they have to take the meanest fellows above ground; and because they are so mortal sure the slaves don't want their freedom, the have to put all power into their hands, to do with the niggers jest as they like. If a slave don't open his door to them, at any time of night, they brake it it down. They steal his money, if they can find it, and act jest as they please with his wives and daughters. If a husband dares to say a word, or even look as if he wasn't quite satisfied, they tie him up and give him thirty-nine lashes. If there's any likely young girls in a slave's hut, they're mighty apt to have business there; especially if they think any colored young man takes a fancy to any of 'em. May be he'll get a pass from his master, and go to see the young girl for a few hours. The patter-rollers break in and find him there. They'll abuse the girl as bad as they can, a purpose to provoke him. If he looks cross, they give him a flogging, tear up his pass, turn him out of doors, and then take him up and whip him for being out without a pass. If the slave says they tore it up, they swear he lies; and nine times out of ten the master won't come out agin 'em; for they say it won't do to let the niggers suppose they may complain of the patter-rollers; they must be taught that it's their business to obey 'em in everything; and the patter-roller knows that very well. Oh, how often I've seen the poor girls sob and cry, when there's been such goings on! May be you think, because they're slave, they an't got no feeling and no shame? A woman's being a slave don't stop her having genteel ideas; that is, according to their way, and as they can.—They know they must submit to their masters, may be, dress 'em up, and make 'em little presents, and give 'em more privileges, while the whim lasts; but it an't like having a parcel of low, dirty, swearing, drunk patter-rollers let loose among 'em, like so many hogs. This breaks down their spirits dreadfully and makes 'em wish they were dead.

Now who among you would like to have your wives, and daughters, and sisters, in such a situation? This is what every slave in all these States is exposed to. Yet folks go from these parts down to Kentucky, and come back, and say the slaves have enough to eat and drink, and they are very happy, and they wouldn't mind it much to be slaves themselves. I'd like to have 'em try it; it would teach 'em a little more than they know now. I'm not going to deny that Kentucky is better than other slave States, in respect of her laws; and she has the best name, too, about treating her slaves. But one great reason of that is, they are proud about punishing in public. If a man ties his slave up in the market-place, and flogs him till he can't stand, the neighbors all cry out, 'What a shame! The man has no regard to his character. What an abominable thing to have that nigger screaming where everybody can hear! Shame on him, to do such things in public!'

But if the same man flogs his slave ten times as bad, up garret or down cellar, with his mouth stopped, that he mayn't make a noise, or off in the woods, out of hearing, it's all well enough. If his neighbors hear of it, they only say, 'Well, of course there's no managing niggers without letting 'em know who's master.' And there's an end of the business. The law, to be sure, don't allow such cruel floggings; but how's a slave going to get the law of his master? The law won't let him, nor any of the slaves, testify; and if the neighbors know anything about it, they won't testify. For it won't do to let the slaves think they would be upheld in complaining of master or overseer. I told you in the beginning, that it wouldn't do to let the slave think he is a man. That would spoil slavery, clean entirely. No; this is the cruelty of the thing—A SLAVE CAN'T BE A MAN. He must be made a brute; but he ain't a brute, neither, if he had a chance to act himself out. Many a one of 'em is right smart, I tell you. But a horse can't speak, and a slave darn't; and that's the best way I can tell the story."

Next week, I will continue the remarks by this ignorant but naturally intelligent slave. They are valuable for their honest directness and simplicity, and as sketches of scenes from one who dwelt in the midst of them. As he stood side by side with Lewis Tappan, one could hardly perceive that he was a shade darker. Many a New England farmer, tanned by the sun, is as brown as he. What he might have been, with common advantages for education, is shown by his shrewd conclusions, and the large ideas which his soul struggled so hard to utter in imperfect language. He lectured three evenings. Toward the close of the second, Isaac T. Hopper rose and repeated some of his anecdotes of fugitive slaves. The audience were evidently much entertained, and the Kentuckian refugee seemed as if touched by an electric chain. "The more that old gentleman says," exclaimed he, "the more it puts me in mind of."

As there seemed some danger of talking all night, an adjournment was proposed, and carried.

The audience continually increased each successive evening, and listened throughout with great attention, and without the slightest demonstration of disrespect, or impatience. A slaveholder from Mississippi was present, and was requested to declare openly if any of the statements appeared to him incorrect. He said nothing in the meeting; and Mr. Tappan declared that he admitted, out of doors, that he had heard nothing incredible. He says he is going to emancipate his slaves forthwith. God give him grace to keep his word! His person was not pointed out to the audience, nor was he addressed by name; for the same reason that one would not like to point out a reformed man, who had been in the penitentiary for stealing horses. Men are beginning to blush at being slave-holders; unless they have a throng of slave-holders around them, to keep them in countenance.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO 40.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR. [WHOLE NO. 144.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,—The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.—If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST.

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Sabbath Department.

We commence publishing this week, extracts from Rev. GEORGE CARLOW's reply to Mr. WARD. This work was published about two centuries since. We commend it to the careful attention of our readers. We shall publish several other extracts from the same chapter with the following, entitled "Some quotations from history, of the first day Sabbath being a human institution only, and the arts used by Papists to bring in the first day, to be kept for the Sabbath."

Extracts From Carlow.

"But tho' Mr. Ward cannot prove a divine institution of the first day Sabbath in the holy scripture, yet I can show him three or four humane institutions to do him a kindness, which he may like as well; the first is, the Emperor Constantine, who was born in the parish of All Saints in Colchester Castle, in Essex, as historians tell us, did enact that the first day of the week should be kept for the Sabbath, and most of all Christendom do observe the same by the law of the land since his reign, not before for three hundred and thirty years after Christ; thus man took upon him to be more spiritual than his Maker, and some parts began to be infected with Origen's allegorical divinity, taken liberty to prophane the seventh day under pretence of keeping a mystical Sabbath, by ceasing from sin, while they lived in the manifest sin of slighting the Sabbath, so that the mystery of iniquity got ground by this mystical notion, making way for the rising of the presumptuous little horn to change times and laws, (Dan. 7,) till at last he prevailed with the Emperor by a decree to establish the first day of the week for the great holy day, and appointing a set form of Latin prayers to be used upon it. Eusebius in his fourth book, chap. 17, 18, of the life of Constantine, speaks thus of Constantine, that he appointed the Lord's day, as they were pleased to call it, should be consecrated to prayers. And a little further he saith, by his example, meaning Constantine, they learned to observe the first day. Let the christian reader observe this passage, they learned to observe it of him, and if they learned it of him, then they kept it not before. And a little after in the same chapter Eusebius saith, Constantine commanded that through all the Roman empire they should forbear to labor, or do any work upon the first day. And chap. 23 of the said book he writes thus: The Emperor sent an edict to all Governors of his Provinces, that they should forthwith [Note—forthwith a sign it was not observed before] observe the first, that they should honor holy days consecrated to the memory of martyrs, and solemnly observe the feasts of the church. Let it be noted here also, how that with the first day's observation came in the observation of feasts of the church and their holy days so called, consecrated to the memory of martyrs. And further he saith that all was performed according to the Emperor's command. This also is to be noted, that all was performed, and all first day's observation as well as the rest, and all according to the Emperor's command; Eusebius doth not say it was performed according to the command of God, but according to the command of the Emperor; here is the command of man and not of God! Here is the bottom of the first day observation! And yet we are to consider further in this matter, that tho' he did endeavor to bring it in, it was not brought in after the manner that now is kept, for he allowed working, huntings, markets, and fairs upon the day if occasion required; and so did the Kings of England who gave forth decrees for its observation. Henry Bullinger in his Treatise to King Edward the sixth, in pages 143, 144, speaks of Constantine's decree thus: Let all judges in the courts of law, and citizens of occupations, rest upon the Sunday, and keep it holy with reverence and devotion; but they that inhabit in the country may freely, and at liberty attend on their tillage; and he proposes a reason thus, for oftentimes it falleth out that they cannot upon another day so commodiously sow their seed, or plant their vines, and by letting pass the opportunity of a little time, they may hap to loose the profit given them of God for their provision. And in page 140, he saith, We do not find in any part of the Apostles writings any mention made that the Sunday was commanded us to be kept holy. Thus far Bullinger ingeniously acknowledged a thing very worthy of commendation.

"3. Fox in his Acts and Monuments, Vol. I. page 134, saith of Constanstine, the Sunday he commanded to be kept; hence it plainly appears that they worked and labored on the first day down to Constantine's time which discovers that it was not kept by Christ, nor his Apostles, as Mr. Ward would make us believe. If it had been a command of God, no man should have dared to have given men liberty to work, but in that they brought it in themselves, they might order it in the manner of its observation; hence it appears they kept their markets and fairs on the first day, till by his command they were hindered.

"4. Richard Baker in his Chronicles of the Kings of England, page 17, concerning King Canutus, that he forbid all public fairs, markets, hunting, and all seculer actions, unless some urgent necessity require. And in his Index or Table he saith, this was the first keeping of Sunday, that is first in England, that is the first bringing up of it to some maturity; there were commands of the same nature before as of King Inas who reigned about the year 712, which was the first I can meet with that gave commandment in this island touching its observation, and this is recorded, Fox's acts of Monuments, page 1016, of the aforesaid book. Also he makes mention of Gyrthum the Dane King to the same purpose, and of Edgar who began his reign about the year 959, that among other Ecclesiastical laws he ordained that the Sabbath should be kept from Saturday noon till Monday morning, and so it came to pass from his ordaining the Sabbath to be kept from Saturday noon, that children go to school but half a day on Saturday. Item.—He ordained and decreed concerning liberties and freedoms of the Church, for tythes also, and first fruits of corn, and paying of Peter's pence. And King Canatus when he began to reign in this land in the year of our Lord Christ 1016, the said Canatus commanded Celebration of the Sabbath from Saturday noon till Monday morning, as Edgar had done before, forbidding markets, labors, hunting and court keepings during the said space of time till Monday morning. Fox's acts of Monument, page 1017. So tho' there have been several commands concerning the first days observation before Canutus time, yet it came not to any ripeness till his command came forth, which was not seven hundred and twenty years ago; and upon this account I conceive Sir Richard Baker saith it was the first of its keeping holy. And thus Speed in his Chronicle speaks of King Canutus page 399, that he forbid labor, except necessity required."

Are you Seeking Religion?

We find in our Pastoral labors many of this class, and the difficulties they have to contend with are many and very difficult to overcome. To such, I would give a few words of advice. One of the greatest difficulties is an unwillingness to learn and believe the truth. Such are always very slow to learn that Jesus Christ is the friend of sinners. They will not believe that he came to help us while we were in our troubles and our sins. How frequently do they say I must overcome this sin? And I must learn to overcome and free myself from this temptation, and then I think I will come to Jesus and ask for pardon? I know that I am a sinner lost and undone, but I must have clearer views of my own sinfulness, and a deeper sense of my own wretchedness, and then, and not till then, do I expect Christ will look upon me with compassion? Thus they suppose that it is the office work of Jesus to stand aloof from the poor struggling sinner until the contest is over, and then come to him, and offer him his congratulation. Is this such a Savior as the bible presents to you as the sinners friend? Does he not possess the sympathies of a friend? Supposing that adjoining your residence you should hear the mourning sound of some one in distress, you enter hastily and find your neighbor very sick and struggling alone in distress—you say to him at once, we must send for a physician immediately—there is one at hand who will come in a moment. But, to your astonishment, the sufferer groans out, O! no, I am in no state to send for a physician; I am too sick; I am almost distracted with pain; I am truly dangerously ill; I fear I shall die. Then you would say, we must have a physician! But stop! says the sick man; wait until I get a little easier; I am too sick at present; I have been getting worse; I am afraid there is no help for me. After hearing such words, you would conclude that his mind was wandering. A physician would be called. Thus is it with you who are sick of sin, and want to seek religion. You are sick and dangerously sick—your minds are wandering; but Jesus Christ is a physician at hand, and it is the sick that he came to heal. Sinners he came to save, not the righteous. O! then, come as you are to Jesus Christ and live.

WE ALL DO FADE AS A LEAF.

What thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might.

Reader! Dost thou love nature? and now in its loveliest, saddest dress, does it strike a chord in thine heart that vibrates? Dost thou stop amid thine earth-born cares to gaze upon the sere and yellow leaf?—Dost thou listen to the autumn winds? Hearest thou not a voice in their low moanings, saying to thee—

> "The storms of wintry time will quickly pass."

Dost thou look upon some spot of consecrated earth on which the turf was unbroken a few months since, and read the impressive inscription, 'We all do fade as a leaf?' If thou wilt give a passing hour to silent meditation, and look abroad, thou wilt find just now 'sermons in trees, books in the running brooks.' If nature were never to revive again, what a funeral gloom would its present aspect spread over this fair and beautiful world. If the eye of mortals were never to be feasted again with the lovely hues of spring, the green fields and rich harvests of summer, what a sad farewell would be taken of their fading emblems. True—the countenance of the Christian who is living in the daily exercise of that faith that at all times enables him to feel that—and to discern,

> "Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood,
> Stand drest in living green."

might exhibit a smile of joy, and the tears that would rush unbidden and glisten through the heaven-lit expression of his toil-worn brow, might fall fast, but they would fall for others, not for himself.

Reader—is it not true that—

> "Before another pleasant spring
> The first young violets shall bring," multitudes who now look with thee upon the withered foliage of this closing autumn, will awake

> "In that lone land of dark despair," where—

> "No Sabbath's heavenly light shall rise!"

Reader! Art thou a Christian? If so, is there not much that thou canst do to save thy fellows from impending doom? Does not nature, does not reason—does not the word of inspiration, does not the still small voice at the door of thy heart, admonish thee to be up and doing? 'Behold, the night is far spent, the day is at hand, therefore let us not sleep as do others.' How much of thy precious probation is gone beyond recall. How many have gone down to endure forever the pangs of the second death, that thy prayers or thy influence might have reached, had thy heart been always right with God. When thou rememberest this, does not a sense of bloodguiltiness weigh heavy on thy soul?—Wouldst thou, for the sake of humanity—in view of the anguish of the lost, in view of thine awful responsibility, in view of the constraining love of Christ, thy Savior—let past unfaithfulness suffice? Fellow Christian, read for thine encouragement, 1 John 1 : 9, Ps. 37 : 4, Jer. 29 : 13, and only believe and obey, and thou canst not fail to find him faithful who hath promised. Dost thou desire a preparation to do good, such as thou hast never had; thou needest it, the world need it, the salvation of that friend, brother, parent, husband, or beloved child of thine, may hang on its attainment. O, be entreated to get thine heart right. Is it stained with thy sins of worldliness, idolitry, and unbelief? Let them be brought out and slain—the blood of Jesus cleanseth. He is a present Savior. He has promised grace to help in every time of need. Just think of that. Wouldst thou have power with God so that thou canst wrestle and prevail when thou bringest to the mercy seat those beloved ones dear as thine own soul? 'Ask, and ye shall receive.' 'If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what you will, and it shall be done unto you." These are the words of Jesus. Child of God—heir of glory—what other assurances couldst thou have to induce prompt obedience? 'Men of like passions' have offered the prayer of faith—and is it not true that He whose word is unchangeable' is now saying through that word to the Christians of our land, and to thee—'Bring ye all the tithes into my storehouse, and prove me—if I will not open to you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room to receive it?' May not every Christian, of every name, first get prepared to do good, and then begin to labor in his individual capacity, seeking out objects on which to expend his sympathis, embracing also in his unceasing prayer the perishing multitude throughout the entire community for whom others may be laboring? It is as easy for our Heavenly Father, from his unwasting fulness, to distil such measures of his Spirit as will cause truth to have its legitimate effect upon ten thousand hearts as upon a single one. Why shall it not be so! Why shall not the coming winter be emphatically a season of the right hand of the Most High? The chariot of salvation can even now be discerned in the distance—

> "Lo, self-moving it rides on its pathway of cloud,
> And the heavens with the glory of Godhead are bowed."

Shall not its descent be sought with an intensity that knows no denial? Let it pass over all our land, and with what beauty and loveliness would it clothe the moral world,

> "Dry bones" would "obey its powerful voice,
> And move and waken and rejoice."

The verdure that would be spread around, instead of passing away like the changing seasons, would live and flourish in immortal bloom. Let there come, in answer to prayer, such a pentecostal season throughout the American churches (in proportion to the population) as was witnessed a few years since at the Sandwich Islands, and the joy produced would be more than earth could hold. He who once said to the little band of his disciples—'Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom,' is now saying, 'Behold, all things are ready.'

Christian reader—soldier of the cross! He is calling for thee. Thou canst have an agency in this blessed work of salvation. If thou hast not yet taken thy place just where his love and his grace assigns, there is a vacancy in the ranks—and in a voice of tender entreaty, that voice was heard on Calvary and in Gethsemane. He is calling to thee to come and fill it. Obey speedily, and He will lead thee forth to conquest and to victory.

THE LAW OF KINDNESS.

Among the characteristics of a virtuous woman, whose 'price is far above rubies,' Solomon says that, 'in her tongue is the law of kindness.' She is distinguished from those whose kindness is fluctuating, and temporary, or merely assumed for the occasion. With a truly virtuous woman, kindness in speech is habitual, springing from a deep settled principle in the heart, so that it may be well called a law of action. All her conduct is in strict accordance with the kind, benevolent emotions of the soul. Her speech, her tones, her looks, are the true index of her heart, and infuse health, peace, contentment, and exalted pleasure, through all the circle in which she moves.

The law of kindness! What a beautiful conception of angelic innocence, faithfulness, and love, does it suggest to the mind! How it supercedes the necessity of other laws. How many of the most desirable accomplishments are included in it. If true politeness be 'real kindness kindly expressed,' if the graces of mind and heart are the brightest female adornments, then [illegible] of a virtuous, is also the model of an accomplished, woman.

Who then is deserving to be called virtuous according to this rule? Is she, who assumes looks, and tones, and words of kindness, when strangers or visiters are present, to be exchanged for scowls and bitter words the moment they are gone?—Or she who is kind and cheerful only when in perfect health, when every thing smiles around her, and when all her desires are gratified? Has kindness become the law of her tongue, who only speaks well of the members of her own favorite circle, or of those with whom she is now on terms of special friendship? Is the law of kindness limited to any particular circle?

But this law is not binding on the woman alone. If it is her brightest ornament, her sweetest charm, how graceful must it be when fully exemplified by man. His duties call him to encounter rougher scenes, and participate more in the great battle which will never end till sin is subdued and satan is bound—the battle between truth and error, between power and right. It is his, often, to maintain the sternness of truth, and stand up in all the severity of right. To brave the villain and abash the fool, to separate between the precious and the vile, to strip the courtly visor from the features of specious error, and unmask its hateful deformity, though sometimes a sacred duty, is often difficult to be performed in the exercise of the law of kindness. But if the achievement be difficult, it is none the less desirable. The law of kindness should ever guide the tongue and the pen, in public and in private. Even severity should be tempered by it. 'Let the righteous smite me and it shall be a kindness,' says David, who knew well that reproofs which may sometimes seem severe, may be the most sincere and faithful exhibitions of love.

The foundation of this law, let it be remembered, is Christian love. How beautifully was its power exemplified in Mrs. Judson, interceding for a poor slave, with her infuriated mistress, and procuring her freedom, or visiting and softening the brutal Burman officers in whose power the missionaries were helplessly confined, and by her gentle influence subduing their ferocity and even moving them to pity. Here were fortitude and kindness so blended, as to be irresistible, even to the hardest hearts.—Christian Watchman.

MEETINGS AT THE JUDGMENT-SEAT.

Christians will meet the heathen there. Millions have gone to judgment unprepared since the church had the power to give the Gospel to the world. Every man who has not done his whole duty in the work of publishing salvation to those lost millions, has a part of the guilt of their destruction on his soul. The heathen are perishing now while christians are doing little for their rescue. Their blood will be required at the hands of those who might have saved them, but let them perish. And when the world is summoned to judgment, christians will meet, face to face, those heathen.—What a meeting! What a soul, saved by grace and prepared to enter on the joys of heaven, would not feel a pang of anguish as he meets before God those whom he put forth no efforts to save; whom he knew to be on the brink of ruin and left to perish without lifting an arm and scarce a prayer for their deliverance. If the christian is in doubt as to the amount of sacrifice he ought to make for the support of missions, let him ask himself how much he will wish he had given when he comes to PART with the heathen at the judgment-seat of Christ. And let him act accordingly.

The christian will meet his neighbors there. They are dying in sin around him. Multitudes are hurrying on in the broad road, and what is the christian doing to stop them? Is he warning them day and night with tears? Is he faithful in his appeals, holy in his example, and earnest in his prayers? If the christian should meet all his unconverted neighbors at the judgment-seat this night, would he meet them without shame? Could he stand up before the Searcher of hearts and say, 'Thou knowest, Oh God! that I am clear of the blood of these men; I besought them unceasingly to prepare for this scene, and I set before them an example that condemned their sins. What a change would come over the church and the world, if every christian thus labored, walked and prayed! But where is the Spirit of Him who went about doing good; where of Paul; where of Baxter; where of Harlan Page? The Great Teacher has left his example on record, and those who followed him, though afar off, have come down to us in the history of their deeds of love; but where in the church are they who walk in their footsteps, and like them are daily winning souls to Christ? What a meeting; what a parting, when the christian beholds at the judgment of the great day, his nearest neighbors, between whom and him the wide gulf is to roll eternally! His fidelity might have saved them; his unfaithfulness may have ruined them.—Irenæus.

UTTERANCE OF THE HEART.—A New Zealander thus expresses his deep sense of sin:

'As the wind digs up the waves of sea, so the devil digs up sin in my heart; he is always, this day and that day at work there. When I wake in the middle of the night he wakes also to contend with me, and to hold fast my soul so that I may not fly to the Savior.'

Another complains of the conflict within:—'I have two hearts which are always struggling one with the other. The one is a very good heart; the other altogether bad. I am wondering which will be thrown down and put undermost at last.'

Some of the first inquirers at the Sandwich Islands thus addressed the missionaries: One said, 'My heart is dark, you are light and must enlighten it.' Another, 'My heart is a wilderness, you must cultivate it.' Another, 'My heart is a lamp, you must fill it with oil.' Another, 'My heart is like a dry field, you must water it.'

A converted chief, who had formerly led the heathen party in battle at the Society Islands, thus expressed himself in a speech at a public meeting:—'We were dwelling formerly in a dark house, among centipedes and lizards, spiders and rats; nor did we know what evil things were around us.—The lamp of light, the word of God has been brought, and now we behold with dismay these abominable things.'

FEARS OF UNBELIEVERS.—'There is one thing,' said Mr. S. a professed infidel, to one of his companions in sin, 'which mars all the pleasure of my life.' 'Ah!' replied his companion, 'what is that?' 'Why, I am afraid the Bible is true. If I could know that death is an eternal sleep, I should be happy; my joy would be complete.—But here is the thorn that stings me! This is the sword that pierces my very soul! If the Bible be true I am lost forever!—Every prospect is gone; I am lost forever!'

I told him (Mirza Seid Ali) that I could not endure existence if Jesus was not glorified; that it would be hell to me if he were to be always thus dishonored. He was astonished, and again asked the reason why. 'If any one pluck out your eyes,' I replied, 'there is no saying why you feel pain. It is feeling. It is because I am one with Christ, that I am thus dreadfully wounded.' It is when the head or heart is struck that every member feels its membership.—Henry Martyn.

'We are like little children strayed from home, and God is now fetching us there; and we are ready to turn into any house, stay and play with every thing in our way, and sit down on every green bank, and much ado there is to get us home.'—Baxter.

Lines on an Olive Leaf,

PLUCKED FROM THE GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE.

Oh bring the little leaf once more,
For I would look again
Upon the dear remembrancer
Of Jesus' love and pain.

Say, little leaf, say didst thou grow
Upon a hallowed tree,
Where Cedron's limpid waters flow,
In far Gethsemane!

Oh sawest thou the lonely path
To where the Savior knelt!
Heard'st thou what words of love he saith!
What agony he felt!

And more than all, didst thou there view
The Holy One betrayed!
And thou, as kindred leaves, bestrew,
Where last he knelt and prayed!

Come to my heart, then, blessed leaf,
Come as a talisman
To teach my soul, in joy or grief,
What anguish he hath borne!

If grief o'erclouds my earthly sky,
Point thou to that bright land,
The garden of the Lord on high,
With its seraphic band.—

Where the same Jesus sits enthroned,
My Hope—my Lord—my God!
Where he with power and glory crowned,
Prepares my blest abode!

ELIZA,

A TRUE STORY.

I was one Sabbath afternoon about to close the school in which I was engaged, says a teacher, when a well-dressed, genteel person, who presented himself as a visiter, requested me to allow him, if it would not be deemed an intrusion, to speak to the children. This being readily granted, he addressed himself nearly to the following effect:—

"There was once a poor lad who was noted, even among his sinful companions, for his wickedness, but especially for his swearing and Sabbath breaking. He, along with some others, resolved one Sabbath to pelt some steady boys who were going to their school. However, it so happened that the lads on being attacked, took to their heels; this lad followed them to the very door of the school, which, when opened, (they were then singing,) such a sound came from the place as seemed to stun him. He wondered what they could be doing inside; and a teacher at that moment admitted the other boys and invited him in. A new scene now opened itself upon him; nearly three hundred boys seated with their teachers. They all appeared so neat and clean, and in such order, that he wished he was one of them. He stood for some time a spectacle for the whole school, dirty and ragged, and with his wooden clogs on, which, whenever he stirred, made him the subject of notice to every person, to his great shame and mortification. After some consultation, he being a stout, good-looking lad, it was resolved to admit him to the A B C class. Every thing was new to him. The next Sabbath he appeared, his hair was combed, and his face washed; but his clogs still remained to mortify him. His particular case was taken into consideration, and a pair of shoes given to him. He now found himself so much behind the other boys, that he resolved to strain every nerve to get up to them. This determination was the means of his rising to the very first class, when his conduct being approved of, he was chosen a teacher. He now felt he had something more to do than to teach—he had a soul to be saved or lost. In a little time he was enabled, after much prayer, to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and to rejoice in his salvation. The Lord then called him to preach these glad tidings; and happening sometime after, to officiate within twenty miles of his old, much-beloved school, he rode hard after the morning's labors, and reached the place just in time to see the lads in his own, very own school—and here he is now speaking to you!"

The scene became now truly affecting. He burst into tears, as did several others around him. At last he sobbed out, "O, my dear lads, be in right good earnest to make the most of your very great Sabbath school privileges! I have kept you too long; God bless you all!" He then concluded with a most affecting prayer.—London Teachers' Offering.

CHILDREN GOOD LISTENERS.

Children are good listeners, as well as acute observers; and we should therefore be careful in every conversation carried on in their presence. Many a passing remark, forgotten, as soon as uttered, by the person who spoke, and by those to whom it was addressed, has sunk deeply into the mind of childhood, and wrought an influence upon it, either for good or evil, little suspected.

We were forcibly struck by the necessity of taking this heed to our words before children, by the following little incident. A week or two since, a gentleman being in his son's store, found a few pictures among some waste paper. He put them into his pocket for his grandchildren, and upon taking them out, at home, some one asked him if he bought them. 'No,' said he, jestingly, 'I stole them.' No notice then appeared to have been taken of it by the children; but when one of them, not quite five years old, was going up stairs to bed, he said to his aunt,

'Didn't grandpa say he stole these pictures? It is not right to steal, is it?'

Upon the aunt's attempting to explain the sense in which the word was used, that his grandpa did not mean that he stole them—

'Then,' said the child, 'grandpa told a story, aunt, didn't he?'—S. S. Friend.

De Ruyter, November 30, 1842.

Know Thyself.

In the word of God, the sentiment of the above remark is often made. There are but few things of more vital importance to man than this. His usefulness in life and his happiness in death, are in a great measure dependent on a correct self-knowledge. To man belong duties of a social nature, the force of which he cannot know, till he knows himself and his dependencies. But when he understands himself, and the relations he sustains to the whole human family, and especially to those under his immediate influence, then he is prepared to discharge his duties as a man, and a member of the social fraternity in which he is placed.

But there are nobler things that belong to him than these. Man is a complex being, possessing an animal and spiritual nature; the former earthly and of itself corrupt, is always inducing him to sin and corruption; the latter is heavenly, and aspires after immortality. A knowledge of these natures, and their tendency and wants, is indispensable to a government of the conduct that will secure the greatest good and the least evil. Self-knowledge, is the most important kind of knowledge for a moral, accountable creature.

The ancients paid a great regard to this. Thales said that it was the hardest thing in the world for a man to know himself. It is one of the three precepts, which Pliny affirms to have been consecrated at Delphos in golden letters Cicero says, it has such a weight of sense and wisdom in it, as appears too great to be attributed to any man. But if it is of so much value to a man, what must be its value as applied to him as a Christian. It opens to him the true state of his heart, judges of the motives to action, discloses the feelings, and the disposition. It teaches him the influences most likely to govern his conduct, and how he may best keep his heart right with God. It likewise discloses to him his own capabilities and weakness, and thus points him to that sphere of action in which he can best serve God. There is a manifestation of the spirit given to every man to profit with all. Every Christian has a labor assigned to him in God's vineyard, and this labor is always such as he can perform. Self-knowledge will teach him what that labor is, and what he can best do to glorify God, and benefit his fellows.

Self-knowledge is indispensable to the Christian, that he may know his preparation to stand in the judgment. To none will it be said in the last day, well done good and faithful servant, &c., but to such as have searched themselves and tried their ways, and have brought their feelings and actions into obedience to the law of love. No man can know whether his heart is right with God, till he knows himself, and compares his emotions and actions with the perfect rule God has given to govern him.

A critical self-knowledge is necessary, in order to escape the errors of a false religion. A man may think himself in favor with God, and rest securely, when in fact he has been deceived, relative to his standing with God. From the days of Simon Magus, there has not been wanting men to pervert the right way of the Lord, and teach doctrines, the commandments of men; and to such an extent has error come into the creeds of the systems of religion now taught, that thousands deceive themselves, and unless a man possess a critical knowledge of himself, he cannot know whether he is serving God or himself.

J. C. Colt.

This individual, convicted of the murder of Samuel Adams, has been the subject of many newspaper articles for some weeks past. He was sentenced to be hung on the 18th inst. From the time of his conviction, every effort was made by his friends and council to obtain a new trial, and application was earnestly made to those having the power to grant, but with no avail. The evidence of his guilt appeared so certain, as not to leave a shadow of a doubt. The Governor and Chancellor therefore refused to interfere with the sentence. Colt indulged the hope that he would not be hung, until the morning of the day appointed for that purpose. The hour of his execution was fixed at 4 o'clock. At 12 o'clock, M., he was married to Miss Henshaw, his former mistress. She remained with him till 2 o'clock, when she took her leave in an agony of grief. His brother, Samuel Colt, also took his leave of him about the same time. He requested to be left alone from that time. A short time before four, Dr. Anthon, the clergyman who had attended him from Monday, requested to see him. On opening the door of his cell, he was found lying on his couch with a knife in his side, which per.etrated his heart.

Dr. Anthon has published an account of the interviews he had with him. From the conduct of Colt, the Dr. concluded he was a penitent sinner. This hope, we think, must have left him on finding that he had murdered himself.

A Coroner's inquest was held, and the jury returned a verdict of death by his own hands; but they could not ascertain how he came in possession of the knife. He insisted to the last, that he murdered Adams in self-defense, and entirely unintentionally. He has undoubtedly gone into the presence of his final judge, stained with the guilt of two murders. Let his end be a warning to all, to have their dispositions sanctified by the grace of the Gospel.

J. W. Webb.—This notorious duellist, who was some weeks since indicted for his recent duel with T. F. Marshall, of Ky., and set at liberty from a flaw in the indictment, has again been indicted. At his trial, he plead guilty, and was committed to the Tombs to await his sentence. Webb is a talented man and able writer, and very respectably connected. A great effort is made to have him pardoned. Webb thinks it hard that he should be the first against whom the law should be put in force. We trust the good sense of the Executive, will not allow so notorious an offender to escape the rigor of the law. If any man deserves rebuke, Webb is the man. But if talents and respectable connections will screen a man, then may we expect that laws will be set at defiance, and men with impunity will worry and devour each other like the untutored savages.

Revival in Rhode Island.

By a letter from Br. W. H. Potter, we learn that Elder Campbell is engaged in a powerful revival in Milltown, and Elder Green has likewise been instrumental in a great revival in North Stonington—13 have been added to the church of which he is pastor. Our churches in R. I. are represented as being alive to the interests of religion, and as possessing a very desirable state of spiritual activity. The Sabbath occupies considerable attention, as it always does where the spirit of God is poured out, and there are any to hold up its light. Some have already embraced it—others will soon. And all will eventually.

"Buy the truth, and sell it not."

In business transactions, in science, and in almost every worldly matter, men are anxious to understand what is truth. All, or nearly so, are prepared to speak of the disadvantage of error. That its results are just the reverse of the truth, is easy to be understood. Hence every man to secure his temporal interests, seeks after truth. If truth is important to man in temporal matters, how much more so is it in eternal things. Errors in business matters may be corrected, but an error in eternal things, cannot be recalled—its consequences must eternally remain. Error is sometimes specious and is often taken for truth, but sincerity in error does not change its nature or consequences; it is error still, and its own consequences will attend it. Error sometimes offers great attractions, and even offers to do more good than the truth, or at any rate, it proposes to serve a man's convenience better, and end with him just as well. Hence multitudes choose the ways of error. But can error supply the place of truth and be as acceptable with God? If so, he would not have inspired his servant to exhort, "buy the truth, and sell it not." Error is so cheap as to be urged upon man without cost, but in the end it leaves him an eternal bankrupt. Truth is so valuable, that men are exhorted to buy it, and sell it not. At the first, it may cause some temporal sacrifice and inconvenience, but in the end, it makes its possessor eternally rich. By truth shall men be judged at last. If they have it in possession, with them, all things are well. If they have it not, no tongue can describe their loss. "Buy the truth, and sell it not."

The Family Christian Almanac.—Beside the usual matter of Almanacs, it contains almost 20 pages of valuable reading matter for the Christian family. They may be obtained in this village of Rev. W. B. Downer, Agent of the American Tract Society.

Animal Magnetism or Mesmerism.—By Doct. J. S. Douglass.—Those wishing to know more of this matter may, by calling on the Agent of the American Tract Society, obtain the work and satisfy themselves by examining it. Testimonials of Profs. Geo. W. Eaton, and J. H. Raymond, of Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution, accompany the work.

Congress.—Congress will re-assemble on Tuesday of next week. The Message of the President, will not reach us till after our next paper is issued. We shall publish it entire, or give an abstract of it, and also give a synopsis of the doings of Congress.

A pleasant revival is in progress in the First-day Baptist church in Brookfield. The second and third S. D. Baptist churches, likewise share in its influences. We shall probably have a more full account of it soon.

For the Register.

The Revival at Mystic, Ct.

In a communication dated Sept. 11, the fact was mentioned that 324 had been baptized in Mystic, during the 4 weeks previous. At that time, the work of God was in rapid progress in the hearts of the villagers, and I have now further cheering intelligence.—Within the circle of about 3 miles around the village, there have been about 600 souls added to the different churches, as follows:—To the 1st Baptist, Groton, under Mr. Hedden's charge, 45 souls. (Eld. John Green has labored in this church.) To the 2d Baptist, Groton, Eld. Steward pastor, 260 souls. To the 3d Baptist, Groton, Eld. Denison pastor, 150 souls. To the Methodist churches at Upper and Lower Mystic, Messrs. Phelps and Simmons preachers, 100 souls. To the Congregational church at the Road, Mr. Cooke pastor, 25 souls.—These are all in and near this village. In addition to these, at Stonington Point, some 200 have joined the churches. At Milltown, 50 or 60, at the 2d Baptist, in North Stonington, perhaps as many; at Ledyard in the Congregational, several; at New London in the 1st Baptist, about 80 and at the 2d do. about 25.

Elder Jabez Swan, who, under God, has been the immediate instrument of this work, is now laboring in the city of New London, where he encounters the severest opposition, both from individuals and from the secular press in various parts of the country. About 100 have been baptized there within a few weeks, and the prospects are said to be encouraging. His preaching is distinguished, 1. By uncompromising denunciation of inactive professors. 2. Direct and familiar appeals to the conscience and common sense of sinners. 3. A strict and simple following out of the plain, obvious and literal examples and precepts of the New Testament, as the only safe guide for church order, doctrine and practice. 4. A merciless exposure of the fallacy and folly of Universalism.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the New-York Evangelist.

ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA.

Sixteen Days Later from Europe.

By the steamer Acadia, which arrived at Boston, on Thursday morning the 17th inst., we have London papers to the evening of the 3d inst., and Liverpool of the 4th.

Parliament it is thought will not meet before the beginning of January.

Conspiracy of the Chartists to break Jail.

The greatest excitement prevailed amongst the authorities of the County of Stafford, Eng., and the persons in charge of the jail, in consequence of the deep-laid and well-concocted plan of the rioters confined in it to effect their escape. At an early hour, a letter said to have been written by a prisoner named O'Neil, who is under sentence, was put into the Governor's hands. This letter disclosed the plan of the prisoners, and informed the Governor of the time when the plan was to be carried into execution.

It is supposed that the detection of this conspiracy will hasten the departure of the convicts sentenced to transportation.

Rumored Abdication of Louis Phillippe.

It is stated that the French King has discussed with persons in his confidence the propriety of abdicating the throne in favor of the Duke de Nemours.

Mercantile Affairs.

In mercantile matters, there was but little improvement. The revulsion in the corn trade, by overwhelming so many houses at home and abroad, has spread difficulty and alarm on every side.

We are sorry to say that the feeling of despondency amongst the commercial classes rather increases than diminishes.

The firmness with which the Liverpool corn houses have stood the recent shock has excited great surprise in London, and it certainly says much for the prudence with which they have conducted their operations.

France.

The cabinet of the Tuilleries have proposed to the British government the abrogation of the treaty of 1831 and 1333, by which the mutual right of search for the prevention of the slave trade was established, and the adoption, instead of it, of the system agreed upon between England and America—that each country should maintain an equal naval force on the west coast of Africa, as a check on malpractices under its own flag.

News of the Day.

From the Tribune.

THE LAST SCENE.

Yesterday Colt, the convicted murderer of Samuel Adams, was sentenced to be hung; but he chose to take upon himself the office of executioner, and rushed into eternity by staining his soul with a crime as black as that which brought upon him the fate he so desperately sought to shun.

Colt was engaged nearly all night in writing a reply to the letter of Gov. Seward, which it is said he ordered to be left sealed until his child should be old enough to understand it. He was under the care of Deputy Sheriffs Vultee and Green, and in the morning was shaved and dressed, and received a brief visit from his brother. The gallows was erected in the centre of the area. It was the same one used at the execution of Robinson, in New Jersey, and bore upon it marks of twelve strokes of that hatchet, which never falls but it sends to eternity a human soul. It consisted simply of two upright posts, and one traversely placed, with a rope over a pulley—one end being attached to a heavy weight, and the other formed into a noose. At 11 o'clock Dr. Anthon, in company with Samuel Colt, visited his cell, and made preparations for his marriage with Miss Henshaw, & was soon after performed in presence of Samuel Colt, David Graham, Robert Emmett, Justice Merritt, the Sheriff, and J. H. Payne. After their marriage they were left alone for nearly an hour. At about half past 12 Dudley Selden went into his cell, and at 1, Colt took a cup of coffee with his wife.

His brother Samuel arrived soon after and entered his cell. He was still engaged in earnest conversation with his wife, who was sitting at the foot of the bed, convulsed in tears. At Colt's request, John Howard Payne and Lewis Gaylord Clarke then went into his cell to take their leave of him. Colt appeared exceedingly glad to see them; shook them cordially by the hand, and conversed with apparent cheerfulness with them for five minutes, when they bade him farewell, both of them in tears. Colt's brother Samuel, and his wife, remained in the cell about ten minutes longer, when both left. His brother was deeply affected, and looked more ghastly even than Colt himself. His wife could scarcely support herself so violent were her feelings. She stood at the door of the cell for a minute—Colt kissed her passionately—strained her to his bosom, and watched her receding form as she passed into the corridor. Here she stood and sobbed convulsively as though her heart would break, for five minutes. At last she was led away by Colt's brother, and his friends followed.

He then desired to see the Sheriff, who went into his cell. Colt then told him emphatically that he was innocent of the murder of Adams, and that he never intended to kill him; he also told him that he still had hopes that something would intervene to save him from being hung, and begged him not to execute the sentence of the law upon him. The Sheriff told him to banish all hopes of that kind, for he must die at four o'clock. He then requested to see the Sheriff's watch, and set his own by it to a minute.

He then asked to see Dr. Anthon, and the latter went into his cell, and remained in prayer with him for about ten minutes.—At the close of this, Colt again sent for the Sheriff, and said to him, "If there are any gentlemen present, who wish to see me, I shall be happy to see them."

This was announced by the Sheriff, and all present with one or two exceptions passed up to his cell door, shook him by the hand and took their leave of him. To one gentleman connected with the press he said: "I've spoken harshly of some of the press, but I don't blame you at all; it was all my own fault; there were things that ought to have been explained; I know you have a good heart, and I forgive you from my soul freely! may God bless you and may you prosper."

He then requested his keeper, Mr. Greene, to let him be left alone until the last moment. This was about 2 P. M.—His cell was closed and he was left alone till 20 minutes to 3, when some friends of the Sheriff apprehending that he might attempt to commit suicide, one of the Deputy Sheriffs, Hillyer, went to the cell door. Colt was then walking up and down his cell, but turned round on the door opening, smiled on Hillyer, shook him by the hand, and kissed him, as he did several of those who just preciously bid him farewell. He said to Hillyer—"God bless you, and may you prosper in this life, which is soon to close on me."

At a few minutes before 4, Sheriffs Hart and Westervelt went to his cell to announce to him that his hour had come—but their summons was not needed. Dr. Anthon stepped into the door, but started back in horror. On looking in at the cell, the body of Colt lay stretched out at full length upon his bed, his hands crossed upon his abdomen and covered with blood, and a small Spanish dirk driven to his heart, was sticking in his body. His mouth and eyes were slightly open, and the knife had not been moved after its deadly thrust. He was pronounced dead by physicians in attendance, the Coroner took charge of the body, and the cell was locked.

At this moment a volume of smoke and flame burst from the large cupola to the prison; a tremendous rush was made by those outside towards the door, and by those within to make their escape. The great bell on the City Hall struck the alarm at the precise hour fixed for the execution; the engines were promptly on the ground, but as the fire was in the very summit of the cupola, the water could not reach it, and continued to burn downwards for an hour until the whole was consumed to the roof. The greatest excitement prevailed without. The multitude refused to believe in the story of his death, and a very general impression prevailed that the whole was a ruse to secure his escape.

There prevailed a very general suspicion that the cupola was set on fire: but there is no good ground to believe it. A fire is constantly kept there for the accommodation of the person employed to keep a lookout for fires. He had made a very large fire yesterday, and went to see the execution. The pipe, without doubt, became red hot, and thus set the cupola on fire.

STATE LUNATIC ASYLUM.

This noble and humane Institution will, we understand, be ready for the reception of patients about the first of January next. It is under the charge of Dr. A. Brigham as Superintendent and Physician, and who is very favorably known to the public as the Superintendent and Physician for several years of the Retreat for the Insane, at Hartford, Connecticut. The Assistant Physician is Dr. Buttolph, who, besides a thorough medical education, has devoted much time and study to the subject of insanity, and the best modes of treatment of the insane.

The building now erected, and which is 550 feet long and three stories high, exclusive of the basement, will accommodate about three hundred patients. This is a greater number than it was originally designed to accommodate: but the managers have, by excavating the earth from the outer wall of the basement floor, rendered that story equally as dry and good as any of the stories, and thereby very considerably increased the number of rooms for the lodging of patients.

The impression perhaps exists to some extent, that this Asylum is designed solely for patients who may be sent to it by the several counties, at the expense of the counties sending them. This, however, is not so. By the law for the organization of the Asylum, passed 7th of April, 1842, the Managers may authorize the Superintendent "whenever there are vacancies in the Asylum, to admit under special agreements such recent cases as may seek admission under pecuniary afflictive circumstances, or which in his opinion promise speedy recovery."

The law also provides, that whenever a person shall escape indictment, or be acquitted of a criminal charge on the ground of Insanity that the Court shall, if the insanity continue, order him to be confined in the Asylum, at the expense of the county from which he is sent. And whenever a person in confinement or imprisoned under a conviction or a criminal charge shall become insane, and that fact is proved as the law provides, he shall be removed to the Asylum, and supported there at the expense of the county to which he belongs.

And it is further provided that "When any person by lunacy or otherwise, becomes furiously mad, or so far disordered in his senses as to endanger his own person or the person or property of others, if permitted to go at large, he shall be confined in the State Asylum, and the expenses paid out of his own property, if he is possessed of sufficient for that purpose, or by his relatives, who by law are bound to maintain him, or by the county to which he belongs; and no person who is confined by the order of a court or magistrate, or by the superintendents of the poor, on the ground of Insanity, can be legally confined in a jail or poor-house, or other place than the Asylum, for a longer period than ten days."

Under these provisions of law, it is quite probable that this Institution will be filled with patients as rapidly as the Superintendent can receive them, and get them subjected to the discipline of the Institution.—And it will be readily seen by every person at all acquainted with the management of the insane, that there must be some regulations prescribed for the gradual admission of patients.

The law accordingly directs that the Superintendent shall designate different days for the admission of patients, from the different counties, which he is to do in a circular to be sent to each County Clerk, who is requested to send the same to the superintendents of the poor.

The law provides that "No patient shall be admitted into the Asylum, except upon an order of some Court, Justice, Judge or Supreme Court Commissioner, without lodging with the Superintendent, first a request under the hand of the person by whose direction he is sent, stating his age and place of nativity, if known, his christian and surname, place of residence, occupation and degree of relationship, or other circumstance of connexion between him and the person requesting his admission: and second a certificate dated within two months, under oath, signed by two respectable Physicians of the fact of his being insane. Each person signing such request or certificate, shall annex to his name, his profession or occupation, and the town, county, and State of his residence, unless these facts appear upon the face of the document.

The rate of charge for patients supported by the several counties, and for those in indigent circumstances, for board, washing, medicine and attendance, is fixed by law at $2.50 per week, until 1st of April next, and thereafter it is to be fixed by the Managers at the actual cost of support and attendance, "exclusive of the officers' salaries," which are paid by the State. For other patients, we understand it will vary according to trouble and expense incurred, but in no case to exceed $4 per week, unless by special agreement with the Managers or Superintendent.

The Slave Latimer.—A very great excitement has existed in Boston of late, in reference to a fugitive claimed and illegally arrested and confined by his pretended owner. A correspondent of the New York Tribune has given an account of it, and also of the release of the slave. He says:

"The excitement which grew out of the arrest and imprisonment of Latimer, without warrant or other legal process, so far from abating, has been continually on the increase. The excitement had become so extensive that probably not less than 5,000 people would have come together to await the result of the trial on Monday next, if the case had not been taken out of Court by the voluntary act of the claimant and his agents. Not less than 800 people had made arrangements to come from Lynn alone, to attend the trial, and hundreds more were ready to flock in from other places, while the great body of our citizens were moved with sympathy for the fugitive, and indignation against those who had illegally arrested and detained him.

This general excitement and agitation, together with certain legal proceedings impending over the heads of the slave-holders, the Sheriff and Jailor, and a well settled conviction that further effort to obtain their victim as a slave would be useless, brought them to terms; and they last night set the prisoner free, on the payment of $100 to meet part of the expenses incurred by his arrest and imprisonment Not a cent of this, however, will go to Gray, the claimant; but it will all be absorbed in meeting only a part of the expenses of the officers. Gray has spent nearly $700 besides his time, for which he will have only this consolation, that he has been the means of creating an excitement unexampled in Boston, without obtaining his victim; and thus rendered it morally certain that a fugitive slave is as secure here as he can be in any place this side of heaven!—The Sheriff confessed that he had done wrong; said he was heartily sorry that he had been induced to have any agency in such a transaction, and that no fugitive slave should ever cross the threshold of our jail while it remained under his control. The jailor also protested that he would never be concerned in such a business; and in consideration of these promises, Latimer and his friends agreed not to prosecute them for false imprisonment, or any other charge connected with the transaction. Austin, also, the counsel for Gray, declared that this should be his last slave case—and they all agreed that not an officer in Boston could be persuaded, by any means, to engage in such a case! Austin furnished Latimer with free papers, and surrendered the power of attorney for the arrest of his afflicted wife; and this morning, after four weeks of anxiety and despondency, they met and embraced each other in the full enjoyment of liberty!

Children in the Coal Mines of England.—Public attention in England has been much directed of late to the condition and sufferings of the children employed in the coal mines of England. The facts which have already come to light relative to their degradation and the cruelty practiced by their overseers, are of a most startling nature. An imperfect abstract from the registration of deaths for the year 1833, gives a total in England alone, of three hundred and forty nine deaths of children and adults, by violence in coal mines, and shows the most common causes of them.

Causes of Death	Under 13.	Between 13 & 18	over 18.
Fell down the shafts	13	16	31
Fell down the shaft from the rope breaking	1	—	2
Fell out when ascending	—	—	3
Drawn from the pulley	3	—	3
Fall of stone out of skip down the shaft	1	—	8
Drowned in the mines	3	4	15

Suffocation by choke damp	—	2	6
Explosion of gunpowder.	—	1	3

The commissioners appointed to examine the subject, collected such an array of facts as substantiated their conclusions, "that in all the coal-fields, accidents of a fearful nature are extremely frequent; and that the returns made to their own queries, as well as the registry tables, prove that of the work-people who perish by such accidents, the proportion of children and young persons sometimes equals, and rarely falls much below that of adults."

Severe Gale on Lake Erie—Wrecks, and Loss of Life.—A letter from Buffalo of last Saturday states that Lake Erie has been visited by a terrible gale, disastrous to the shipping, and attended with the loss of life. Eleven vessels heard from have been wrecked within twenty miles of Buffalo. The Buffalo Advertiser of the same date says:—

"The gale blew itself pretty much out this morning. The wind is yet high, and occasional sough may still be heard, but the temptest is over. It was dreadful, though, while it lasted, or from about noon yesterday until some indeterminate time last night. The wind blew a perfect hurricane most of the time, and the air was so filled with snow that one could scarcely see twenty yards. The temperature was very low, and altogether it was about the worst gale we ever experienced in Buffalo. The sharp clear air this morning, the frozen ground and snow look like mid-winter.

The water in the harbor rose some five feet, but has done little injury other than to inundate the flats, and obstruct navigation on the canal. No arrivals have taken place since yesterday noon. The Rochester packet due last evening is still absent, being unable to stem both ice and wind upon the canal.

Capt. Drew, who commanded the expedition that destroyed the steamboat Caroline, at Schlosser, has been appointed to the command of the English man-of-war Wasp, of 16 guns.

The Common Council of Albany have authorized the Mohawk and Hudson Rail Road Company, to construct a branch from the late junction, to some point near Cooke's Garden, in State street, and to run the steam-engine thereon.

A Texas Wonder.—The "Enchanted Rock," which has long been celebrated as a place to which many of the tribes of Northern Indians pay periodical visits, for the purpose of performing their superstitious devotions, is situated on the "Sandy," a branch of the Perdinales; and is thus described by a person who has recently visited it:

"The feelings and imaginations swell almost to breathless astonishment on beholding one immense solid rock of dark reddish color, rising to the hight of about 400 feet, and covering a space large than a common mile race track, of about 200 acres of ground. Upon its surface there are several excavations or pits, one of which would hold several hundred hogs of water, from which there may under a peculiar state of the atmospheric exhalations escape and explode, doubtless giving rise to the traditions of its emitting light. The only evidences of the pilgrimage and worship of the Indians were the innumerable amount of deeply worn trails approaching it from every valley and plain, and the small pieces of loose rocks and pebbles found upon its top.

"Tis rock is composed almost entirely of a dark colored mica, and it is probably to the reflection of the rays of the sun or moon from the numerous glassy surfaces of the scales of mica, that the brilliant appearance of the rock is attributable."

Great Destruction of Vessels—Several Lives Lost.—We learn that during the severe storm on Friday, the 4th inst., between twenty and thirty vessels were driven ashore off our coast, between Sandy Hook and Barnegat—most of which were schooners and sloops. The wife of the captain of one vessel was washed overboard after the vessel had struck the beach and was drowned. They had but a few days previous been united in the solemn bonds of matrimony. The captain and crew all reached the shore safe. Another vessel, after having struck the beach immediately went to pieces and four of the crew were drowned—the fifth, fortunately got ashore in the yawl, and the sixth and last, got upon a piece of the wreck and was washed ashore upon it and was saved. We further learn that the brig Augusta, from Jamaica, bound to New York, went ashore on the 8th inst., on the Old Inlet Shoals, Little Egg Harbor, laden with Pimento.—Monmouth N. J. Inquirer.

The Kennebec Journal referring to the numerous advertisements in the Washington papers of runaway slaves, says:—"If all in the District of Columbia would be good enough to run away, it would save a world of troublesome controversy, and relieve the general government in a great degree from the odium of protecting slavery by its authority, an odium which cannot much longer be incurred."

Three young men of Petersburg, Perry Co., Pa., recently went to serenade a newly married pair in that town, when they were fired upon from the house of the bridegroom, and all three wounded. The affair is about to undergo a judicial investigation.

A daily two-penny paper has been commenced in this city by J. V. Himes, entitled "The Midnight Cry," in which the Editor proposes to state "some of the principal reasons for his faith in the Second Coming of Christ in 1843." Each page is enclosed with black lines, as if dressed in mourning.

Col. Webb Arraigned and in Prison for Sentence.—Col. Webb, indicted for leaving the State with intent to give or receive a challenge; the indictment also charging the fact that he did give or receive such challenge, was arraigned on Saturday morning before the Recorder and Judge Lynch, and pleaded guilty to the indictment.

On being arraigned, Col. Webb remarked that when recently arraigned for the same offense, he accompanied his plea of guilty with a brief statement of the nature of his offending, and the character of the persecution which had singled him out for punishment, from a host of others who had offended in like manner; and in now again pleading guilty to the indictment, he would refer to what he had already placed on record.

After some further remarks, he concluded by declaring his readiness to abide the decision of the Court.

Mr. Whiting immediately rose, and said he felt it his duty to move that Col. Webb stand committed, which the Recorder decided must be done. He then was committed to the Tombs, there to remain until his day of sentence—which will be early next week.

A petition couched in the following terms has been circulated, and very generally signed:

To His Excellency, William H. Seward, Governor of the State of New York.

The undersigned would respectfully represent—That whereas, J. Watson Webb, editor of the New York Courier and Enquirer, has pleaded guilty to an indictment for leaving the State with intent to accept, and for accepting a challenge to fight a duel with the Hon. T. F. Marshall, and is in prison awaiting the sentence of the law—and believing the case is one justly claiming the clemency of the Executive: We do respectfully ask the interposition of your Excellency, and that you may be pleased to grant the said Webb a full and unconditional pardon.—Sun.

The British Treaty.—A letter from Mr. Cushing, published in the Newburyport Herald, gives a description of this public document. It says, the treaty is fairly engrossed, in a thin volume of folio ruled paper, bound in crimson velvet, with ribbons to tie the covers together, when closed; depending from which on two silver or silk cords, with large tassels of the same materials, is the seal, five or six inches in diameter, and an inch thick. The seal is contained in a silver box or case, stamped on the cover with a beautiful raised impression of the British arms, and represents Queen Victoria on horseback with a page holding the horse, and surrounding the figures the legend "Victoria Dei Gratia Brittanniarum Regina Fidei Defensor." The signature to the ratification by the Queen is in large and bold hand, Victoria R.

Canadian Outrage.—The American schr. Frontier, Capt. M'Intosh, while passing through the Welland canal at the place where it is now re-building, was boarded by about 200 of the laborers, mostly Irish, who broke open the hatches, and drove the crew from the vessel. Capt. M. was badly injured by blows received from the clubs of the assailants, and one of the crew had several large gashes cut in his head, and three fingers broken by the cudgels of the mob. A detachment of soldiers from St. Catherines, on hearing of the riot were immediately despatched to their assistance, which conveyed the Capt. and his scattered crew on board, and kept at bay their blood-thirsty assilants.—Jour. of Com.

A Yankee Specimen.—An officer of the sloop of war Boston, has written a letter from the coast of China, in which the enterprising character of Americans is hit off. Thus writes the officer:

'I fell in with two fine fellows, captains of opium smugglers. By the by, it is time to give you some description of these opium clippers. They are all built and rigged the same—being long, low, black, not schooners, but ships; they are perfect beauties; the masts are tall, and rake very much; the yards are long, and spread a great deal of canvass; the spars appear too much for the head, and look too heavy, but this is not the case; they mount from sixteen to twenty guns, and carry about 76 men. At Calcutta, they take a load of opium, run up here, and sell it for its weight in silver. I boarded one of them, the Red Rover, at Singapore.

The cabin furniture would do credit to any parlor in Philadelphia; one of our officers observed, 'Captain, your craft is a little down by the stern.' 'Yes,' said he, 'I have $700 000, stowed aft, and have no cargo, it brings her down a little, but she sails the better for it.' 'By Jove, I would like to go home prize master of this craft,' said the officer—'catch her, have her,' was the answer. The gentlemen who were with me yesterday, are both owners and captains; the way they made the dollars fly was a caution. Imagine my astonishment when I found they were Americans.

The Universities of Great Britain.—Professor Von Raumer, in his recently published work on England, devotes a brief letter to the Universities, and gives the number of their professors and students thus:

BY WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Governor of the State of New York.

A PROCLAMATION.

Thursday, the eighth of December next is hereby appointed to be observed by the people of this state as a day of public Thanksgiving and Praise to Almighty God for the manifold blessings of the year.—We have tilled the earth in safety and gathered plentiful harvests; relieved labor by inventions of art and new applications of science; brought to successful termination works of physical improvement, designed to promote social intercourse and to guard against accidents to human life and augment its enjoyments; rendered our system of intellectual and moral instruction more equal and efficient, and acquired comprehensive knowledge of the agricultural, forest and mineral resources which Providence has supplied in the territory assigned for our habitation. The savage warfare which so long prevailed on the southern border of our country, scarcely less painful to humanity, whether our arms were victorious or were unsuccessful against a rude and injured people, has ceased. Commotions which threatened to involve a sister state, and even the whole American family, in the calamities of civil war, and thus repress the growing confidence of mankind in their capacity of self-government, have peacefully subsided; and our controversies with a distinguished European nation have been adjusted by a treaty securing reciprocal advantages, and directing the efforts of both states to the removal of a great reproach upon Christendom, by the extirpation of the slave trade. Philanthropy has not abated her zeal within our borders, while extending her visitations to distant regions; and the labors of Philosophy throughout the civilized world have been crowned with discoveries tending to ameliorate human life and elevate the dignity of mankind.

Let us reverently acknowledge that these and all the blessings we enjoy, descend from Him by whom the nations of the earth are governed in righteousness, and all human affairs are regulated and controlled with infinite wisdom and mercy.

Given under my hand and the privy seal
of the state, at the city of Albany
L. S. this seventh day of November,
in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-two,
and the sixty-seventh year of American independence.
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Henry Underwood, Private Secretary.

TO THE LOCAL AGENTS OF THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Dear Brethren:—You will observe by the Minutes of the last session of the Society, that we are instructed to exert our utmost to settle up its concerns. Therefore, we would request each of you to do what you can in your several neighborhoods, to ascertain the state of the funds, and collect all that may be due, as far as possible; and transmit what you may thus collect to the Treasurer, Henry C. Hubbard, of Scott, and to give us a correct account of the state of the funds in your hands as soon as possible. We hope that each of you will attend to it without delay; for delays are dangerous. And as S. S. Griswold has been appointed by the Society, to collect its funds where he may travel, it is NECESSARY and EXPECTED, that those who are indebted to the Society, will be punctual and efficient in settling up the same.

LIVE AND HELP LIVE.

J. W. T. RICE, D. D. S.,

WOULD return his thanks to the Ladies and Gentlemen of De Ruyter for past favors, and would again tender to them his professional services for one or two weeks only, commencing Friday, December 2d, hence immediate application will be necessary to secure his services. He will while here strictly attend to all operations pertaining to his profession, such as inserting entire sets of teeth by atmospheric pressure, also, parts of sets with springs, claps, and pivots. Particular attention will be paid to cleansing, and filling decayed teeth with gold or tin foil.

From experience, he feels the utmost confidence in his profession, and would ask nothing more of the public, than his merit as an Operative Dentist deserves; therefore, let those persons desiring such manipulations, please honor him with a call, and if by social conversation and candid reasoning, he may not be able to convince them of the fact, that his garments are free from the stain of quackery, he will ask nothing more.

ODONTALGIA.

The tooth-ache, this most to be dreaded, and in fact, the most severe and excruciating affection or pain with which the human family are afflicted, may be, by applying to him, almost instantaneously relieved and effectually cured, (by the application of his chemical preparation,) without causing even the slightest degree of pain to the patient. Teeth will be extracted, (he was about to say without pain,) causing the least possible degree of pain, with the latest improved, and most scientific instruments.

BY VIRTUE of one writ of Fieri Facias, issued out of the Supreme Court of the People of the State of New York, and to me directed and delivered, against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of Ada Burdick, I have levied on, seized, and taken all the right, title, claim and interest, of the said Burdick, of and to the following described pieces of land, on the 24th day of December, 1840 or at any time since, all that certain piece or parcel of land situate in the 18th township, town of Brookfield, county of Madison, being part of lot No. 60 & 69, and bounded as follows: Beginning at the south east corner of lot No. 69, thence west to the south east corner of J. H. Buren's land, thence northerly along said Buren's line and up the creek to Benjamin Burdick's land, thence easterly along said Benjamin's line to S. P. Burdick's land, thence south to the south west corner of said S. P. Burdick's land, thence east to the centre of the highway, thence along said highway to the south east corner of a piece of land on lot No. 69, owned and occupied by Benjamin Burdick, thence east to Jacob Langworthy's land, thence south about 20 rods to the place of beginning, containing about 66 acres of land, be the same more or less. Also, one other piece or parcel of land in the town and county aforesaid, bounded as follows: Beginning at a stake near the corner of the mill dam, near the potash, thence north 79 degrees, east 14 rods to the road, thence on the road easterly six rods to a stake, thence south 68 degrees, west 19 rods to the bridge, thence north 78 degrees, west 16 rods to the corner of the said lot, thence north 15 degrees, east six rods and 5 links between the barn and shed to a stake, thence north 79 degrees west, 3 1-2 rods, thence north 7 degrees, east 13 rods to a stake at the pond, thence around the pond on the westerly side until it comes to the lands of Oliver Brown, at a stake, thence across the creek easterly to a stake on the east bank of said creek, thence down the pond on the easterly bank till it comes to the first mentioned bound, containing 8 acres of land more or less, together with the mills and water privileges thereon and the appurtenances thereto belonging. Also, one other piece or parcel of land, situate in the town and county aforesaid, on which the store stands, bounded, south by the highway, west by Truman Miller's house lot, north by land owned by Roswell P. Dowse, and easterly by the above described piece, supposed to contain one half of an acre of land be the same more or less, together with the buildings thereon, which I shall expose to sale at public vendue, at the inn now kept by Isaac P. Miner, in the village of Leonardsville, town of Brookfield, on the 9th day of January, 1843, at 10 o'clock, A. M.—Dated, Morrisville, Nov. the 23d, 1842.

Christian Review.

A GOOD PROPOSITION.

THE importance of the Christian Review is admitted. It was commenced nearly seven years since in obedience to an urgent and almost spontaneous call from different parts of the land, and in compliance with that call, has been sustained through six successive volumes, only by special effort, and considerable sacrifice (previous to the present volume) on the part of a few individuals. The number of subscribers, however, has gradually increased, so as to inspire the hope that ultimately, the list would become such as to place it above "want," and on a basis that should insure its perpetuity; and with proper exertions on the part of its friends, it is believed such a result might easily be accomplished.

The work is put at the low price of three dollars per annum, in order to bring it within the means of as large a number as possible. Yet, many who are able, and who would be benefitted by its perusal, are not now subscribers, and need, it is thought, only to be reminded of the facts to become so.

The work occupies a high position among the religious quarterlies of the country, and in the estimation of intelligent men of all Christian denominations, is contributing a good share of the religious periodical literature of the age. To the Baptist denomination in particular, it is an auxiliary in defence and illustration of the truth, with which it is believed, we cannot afford to dispense. And, since the committee and the publishers have resolved, never again to make an appeal for pecuniary aid, but to discontinue its publication whenever the subscriptions cease to be sufficient to sustain it, it becomes every well-wisher of the Review to exert himself now in its behalf.

☞The publishers having a number of the past volumes on hand, propose, in order to interest some who may be desirous of possessing it, yet feel unable to subscribe, to exert their influence to obtain new subscribers, and by so doing not only secure it for themselves, but, by increasing its circulation, extend its usefulness, and help to insure its perpetuity—to offer a premium for new subscribers, as follows:

☞Any person obtaining TWENTY NEW SUBSCRIBERS and remitting the publishers sixty dollars, shall be entitled to a complete set of the Review in seven volumes, the subscription price of which is, TWENTY ONE DOLLARS!

⁂For FIFTEEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, the last five volumes will be given—subscription price FIFTEEN DOLLARS!

⁂For TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, the last two volumes, subscription price, SIX DOLLARS!

For FIVE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, either of the last three volumes, subscription price, THREE DOLLARS!

It is hoped that this very liberal premium, may induce many of the friends of the Review to make a renewed effort in its behalf, and thus not only reap benefit themselves, but aid the great object the Review is intended to sustain.

SUBSCRIBERS are reminded of the terms of subscription, "three dollars per annum IN ADVANCE." Have you paid your subscription? The money is much needed.

GOULD KENDALL & LINCOLN, Publishers,
59 Washington Street.

N. B. The publishers of any religious paper who shall give the above advertisement three insertions in their columns (and send a copy to the publishers) shall be entitled to a selection of either two of the last four volumes.

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers, and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business in the shop formerly occupied by S. M. House, over I. R. Cook's jewelry store, one door east of E. D. Jenck's store, in all its various branches, where they will be happy to wait on customers on the shortest notice. Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done up in a style not surpassed by any of the "Craft" in this "village or county;" and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and travelling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, trouble and expense. The principal advantage to be derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inkstand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents.—Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

Cost of preparing the work, $5000. This beautiful and important work contains upwards of 500 pages royal octavo, is printed from new stereotype plates, handsomely bound in gilt, and lettered, and retails readily at the low price of $2 50 per volume. The following extract is from a lengthy Review, written by the Rev. W. C. Brownlee, D. D., and is only one out of several hundred recommendations, from the clergy and the press, that the work has already received.

New-York, August 6, 1842.

"This is, beyond question, one of the most elegant books ever presented to our fellow citizens in this Republic. It ought to be in every Christian family for its innate value; and in every patriotic family as a splendid specimen of our progress in domestic manufactures, and the advancement of our artists and manufacturers in their rivalship with those of Europe. W. C. BROWNLEE."

A very liberal offer!—One Hundred Dollars will be given by the Publisher to every Agent who will purchase and sell One Hundred Copies of the above Work. He believes that there is scarcely a town or village in the Union, but that numbers may easily be disposed of.

☞ Persons enclosing money, will be careful to pay the whole postage; and in ordering books will state, explicitly, how the books shall be sent to them.

Also, in press, another important, valuable, and cheap work, in the course of publication, and will be ready for delivery early in October, 1842, complete in one volume royal octavo, containing about 600 pages of letter-press, and more than five hundred Engravings, elegantly bound in gilt; price only $2 50 per copy.

POETRY.

Arouse thee, Soul!

BY ROBERT NICOLL.

Arouse thee, Soul!
God made not thee to sleep
Thy hour of death, in doing naught—away;
He gave thee power to keep,
Oh! use it for his glory, while you may.
Arouse thee, Soul!

Arouse thee, Soul!
O there is much to do
For thee, if thou would'st work for human kind
The misty Future through,
A greatness looms—'tis mind, awaken'd mind!
Arouse thee, Soul!

Arouse thee, Soul!
Shake off thy sluggishness,
As shakes the lark the dewdrop from its wing;
Make but one Error less—
One Truth—thine offering to Mind's altar bring!
Arouse thee, Soul!

Arouse thee, Soul!
Be what thou surely art,
An emanation from the Deity,
A flutter of that heart
Which fills all Nature, sea and earth, and sky.
Arouse thee, Soul!

Arouse thee, Soul!
And let the body do
Some worthy deed for human happiness
To join, when life is through,
Unto thy name; that Angels both may bless!
Arouse thee, Soul!

Arouse thee, Soul!
Leave nothing of the earth;—
And, if the body be not strong to dare,
To blessed thoughts give birth,
High as yon Heaven, pure as Heaven's air,
Arouse thee, Soul!

Arouse thee, Soul!
Or sleep for evermore,
And be what all nonentities have been—
Crawl on till life is o'er:
If to be aught but this thou e'er dost mean,
Arouse thee, Soul!

A BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF THE WHALE FISHERY.

From the time a whale ship leaves port, until she has procured a cargo of oil, there are men stationed at mast-head, one at the fore mast head, one at the main-mast, and one at the mizen-mast. Their elevation is from 50 to 80 feet above the ship's deck. These men are relieved once in two hours during the day. After sailing many weeks and sometimes many months, whales of different kinds may have been seen, but not being valued for their oil they are not attacked. There are six kinds, viz: Sperm, Right, Humpback, Finback, Sulphur-bottom and the Grampus. Only the three former are valued for their oil. When the man at mast-head sees the water blow up by a whale, he cries out in a loud voice, 'There she blows!' and repeats the cry as often as she blows. The Master or Officer asks, 'Where away?'—The reply is given, 'two points on our lee bow, Sir,' by the sailor aloft, or in any other direction as the case may be. Orders are then given for bearing the ship down for the whale, until within one-eighth or one-half of a mile, as circumstances will admit, always striving if possible to keep the ship to the windward of the whale, because after attacking her she almost invariably runs against wind and sea, which make it a laborious task for shipkeepers in working the ship to the whale. Orders are once more given to the sailors, 'Back the main yard.' This command is instantly obeyed. In this evolution, the ship's sails are put in such a position that a part have a tendency to give the ship a retrograde, as well as a direct motion, so that she remains nearly stationary. A command is then given to lower away the boats, numbering from three to five, as depends on the size of the ship, and the number of the crew. This is promptly obeyed, by swinging cranes projecting out on the ship's sides, from under the boats and slacking away on the davit tackles. Each boat is manned by six men; an officer or mate, a harpooner or boat-steerer and four seamen. Now each crew make every possible exertion in propelling its boat to see who shall have honor and praise of the first attack. When within a few yards, the harpooner stands up, takes the fatal weapon in his hand, which is attached to a small chord of many fathoms, coiled snugly away near the stem of the boat, and with good force and aim gives the monster a death-blow. The whale now sounds, or descends a great depth into the sea, not often so far, however, as to take the whole length of line. While she is ascending, the boat's crew is nearing her, by hauling in the line made fast to her, and the other boats crews are now ready to give her the second attack with their harpoons, as soon as this is done, stations are changed by the officer and harpooner of each boat—the harpooner goes to the stern and steers the boat, while the the officer steps forward into the bow of the same, takes the lance in hand, and darts it into the whale up to the hilt which is about three feet. The lance is attached to a line six or eight fathoms long, made fast to the boat The blade is an oval or diamond shape perfectly pointed and sharp, with a long iron shank, in which is a socket fitted to the staff six or eight feet long, which, when thrown, gives the iron much force. This process is repeated by the different boats as often as an opportunity occurs, until she goes into a flurry so called, or breathing her last, when all boats stand clear giving her line until she gives the last but dreadful struggle, and dies. A signal is then given by holding a flag, which is known by the shipkeepers as a signal that the the whale is dead and for them to sail the ship to her. This is done as soon as possible. A large hawser is made fast to the tail or flukes, which is also made fast on board ship and she comes alongside—Nearly all sail is taken in. All hands commence getting her in by cutting with spades and at the same time heaving at the windlass with a large tackle and fall attached to it, until they have hoisted up a piece fifteen or twenty feet long and three or four wide. The thickness depends upon the blubber or fat flesh of the whale, being usually from six to fourteen inches. There is then a process to go through, called boarding, which is nothing more than cutting this piece in two, already hoisted so that it will swing in midships, over the main hatch. Orders are then given, 'Lower away.' At the same moment, it falls down betwixt decks into what is called the Blubber Room.—Here are men stationed who cut it into pieces from ten to eighteen inches long, eight to twelve wide. From there it is thrown upon deck and taken to the mincing-house, where a man stands with a mincing knife, (shaped nearly as a bush-scythe with a handle on each end,) and slices it into pieces from one quarter of an inch to an inch thick. From thence it is thrown into try-pots, so called, elevated on brick work, similar to those used by farmers, only of much larger size. For starting, fire-wood is first used, afterwards scraps and blubber is used for fuel in trying out whales during the voyage. As the pots fill up, the oil is dipped into a cistern, from thence into casks which are put below, and stowed away, where it remains until discharged from ship.—Manchester Democrat.

SISTER.

A thousand ties occur to bind sisters together. There is in the first place, a natural affection in the human heart, implanted there to correspond to that relation and thus unite those in attachment who have been borne on the same bosom, and grown up around the same hearth. Besides this instinctive affection, they naturally become attached from sympathy, from sharing the same joys and sorrows, and loving the same object.

The same events for years have filled them with gladness, and often they have mingled their tears at the same calamities. Their interests have been the same, and even their childish plays, the source to them of infinite delight, have made closer the tie which draw their hearts together. Sisters, blossoms on the same stem, what should ever sever them! Stars shining in the same constellation, why should they not mingle their mild radiance in peace! If there be in their hearts any capacity for attachments, how can their common tasks, their common pleasures, their perpetual society, fail of uniting them in the most intimate affection? If they have any literary ambition, any desire for intellectual improvement, they may minister endlessly to each others pleasures and progress. If they would add to literary accomplishment the charm of graceful and winning manners, whose eye so quick as that of a sister to administer friendly criticism and admonition? I counsel them to use well that portion of life which they pass under the same roof, to cement the bond of natural affection, for the time will come when they will probably need it all. For as fountains which rise upon the same mountain top, diverse and run in opposite directions, traverse plains as different as tropical abundance and polar sterility, and finally join the great ocean, one under the burning line and the other in the midst of perpetual snows; so sisters, rocked in the same cradle, watched over by the same maternal solicitude, walking hand in hand the same path of education and accomplishment, may be destined, by events over which they have no control, to a lot as widely contrasted as can possibly be conceived. Equality of conditions they cannot hope. How shall they resist the influences which tend to divide their hearts as well as their fortunes? The best security for lasting attachment and for happy intercourse through life, is the assiduous cultivation, as long as they are together, of kindness, forbearance, and generosity. It is a mistake to suppose that the natural affections need no cultivation. They are from the nature of things, subjected to the same laws with any other attachment. The natural relations are only the foundation for attachments. But unfaithfulness to the social relations, gradually weakens the strongest natural ties, and sisters even, who have done nothing but cross and render each other uncomfortable, will seek their friendships any where rather than with those in whom they will find neither sympathy nor consideration.—Burnap's Lectures.

SINAI.—Among all the stupendous works of nature, not a place can be more fitted for the exhibition of Almighty power. I have stood upon the summit of the giant Etna, and looking over the clouds floating beneath it, upon the bold scenery of Sicily, and the distant mountains of Calabria; upon the top of the Vesuvius, and looked down upon the waves of the lava, and the ruined and half recovered cities at its foot; and they are nothing compared with the terrific solitude and bleak majesty of Sinai. An observing traveler has well called it 'a perfection of desolation.' Not a tree or shrub, or blade of grass is to be seen upon the bare and rugged sides of innumerable mountains, heaving their naked summits to the skies, while the crumbling masses of granite all around, and the distant view of the Syria desert, with its boundless waste of land, from the wildest and most dreary, the most terrific and desolate picture that the imagination can conceive. The level surface of the very top, or pinnacle, is about 60 feet square. At one end is a single rock about twenty feet high, on which, said the monk, the Spirit of God descended, while in the crevice beneath his favored servant received the tables of the law. The ruins of the church and convent are still to be seen upon the mountain, to which, before the convent below was built, monks and hermits used to retire, and, secluded from the world, sing the praises of God upon his chosen hill. Near this, also in ruins, stands a Mohammedan mosque; for on this sacred spot the followers of Christ and Mohammed have united in worshipping the true and living God. Under the chapel is a hermit's cell, where, in the iron age of fanaticism the anchorite lived out his days in fasting, meditation and prayer.—Travels in Egypt.

Divine grace educates the reasoning faculties of the soul, as well as the best affections of the heart; and happily consecrates them both to the glory of the Redeemer.

In all your dealings be honest and upright.

From the Washington.

THE POT OF BOILED MILK.

Some time ago, after a juvenile temperance procession had been dismissed, I called a chubby cheeked, flaxen haired little boy to me. Why do you walk with the other boys and wear that badge, my little fellow? said I. 'Why, because I am a temperance boy,' said he, quickly, and his bright eyes glistened with joy as he recounted to me, in his artless manner, the pleasure he had felt that day. But, said I, you have not yet told me what temperance means. 'Why,' replied he, 'it means that we must not drink whiskey.'—Before he could reply to my questions, a fine looking lad, about fourteen years of age, called to him; 'Come, Charley, let us go home now, you know mother is waiting for us.' 'Yes, Jimmy, directly, when I speak with this gentleman awhile, I'll go.' James drew near, and after learning the point at issue, said his brother Charley was too young to tell the reason why he ought to love the Temperance Society, 'but,' said he, 'if you will just come with me to that bench, under that big oak, I will tell you why we do love it.'

Agreed, my fine little fellow, said I.—Having seated ourselves in the cool shade, I took Charley on my knee, and James related as follows:

'Many persons have asked me what such little boys as we are, could possibly know about temperance. I have not always had time, as I now have, to tell the reason, and mother will forgive us for delaying, as this is holiday. When I was a smaller boy than I now am, my father would frequently come home very drunk, and whenever he did come in that state, we were always sure to get a kick or a cuff from him. So we began to fear his coming so much that we would hide ourselves behind mother's chair whenever he came in. One day father came home so drunk that he could scarcely stand without some support. He stood in the doorway for some time gazing at us as we sat around the little fire, eagerly waiting until the milk should be ready for us. As soon as we saw father, we knew that we should have no milk, for he had not eaten any thing that day, and we knew that he would have something to eat if it was in the house. He looked at us for some time, as if to find out something to swear at.

'Sarah, why havn't you got supper ready, you lazy wench, you?' he said. 'Come, stir out of that chair, or I'll teach you better, you good-for-nothing hussey, you."—Mother, trembling, rose from the chair, while the big tears rolled down her pale cheeks. We began to cry, too; this only made matters worse. 'Why don't you move faster, you lazy wench, you're too lazy to move,' said he. My poor mother's tears flowed afresh, at this brutal remark. She looked at my father imploringly for a moment, when she said, 'John, you know we have nothing to eat but some boiled milk, which Mr. B. was good enough to send for the children.' 'Milk! milk! hey? why, that's what I've been thinking about! Come, stir about, let's have the milk,' said he. He staggered to a seat at the table, the chair on which he attempted to sit was an old and broken one, and he fell with it, and lay for some time perfectly helpless. After three or four vain attempts to rise, he called to my mother: 'Here, Sally, why don't you help me? You see I'm sick and weak—come, help.' My mother obeyed, and placed him in a stronger chair. 'Now, Sal,' said he, 'let's have the soup.' My poor mother looked first at father and then at us, as we sat cowering in the chimney-corner, the big tears rolling down her cheeks.—'Why, John" said she, 'there's not enough for the children; they have eat nothing today yet."

'Children, hey! children! what business have they to eat? bring it along, or I'll break every bone in your body,' and seizing a part of the broken chair, he threw it at mother. Fortunately it missed her, but glancing from the wall it struck little Charley on the arm with such force as to bruise it very much. The poor little fellow screamed with pain. Oh! mother, said he, papa hurt me so much. 'Hush your squalling there, you noisy brat,' said he, (hiccoughing,) 'or I'll teach you manners!' Poor Charley was quiet in an instant.

'Is that boiled milk coming? say,' said father.

Poor mother, trembling and weeping, set our little pot before him. As she turned away from the table she looked at us again, saying, 'poor children, they will starve, and I knew not where to get a mouthful of food for them,' and she wept bitterly.

'Starve, hey!' cried my father, 'well, let them starve—they're only trouble, any how!' 'God forgive you, John, for your unkindness,' was all that my mother said.

Hearing my mother's last words, he looked at her for an instant so fiercely, that I thought I should have sunk through the floor. He rose from his seat and made a step towards her. 'God forgive who? me? There, take that'—and he struck her a violent blow on the side of her head. She uttered a faint scream and fell to the floor, bleeding and senseless. Seeing what he had done, and fearing he had killed her, father instantly left the house. Charley and I now screamed as loud as we could. We knelt down by my mother's side and called to her, mother, mother, but she heeded us not. 'Mother,' said Charley, 'get up, I won't cry any more about my arm, indeed I won't, mamma. We won't cry for the milk either, will we Jemmy? Come, mother,' but my poor mother heard us not. Our kind neighbor, Miss Sarah Ann Stuart, passing by at the time, heard our cries and stept in to see the cause. 'My God!' said she, 'James, what's the matter with your mother?' I told her as well as I could the whole affair. 'Run,' said she, 'for Dr. Richardson. Tell him to come directly.—The Doctor came immediately, and soon restored mother to consciousness. You would have wept had you seen little Charley when she opened her eyes. He kissed her again and again, and said he wouldn't cry about his arm, and father shan't hit you any more, &c.

Miss Stuart wept, and the good doctor applied his handkerchief to his eyes more than once. Hearing little Charley speak of his arm, he next applied a bandage to it, glad he did not receive the blow in the head, as it would have killed him. 'Oh! mother, I'm so hungry,' whispered Charley. Miss Stuart overheard it, and took leave for a few moments, returning with a basket full of provisions. 'God bless you for your kindness, Miss Stuart,' sobbed my mother, while tears flowed freely down her cheeks. The Doctor soon entered with another basket, well packed by Mrs. Richardson.

Miss S. and the Doctor took their leave, promising to call in the morning. Charley and I sat on the bed with mother. We talked for a long time till Charley fell asleep; but mother woke him again, and we both said the Lord's Prayer, after which Charley, clasping his little hands, repeated the prayer his mother had taught him, in a distinct voice:

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take"—Amen.

The tears came to my mother's eyes as she gazed on her little boy. 'Mother,' said Charley, 'did you not say we should pray for those who do not love us?' 'Yes, my child, I did.' 'Well, then, mother, we must pray for papa, for he does not love us, or else he would not have hit you and me. Mother, you pray for him.' The request of Charley was granted—she raised her eyes to Heaven, and in a feeble though fervent voice, she poured forth her soul in prayer:

'Father of mercies, bless my poor boys, cherish and protect them; take them, Holy Father, into thy keeping—'tis from thee alone our help must come. And oh! God, bless my once kind husband. Turn him from the error of his ways, and teach him once more to walk in the path of duty—Father of mercies! hear a mother's prayer, restore him to me as he once was, pure, kind, and gentle. O grant, Lord, that we may know him again as a father and husband, for the Savior's sake, Amen.'

'Amen!' responded a hoarse voice.

My mother started, for my father stood before us. Charley hid his head in the bed-clothes, and I, trembling with fear, strove to get as far away from him as possible.

My father spoke first. 'Sarah,' said he, in a gentle tone, 'were you praying for me? No answer. I overheard it all, Sarah, you were praying for a wretch who a few hours ago would have murdered you in cold blood. Can you forgive me, Sarah? Oh! speak, can you forgive such a wretch as I have been? O God, what a dreadful curse have I escaped. Say you forgive me, and man's enemy shall never enter my mouth.'

'Forgive you! O yes! may God forgive you as freely as I do!' He clasped her to his bosom. Tears of joy now flowed, where before all had been bitterness. The morning came, my mother seemed quite well. We breakfasted from Miss Stuart's and the Doctor's provisions, both of whom called to see us. The joyful news was soon communicated to them. 'Come, John,' said the Doctor to my father, 'you must confirm your good resolution by signing the TEMPERANCE PLEDGE, and then I have plenty of work for you.' He signed the pledge and went to work immediately. When he came to dinner, he called Charley and myself to him. He was about to set Charley on his knee, when the little fellow cried out, 'take care of my arm, papa, it is sore' 'Why, what is the matter, Charley?' 'Why, papa, don't you know yesterday when you was a bad man, you hit me with a stick, but you are a good papa now, and won't hit me again, will you, papa?' The tear stood in his eye, as he looked at Charley. No, my son, never; may God forgive my cruelty.'

'Now, sir,' said James, 'I've told you nearly all. My father is a good man; we have plenty to eat and wear, and go to school.' Charley jumped off my knee, taking James by the hand, took off his cap with the other, and gave a hurrah for the Washingtonians.

Sabbath Department.

Extracts From Carlow.

"5. Socrates in his Ecclesiastical History in his 5th Book, chap. 21, shews that the Sabbath, as it relates to the seventh day, was kept several hundred years after Christ; and yet tho' in his time first day observation was with some, a little crept in, yet he reckons it but a tradition, his words are these: 'Touching the communion there are sundry observations and customs, for though in manner almost all the Churches throughout the whole world do celebrate and receive the holy misteries every Sabbath after other, yet the people inhabiting Alexandria and Rome do not use it, the Egyptians adjoining to Alexandria, together with the inhabitants of Thebias of a tradition doth celebrate the communion upon Sunday,' Whence, 1. We may observe the Sabbath observation to this time, which was four hundred years and more after Christ, almost throughout the whole world; and that it was the seventh day Sabbath will appear, if we consider that its distinctly set down from the first day. And, 2, He himself reckons the first day's observation but a tradition. And in his 6th Book, chap. 8, he speaks thus: When the festival meeting throughout every week was come, I mean, saith he, the Saturday and the Sunday, upon which the Christians are wont to meet solemnly in the church. And upon this passage we find by what was before noted, that they esteemed and called the seventh day the Sabbath, and the first day practice a tradition. So from all that hath been said, we may observe how first day observation was brought in with much ado, and how in those decrees of men there was allowed a liberty to labor on the first day; so that it doth appear plainly from these instances, that it was not intended to be kept when first brought in, as now it is observed, but long custom begets a consent.

"And we may observe that this kind of observation did not at first produce a slighting, or at least such a slighting of the Sabbath, as hath since through long custom followed, for almost the whole world kept to the Lord's Sabbath, and celebrated the holy misteries upon it, after these beginnings of first day observations, as I have already noted out of Socrates, for his last noted chapter the 8th, of his 6th Book, brings it down to four hundred and forty years after Christ, and Constantine reigned about the year three hundred and forty; so that at first it was not a slighting of the Lord's holy seventh day Sabbath, for the Sabbath was kept in the Church with the first day for many hundred years, and as we find by whom, and what manner first day observation came in; so we may see why it was brought in, which was from some high hatred against the Jews, on whom they were very apt to lay all the charge of crucifying Christ, and therefore doth Mr. Sallers and Spitlehouse in their Book entitled, An appeal to the consciences of the Chief Magistrates of this Commonwealth touching the Sabbath, printed in the year 1661, in page 7, noted from Doctor Willet's comment upon Exodus, who speaking of the change of the Sabbath, and urgeth Ursinus to prove it, that the Church did it, and that they did it that they might be discerned from the Jewish synagogue, which we conceive to be a very weak argument, to change a moral and perpetual command of God, binding all men in all ages to the performance of it, let the spiritual man judge. Indeed I find this hatred beginning to be very high even in Constantine's time, as may be observed in Eusebus's History of the life of Constantine, the 4th Book and 27th chap. where it is said of him, that he made a law that no Christian should serve a Jew, esteeming it a wicked thing that they who had slain the prophets, and cruelly put to death our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, that they should hold and keep in subjection those that were redeemed with the blood of our Lord and Savior; or if any one lived already in that servile condition, that he should be released, and the Jew fined, as arising from this kind of hatred did this change of the Sabbath come; and as was the tree, so is the fruit, but how far this was from the apostles frame and temper may be observed by comparing these things with Rom. 9, not that I go about to clear the Jews, but the Gentiles also as having a deep hand in the thing, are to be charged as well as them, Mat. 20, 19. Acts 4, 27.

"Again, as to the change of the Sabbath to the first day of the week, was chiefly done to raise a wall of partition betwixt the Gentiles and Jews, as hath been shewed, so we hope the pulling down of that wall will be a preparative to the accomplishing of those glorious prophecies, which hold forth the unity which shall be betwixt Jew and Gentile, as our Savior hath foretold, John 10, 16: as also the apostle Paul, Rom. 11, 25, 26: and verse the 7th, which surely ought to be the earnest desire of all the people of God, and especially of such as are in a waiting posture to see the fulfilling thereof; and most of all by such as profess themselves to be the rulers and pastors of such a people, as you Mr. Ward and the clergy of this nation account yourselves to be.

"The Jews make it an argument that Christ is not the Messiah, because Christians who profess themselves to be his followers are Sabbath breakers, and concluding from thence, that Christ himself was a Sabbath breaker, and consequently if so, what benefit can we expect by the death of an evil doer; and thus you may see what evil consequences follow the not observing of the Lord's holy Sabbath.

Missionary Department.

For the Register.

To the Members of the Seventh Day Baptist Denomination throughout the United States.

DEAR BRETHREN,—In compliance with instructions, given by the General Conference at its late session, I submit the following remarks to your candid consideration

Through the medium of "The Register," the outlines of a plan for promoting more effectually the cause of Domestic Missions, have been already laid before you, together with the form of a Constitution, on which it is proposed to base a new organization at our next anniversary season. You have also discovered, that the same general plan for promoting missionary operations, is proposed to be applied to other benevolent objects, subject however to such modifications as necessity may require.

With reference to the proposed new organization, we wish it to be distinctly understood, that all desire to bind the churches in regard to the plan which has been submitted, is utterly disclaimed. We have merely submitted the plan, in the belief, that if followed out in all its particulars, it will be the best mode of accomplishing the result at which we are aiming. Our recommendation is, "that each church in the denomination consider itself a missionary society." Whoever considers the character of the primitive christian churches, will perceive that our recommendation is in accordance with the pure spirit of the gospel. Not that the early churches received the appellation of missionary societies; yet such they really were to all intents and purposes.

The great object at which we aim, is to bring about a central or general organization, with efficient auxiliaries in every part of the denomination. It matters but little, so far as the immediate operations of the General Society are concerned, whether an individual church resolves itself formally into a missionary society, or not. If it only considers itself such, it is enough.—Or, if it do but take such steps towards aiding the operations of the General Society, as will give proof of its being actuated by a missionary spirit, it is all that can be asked. To enable the General Society to act, it is only necessary that its treasury be well supplied with funds, raised by the churches. To raise these funds, a church can take whatever method it may consider most proper; or, in the very language of the committee's report, "adopting such a plan to effect this, as they may in their judgment think best." Be assured, brethren, the General Board will never ask, in what manner your funds were raised, believing you have a perfect right to do as you please in that respect. Take your own plan. Our plan, if approved by you, will be your own; and we think it a good one. But the Board will ask nothing but your funds, and your hearty co-operation in its efforts to promote the gospel in our land.

It is manifest, that if the General Society be ever so well organized, it can do nothing without good and efficient auxiliaries. It would only resemble the large and well built reservoir, without any tributary streams to fill it. It is, therefore, of the greatest importance, that auxiliary societies be immediately formed throughout the entire denomination. It is not absolutely necessary, that every such society be under the direct supervision of a church. If it be a voluntary association of such persons as are friendly to the missionary cause, holding its meetings, and conducting its operations altogether independent of the church, it will answer the purpose. A society thus organized, might even be composed in part of those who are not members of any church, or even of those who belong to other persuasions, care being taken to frame the constitution, so that none but Seventh Day Baptists have the ultimate control of its proceedings. But the plan, which has met the approbation of the General Conference, and which has already been laid before you, regards it as most desirable, at least in all ordinary cases, that auxiliary societies be formed and directed under the immediate auspices of the several churches. In case, however, that some peculiar local circumstances render this inexpedient, the alternative here presented can be adopted; so that there need, in no case, be a failure. But permit us to suggest, that where the society is altogether within the pale of the church, there may be persons living in the vicinity, who are friendly to the cause, and will gladly contribute to its aid. Let measures be taken to secure the offerings of such friends: "for he that is not against us, is on our part."

Our plan contemplates, in certain cases, the formation of missionary societies, where no churches exist. It sometimes happens, that a few families are located in some isolated spot, so that it is out of their power to co-operate directly with any society, whose location is in the immediate vicinity of a church. Wherever any families are thus situated, we invite them to organize themselves into a missionary society, and give evidence of their zeal in the cause of God, by transmitting every year, so much as their circumstances will warrant, to the General Society, either immediately, or through the medium of some Association. Such a course might ultimately result in great profit to themselves. In the missionary labors performed under the direction of the Board, they would very probably be remembered, and the issue might be the gathering of a prosperous church right in their neighborhood. In the mean time, their stated meetings for missionary purposes, and their persevering efforts in this way, would in some measure compensate for the want of church privileges; serving to bind them together, to warm one another's hearts, and to determine them in cleaving to the truth in spite of all their discouragements. Though their yearly collections might be small, they would still amount to something; and if only a dollar, it would show their good will.

Our plan also proposes to make auxiliary bodies of the different Associations of the denomination, so that they may be the media of conveying the contributions of the churches, or primary societies, to the General Board. But it will still be at the option of the primary societies, whether to transmit their funds in this way, or not.—No doubt, associated churches will generally choose to avail themselves of this mode of communicating with the General Board. Still there may be circumstances to render it advisable for some churches to represent themselves immediately. Whichever course be pursued, whether to represent themselves immediately, or mediately through the Associations, it cannot effect the deliberations of the General Society. Even where such variety of representation results from want of harmony between Associations and churches, the General Society can know nothing of it, inasmuch as its deliberations will relate purely to missionary business, and cannot constitutionally have the least bearing upon such matters, as grow out of the primary relation of churches to Associations.

With regard to the Constitution, upon which it is proposed to base the organization of a new society, I would remark, that it may possibly be defective in the minds of some. We do not pretend that it is perfect. Indeed it would be folly to pretend perfection in regard to any thing of human contrivance. But we sincerely hope, that its defects will not be viewed with a spirit of fault-finding. All that is proposed by the present draft, is to lay a platform, upon which the denomination can begin to act without farther delay. If our brethren, who may attend the anniversary in September next, will suggest any alterations or amendments, that will render it more unexceptionable, we will gladly attend to them. Rest assured, it is our determination to make it as perfect as possible.

At the time the Constitution was under consideration by the committee, it was remarked, that some of our brethren would probably object to the article which makes money the basis of representation. Had it been in our power to frame an article which would meet the scruples of such brethren, and at the same time secure the interests of the society, we would gladly have done it. But after taking all matters into consideration, we concluded that the article, in the shape it now stands, was about as good as we could make it. In justification of it, let it be observed, that the sum of ten dollars is so small, as to be within the ability of any society, that will be formed in the denomination: or, if not within the ability of a primary society, yet, at all events, within the ability of an Association. Again, no member, or delegate, will be entitled to more than his own individual vote, whatever may be the amount contributed by him, or by the society which he represents. The article does not say 'one representation for every ten dollars,' but, 'one representative.' Even the life member, who has furnished his fifty dollars, will still be entitled to nothing more than his own single vote. Again, the rich are not likely to obtain any undue advantage over the poor, inasmuch as the poor members of a church are generally by far the most liberal contributers to the cause. The rich commonly love their money, and hold on to it with such a grasp, that they 'can hardly enter the kingdom of heaven.' Or, where we find the rare instance of a rich christian, consecrating his property to the utmost of his ability, we always find such purity of principle, such kindness of heart, such humbleness of mind, that he is any thing but an aspiring Diotrephes loving to have the pre-eminence. The poor have nothing to fear from such a brother. Again let it be considered, whether the money-basis will not serve as a stimulus to the efforts of the churches; and whether, on the other hand, if a free representation were granted to all, it would not open the door for those to come in, and control the operations of the Board, who are at the same time too niggardly to give a farthing to the cause.—Such a fear, it is true, need not be indulged, if all who call themselves christians, were governed by a disposition to give of their substance to the utmost of their ability, and felt, in the highest sense, that they were but the stewards, and not the proprietors of God's bounty. But look at the mixed character of our churches. In view of all the difficulties therefore, we have drafted such an article, as we considered least objectionable. We flatter ourselves, that our brethren, on reviewing the whole subject, will coincide with us in opinion.

I think it unnecessary to enter upon any farther expose of our plan. All that remains, is to urge your hearty co-operation. It may not, to be sure, meet your views entirely. But do not let this hinder your engaging in the effort, might and main. If you wait until some plan be devised, to which no one could find objections, you will wait until your probation is closed, and you are summoned to give account of your stewardships. In the mean time souls are perishing for lack of knowledge. While they perish, how much of the guilt, think you, will fall upon you? A small denomination we are, it is true. Yet in proportion to our numbers and influence, are we responsible for the welfare of the human race. Indeed, if God has committed to us more truth, than he has to any other order, our responsibility is greater than an equal number of others would be. For in proportion to the amount of truth of which one is in possession, so is his moral power.—And do we not claim to have a more correct understanding of the volume of truth, at least so far as regards the Sabbath, than we are willing to allow to others? And do we not maintain, that the Sabbath exerts a most important influence over society?—that without it, nothing can be done towards bringing men under the power of the gospel? How responsible, then, is the post we occupy! Do not, brethren, be indifferent to your responsibilities. But let this new organization for missionary effort, together with a consideration of the momentous era in which we live, be the signal to awake, and gird yourselves for action.

No agent has yet been appointed to visit the entire connexion, for the purpose of carrying into effect the foregoing plan.—For the present, we are under the necessity of relying upon that missionary spirit, which generally prevails among us. Shall we be disappointed? Must we find, when the time comes for the full organization of the society, that but here and there a church has fully responded to the call? Then, when we hope to find that the fire is kindled, and burning throughout the length and breadth of the denomination, must we learn that nothing has yet been done? No, brethren, we will not suffer ourselves to indulge such fears. We hope better things of you. We indulge the pleasing expectation, that in every church will be found a hearty response to this undertaking. Whoever has the love of Christ burning in his heart, and firing him with aught of missionary zeal, will please consider this circular as addressed to him. However obscure may be his situation, however inferior to his brethren in point of talent, wealth, or influence, let him not rest, until the whole church to which he belongs, is alive in the work.

Our brethren will please to consider, that it is important to have as large a fund as possible, accumulated by the next conference, [illegible] that the society may [illegible] to act with vigor. The churches, therefore, to whom this circular will come, should begin to organize their primary societies without delay. Do not put it off to the last moment, and then come with only that pittance, which would be discreditable to your circumstances, but which might nevertheless be unavoidable, in consequence of some sudden and unexpected turn given to your affairs. Begin now. Lay out your plans, and let every thing be pursued systematically. Even individual members should act with system in this matter, as well as in all other matters where an outlay of money is concerned. Let system be pursued, and a great deal will be accomplished. Let system be disregarded, and but little will be done, and that, most probably, but ill-done. Let every person resolve to lay by so much per week; or, which is more according to the gospel, so much per cent. of all his avails, and label it, "Holy to the Lord." Let him consider it sacrilege to appropriate any part of this to himself, remembering it is the Lord's. "Will a man rob God?"

Dear brethren, we beseech you by the love of Christ, that you do not sleep over this matter. Its importance is unspeakably great, not only in respect to the promulgation of truth, and the conversion of souls, but in respect to the internal prosperity of our existing denomination. I cannot but regard the formation of this new society, as a happy era in our history, and calculated, from the manner in which it was brought about, to destroy those petty jealousies which were troubling us. Indeed, it is already tending to this. Our next anniversary may be the grave of all our difficulties; yet every thing depends on the course you take. Only let your immediate, well directed, vigorous efforts contribute to make that an interesting season, and in the mean time lay up your prayers in heaven, that the Divine blessing may rest upon it, and the issue will doubtless be for the glory of God, and the peace of Zion.

On behalf of the General Conference.

THOMAS B. BROWN.

N. B. Pastors of churches, or leaders of their public meetings, are requested to read the foregoing circular from the pulpit, together with the plan and Constitution, which have already been published.

Evening.

BY A LITTLE GIRL FOURTEEN YEARS OF AGE

'Tis evening on the mountain's brow,
And the gorgeous clouds are fading now;
Upon that gold-tipp'd mount afar,
That seems to touch yon eastern star.

The little streamlet passing by,
Unruffled breathes a tender sigh;
And passing o'er the tiny stone,
Repeats it in a gentler tone.

The forest trees are bending low
To the southern breeze, as it passeth now;
And gently waves the flowret wild,
Which is often termed the forest's child.

The tuneful bird is in its nest,
The lambkins have retired to rest;
Smiling beauteous Day has gone,
While sombre Night comes slowly on.

The laborer's toil is at its close,
With joy, he seeks the night's repose,
With happy heart, and cheerful voice,
His household flock around rejoice.

Night is a time for solemn thought,
When care and labor are forgot,
When all the weary are at rest,
And sorrow's gone from every breast.

All nature's silent, earth and air
Seem off'ring up a thankful prayer,
To God who holds the sea, and land,
The universe, in his right hand.

CORNELIA.

JOHN HAWKINS.

Doubtless all of my young readers have heard of John Hawkins, of Baltimore, the great advocate of, and lecturer on Temperance. He was once an intemperate man, and neglected his family and all his duties, and associated with men of degraded character and habits.

And how do you think his reformation was effected? Through the instrumentality of his daughter Hannah, a little girl of twelve years of age. She loved her father, and wept for his degraded condition. The particular circumstances which brought about his reformation, are related in a thrilling manner by Mr. Hawkins himself, and are in substance as follows:

After having been drunk every day for six weeks—and he prayed God that he might remember the day until his death—he was lying one morning in bed, his whiskey bottle by his side, and in such a state of mind that he feared he should commit some horrible crime—when he began to ask himself if it were possible for him to be saved! His conduct towards his family had been such, that his daughters had, one by one, been taken from under his control, all but the youngest, and they had come back for her, but she refused to leave him. 'Though all the world forsake father,' said she, 'I never will. I have stood by him thus far, and will yet.'

Well, he heard her, on the morning referred to, coming up stairs. He did not wish, in his state of mind, to see one who had thus stood by him—he covered his head with the bed clothes, but he felt her at his side. She wished to say something to check him, but feared to do so. His mental suffering at this time was indescribable, he trembled from head to foot.

At length, in a faint voice, she said, 'Please father, don't send me for any more whiskey to-day.' He had some feeling left, and her kind wishes came home to his heart, but he ordered her in an abrupt manner to leave the room. She left him, but her feelings were deeply injured. 'Mother,' said she, 'please to go up stairs to father—I did not mean to wound his feelings.' 'What,' said he to himself, 'and am I so brutal as to wound the feelings of a child who so loves me?' I heard her coming again, and again covered myself. She knelt by the bedside. What she was then doing was unknown to me, but it is now known that she was offering up a silent prayer for degraded, disgraced, and wretched, but still beloved father.

She gently raised the clothes, and he gave her one piercing look: his arms were extended,—'Hannah, come,' was all that he could say, but with a cry of joy, she was the next moment clasped to the bosom of her father. From that moment he determined that another drop of alcohol should never pass his lips, and in the strength of God, he had thus far kept his pledge!

That night he attended the place of meeting of the Washingtonians: the pledge was read to him, he walked up to the table, signed his name, and delivered Mr. Rum over to the proper authorities!

This was all done without the knowledge of wife or daughter. That night, when he returned home, as he closed the door, he knew from the glimmering light at the head of the stairway, that his daughter was listening to know whether the door opened drunk or sober. The result was satisfactory: and in the strength of God, every door opened and shut by him hereafter should open and shut sober.

The effect produced when he informed his wife and daughter that he had taken the pledge, he described at length. Often since, when far from home, has he blessed God for the joy which that hour had brought to wife, family, and friends.—Youth's Medallion.

HEATHEN CHILDREN CONVERTED.

Their Victory in Death.—A little boy, ten or twelve years old, belonging to the missionary school in Vizagapatam (India) died last year. During his painful and lingering illness, says the missionary, I had many opportunities of conversing with him about his soul. I asked him one day,—'Would you like to go to heaven when you die?' 'Yes, sir.' 'Why?' 'Jesus Christ there, good people there, God there.' 'Do you love Jesus Christ?' 'Yes, sir.' 'How do you think you will get to heaven, if you are sinful?' 'Jesus Christ take away all my sin.' This poor lad was taught in the orphan school, and left pleasing evidence that he is safe for eternity.

A little black girl in the West Indies, on her dying bed, exclaimed with great joy to the missionary, who asked her, 'Are you afraid to die?' 'O no! no!' 'Not afraid to die? Will our Savior take you to heaven?' She answered, 'Yes, he will, for he has said, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.' I said to her, 'If you had your choice between a world of money and our Savior, which would you rather have?' She said, 'Our Savior.' She lingered some time, but the love of Jesus was her constant theme. Her last request to those around her was, that they would sing the hymn, 'Jesus little children blesses.' She joined in singing it, but at the close of the prayer which followed, her spirit took its flight.

In 1821, the gospel was proclaimed for the first time in the Hervey Islands (Pacific Ocean.) Last year, a lad about ten years old died on one of these islands in a state of triumph. To his weeping friends around him, he said, 'Weep not for me, but for yourselves. I am going to heaven, to be with my Savior. Your weeping disturbs my mind; I want to have it fixed on Jesus. Do not weep for me, but weep after God, that you may follow where I am going.' Addressing his father, who lay ill in the same house, he said, 'Father, farewell! I am dying. My Father has come to fetch me.' With these words he fell asleep in the arms of his heavenly Father.

They that seek me early shall find me.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, December 7, 1842.

☞Some of that WOOD, now, if you please?

Br. Brown's Address.

On our first page may be found the address of Br. Brown to the churches on the subject of our Missionary operations. Br. Brown wishes us to say that absence from home, and ill-health, since his return, have been the cause of delay in the appearance of this address. We ask for it a careful perusal, and then a hearty co-operation in the proposed plan. The Report of the Conference, and proposed Constitution, have been spread before our brethren in the Minutes of Conference, and the Register.

Such an organization is necessary to carry forward Missionary operations. Our present Missionary Society has become in-[illegible], and though it might have been good in its beginning, and wise in its provisions, yet it has such a character in the minds of many as to call out their opposition, & in others the withdrawal of their aid, and it is not in the power of its friends to revive it and make it again efficient. At its last session, the Executive were directed to wind up its affairs as fast as practicable. In accordance with this instruction, the Board have made their appeal through our last number. We trust agents and all others concerned will be faithful in arranging the matter as soon as practicable.

The plan now proposed we believe to be a good one, and we hope no time may be lost by churches and individuals in organizing and making arrangements so that at our next anniversary every thing may be ready for successful operation. There is now ample room enough for organization, and now is the time for it. This plan gives the manner and amount of contributions in the hands of the individuals themselves, thus opening a way in which every man, woman, and child can contribute as they are able. The address invites every person to lay by a certain sum per week, or so much per cent, which is more gospel-wise, of all their avails, and label it "Holy to the Lord." This we believe to be the true principles of action, and in strict accordance with God's appointment. Under the Jewish economy one-tenth was consecrated to God. This is, perhaps, about the true standard of giving to God's cause. We feel full confidence in saying that every person who conscientiously consecrates that amount of his avails for the promotion of Christ's kingdom, will never be one cent the poorer for it. And what sum would be raised if every S. D. Baptist should adopt this rule? Several Missionaries would be constantly employed thereby, and every year would add many persons and perhaps churches to the number of those who obey God's holy word.— We hope to see at our next anniversary brethren presenting their ten, twenty, and perhaps fifty, or a hundred dollars saved in this way for God's service. Who has a mind to try?

Our sisters may become important auxiliaries in this benevolent effort. As a general thing they are not expected to furnish much money, but they can now render essential service by their own work. We hope to be pardoned if it is unwise for suggesting to our sisters to form themselves into a society, either separately, or as a branch of the society in the church of which they may be members, so as to concentrate and combine their efforts Some of them may contribute money, others articles of domestic manufacture, and several by uniting may furnish articles such as a Missionary needs. These articles may be collected and sold, or sent on to the General Society, and thus be of essential service. Let the churches take whatever measures they may for raising funds, we ask this, that those measures may be immediately entered into. Churches in Associations will doubtless represent themselves through that medium. Those in the Central Association can become auxiliary to the Board formed at its last session. We hope to hear a good report from them, and indeed all our brethren.

The interests of immortal souls perishing in their sins—the interests of the neglected and down-trodden law of God—the purity and triumph of the gospel of Jesus Christ—the errors of Papacy, and Protestant Papacy, or the relicts of Papacy in Protestant Churches, all call upon us to gird ourselves David-like, and unite all our energies as best we may in this effort.— The true Christian is a person of benevolence. Benevolence is in fact one-half of his religion. This truth is clearly taught in the word of God. God requires love to himself and love to men. The gospel teaches the same, and the Apostle James, in defining that religion which he says is pure and undefiled before God and the Father, says it is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world. Here purity and benevolence are represented as the constituent elements of religion. Brethren, let us honor that religion as best we may by giving freely to the Lord's service of that which he has entrusted to our stewardship.

Christian Courtesy.

It is not to be expected that all men will entertain the same views of all measures, and if one man can claim for himself honest intentions, all may claim the same.— Common courtesy will award this to every man till there is direct unimpeachable evidence to the contrary. Evidence that may sometimes assume this character, may, upon examination, or upon the introduction of counter evidence, appear entirely without force. An absent man may be accused of hard things. Common courtesy would not receive and adopt these accusations to the prejudice of his character, much less would it give them publicity. From those professing Christianity more than common courtesy is expected. Indeed the gospel of Jesus requires them to be as careful of another's reputation and interests as their own. True Christian courtesy, which every Christian is bound to exercise, will not receive and entertain an accusation against any one, so long as there is room for the exercise of a doubt, and when this can not be done, it seeks to palliate and excuse.

Revivals.

Revivals of religion are multiplying in different places. These are, in most cases, the result of special efforts. That such results may be expected, is gospel-wise. God is at all times ready to send salvation where there is a readiness to receive it; and he has pledged himself to bless his own ordained means when they are used. At this season of the year, men have more leisure to attend to those means. A favorable opportunity is thus afforded for those who labor in the gospel, and to all the members of Christ's house, to use the means of grace with an assurance of success. If the Christian will look upon the field, he will find that it is white already to the harvest. Multitudes may be found in the circle of almost every church who have not become the subjects of the regenerating grace of the gospel. Some of these are imbibing heretical views, such as are most in accordance with the feelings of the carnal heart, thus shielding themselves under a refuge of lies. Others are becoming sceptical and hardening their hearts to resist the truth and the Spirit's influence; and all by continuance in sin are rendering their salvation less certain. If Christ has manifested his love for their souls by giving his life for them, then surely Christians, who are his representatives, ought to feel sufficient interest in their salvation to use the means that God has ordained to bring them to himself.

Who among all our readers is willing to labor during the present winter as they are able for the enlarging and beautifying of the church, and the conversion of souls?— It is manifestly the duty of all Christians to do so; and what might be expected from such efforts? The church would be revived, and many would be added to it of such as should be saved in heaven. Those who have unconverted friends would doubtless see them turning to God. We exhort every professed Christian to get his heart right with God and then labor for others.

That "Gentleman" Webb.

This man has been sentenced to two years imprisonment, on account of his duel with Marshall. Petitions, signed by several thousand have been presented to the Governor for his unconditional pardon, and it is said that Gov. Seward has pardoned him.— Every man has doubtless admired the course of the Executive relative to the pardoning power. We must think Webb would not have been pardoned by him if he had continued the policy that has governed him heretofore. We believe that the supremacy of the laws and the permanent establishment of good order requires that the rigor of the law should be enforced against him, as it it would have been had he been a more private citizen, with less money and mental qualities. If Webb goes clear, then every man of money and influence may bid defiance to law and good order. It is said he has suffered enough by being wounded.— If this is so, then let the law be so amended as to let the wounded man go free; till then the law should be considered impartial.— Money and talents are not now evidence of innocence but if this notorious offender escapes, they will virtually be reckoned so.— Webb's connection with the duel in which Cilley fell, has not yet been forgotten. Till he repents he will be considered by every virtuous man a murderer at heart, and a contemner of the laws of God and man.

Since the above was in type, we have received, through the Evangelist, the Governor's letter containing Webb's pardon, which we lay before our readers. The Governor's reasons for the pardon, in our estimation, do not amount to even an excuse for a reason. Divine and civil laws are now set at defiance, and men are at liberty to murder each other in cool blood with impunity. The Governor's policy towards Rathbun and Colt and his policy towards Webb have no relation to each other.

"Prize Fighters."

At our last advices the trial of the "prize fighters was in progress. Sullivan, McCleester, and Kensett had been tried and convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to two years imprisonment. The testimony on the trial developed the most confirmed depravity and savage cruelty of which we have any accounts among civilized beings. We should not have thought that there was in this country a den of iniquity that would have sent out its three thousand persons so lost to virtue and every human sensibility as was witnessed at the prize fight! The great emporium—the "City of Fountains," has its reputation stained with some of the foulest blots that ever disgraced any enlightened community.

☞Br. Paul Stillman, wishes us to correct the notice of his proposed agency for the "Hierophant," &c. He says that he will act as agent for such as might wish to take it, and a commission would be devoted of all such sums to the Tract cause, and that brethren making remittances to the Society [Tract] might enclose money for any other publication, and he would with pleasure pay it out as directed, and take their receipts. He would do this as an inducement to such persons to make additional remittances to the Society.

Ure's Dictionary.

We have received all the Nos. as they have come from the Press. The work will be re-issued in five bi-monthly Nos. at $1, per No., or $5 in advance. Each No. will contain upwards of 300 pages, and an average of 250 plates. The Nos. will be sent to subscribers by mail free of expense, as soon as issued. The first No. will appear on the first of this month, and be issued every two months.

Ordination.

Brother Luke Coon, Jr., and Sheffield B. Main, were ordained to the office of Deacons in the second Seventh-day Baptist Church in Genesee, October the 21st, 1842.

Sabbath Tract, No. 3.

The publisher has sent us a copy of the 3d No of the Sabbath Tracts. It is an argument on the Authority for the change of the day, containing 28 pages. Communications relative to these Tracts may be addressed (post paid,) to Paul Stillman, New York.

Secession from the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Rev's. Jotham Horton, Orange Scott, and LaRoy Sunderland, over date of Nov. 8, formally secede from the Methodist Episcopal Church, assigning their reasons for the act. These are, 1st. The M. E. Church is not only a slaveholding, but a slavery defending Church. To sustain this allegation they have made the following declaration.

This church has defended, in a labored argument, through some of her best ministers, the present rightful relation of master and slave—in that she has never called them to account for putting forth such a document.

She has exhorted, through her regularly constituted agents and highest officers, the trustees of Methodist churches, to close their pulpits against Methodist anti-slavery lecturers.

She has refused, in numerous instances, through her bishops, to entertain, in the annual conferences, motions expressive of the sinfulness of slaveholding—motions for the appointment of committees on slavery—motions for the adoption of reports on slavery; and that, because those motions and reports contained the sentiment, that slaveholding is sin—which, it was alleged, is contrary to Methodism, which recognizes and approves of the relation of master and slave under the same circumstances.

She has refused, through her bishops, to hear the prayers of scores and hundreds of her members against slavery, in some of the annual conferences.

She has refused to publish, in her official papers, several addresses of the British Wesleyan Conference, because they alluded to slavery.

She has arraigned and condemned, without the forms of trial, members of her highest ecclesiastical assembly, for simply attending and speaking in an anti-slavery meeting.

She has condemned modern abolition, refusing, at the same time, to say, in the language of the discipline, that she is "as much as ever convinced of the great evil of slavery."

She has exhorted her ministers and members throughout the country "wholly to refrain" from this agitating subject.

She has said through some of her annual conferences, that slavery is not a moral evil—while she has repeatedly refused, through her bishops, to allow other annual conferences, to express the opposite sentiment.

She has allowed, without censure, one of her bishops to issue a labored address, in which an attempt is made to prove that slaveholding is not only justified, but enjoined under some circumstances, by the Golden Rule! and she has published this address in her official papers.

She has, through her ministers and members, disfranchized and censured, or expelled, class-leaders, stewards, exhorters, and local preachers, for the simple crime of their abolition movements.

She has, through some of her annual conferences, prohibited her ministers and preachers from patronizing anti-slavery papers.

She has refused to receive into some of her annual conferences, pious and talented young men on trial, for the simple reason, that they were active abolitionists.

She has, through the same medium, arraigned, censured, suspended, and in some instances expelled her ministers, for contumacy and insubordination with respect to abolition; and some of these she has followed from year to year, by her bishops and members of other conferences for the evident purpose of destroying their ministerial character and influence;—subjecting them to repeated, vexatious, and expensive trials.

She has two or three times altered her discipline to effect, as is believed, their expulsion.

She has removed Presiding Elders from [illegible] abolition movements; suffering, as it would seem, this crime to effect the appointment of other ministers and preachers.

She has refused, in her General Conference capacity, to re-affirm her former language of opposition to slavery, though requested to do this by some thousands of her ministers and members. She has refused, in the same capacity, to take exceptions to the sentiment of two or three annual conferences, who have said that slavery is not a moral evil.

And finally, she has adopted a resolution on colored testimony, which disfranchises eighty thousand of her members—thus giving the weight of her influence to that slaveholding legislation which, in a civil point of view, disfranchises millions of our fellow countrymen.

2nd. The government of the M. E. Church contains principles not laid down in the scriptures, nor recognized in the usages of the primitive church. Under this head, is enumerated, The power of the Bishops which makes the destiny of all her Ministers fall in their hands. Bishops have the power of transferring Ministers to any part of the U. S., Texas, or to Africa, against their will. Also the election of Bishops for life, and the power of the preacher to exclude any member he may wish to get rid of. The discipline requires the form of trial, but the preacher has the sole power to appoint the committee without the right to challenge by the accused. He has also the sole right to appoint all the leaders and nominate all the stewards. We have known an instance in which it was impossible to bring a preacher to an account for the grossest misconduct. We cannot blame the seceding ministers much, if they have given a faithful and true statement of Episcopacy.

Genesee, Nov. 22, 1842.

Dear Brother—The Lord has been pleased to visit the Second Seventh-day Baptist Church in Genesee once more with the outpouring of his Holy Spirit, within a few weeks past. This church has been wading through deep trials, but the dark cloud has at length seemed to gradually move over. The work seemed to begin without any particular excitement of protracted effort of preaching, excepting by brother Prentice C. Main, who labors with them as their preacher. Other preachers have been with them occasionally. Many had backslidden and gone astray, but have come home to their Father's house, and have been made happy in the Lord; and when Zion begins to travail, then children are born into the kingdom. The church having come up to the help of the Lord universally, the result was the Lord converted some twelve or fifteen of the youth in this vicinity. I had the happiness to Baptize nine willing converts a few weeks past; eight united with the church, and we hope more will follow the same example soon. The Sabbath is receiving some attention by the first-day observers. May the Lord continue to pour out of his Holy Spirit upon all our churches and the whole world. Yours, &c.

HENRY P. GREENE.

News of the Day.

Corres. of the Boston Atlas.

U. S. Ship Boston,
Whampoa, Canton River, May 9, 1842.

The visit of the Ty-Tuck, or Chinese Admiral, (water-general) to the American squadron, was an event of some novelty and interest. There are two Admirals in the Empire, holding a high official rank, even higher than the Governor of Provinces. The occurrence of an official visit is an important indication of the temper of the Celestials at the present time, and shows that the wall between them and the outer barbarians has been effectually breached. There is no doubt this visit was dictated by a hope of learning something rather than conciliating; it is certain there was more of observation than ceremony. You know that the Chinese have recently constructed and armed some vessels after the European method, and they wish to take advantage of any hints they can obtain about the disciplining and manœuvering of them. Supposing such to be the case, we were prepared to receive them in such a manner as to forward their views.

The Ty-Tuck was attended by a mandarin, who had given a large sum for the defenses of the river, ($200,000) by a number of linguists, as also by a number of inquisitive persons, whom we supposed to be Naval Architects. He appeared somewhat disconcerted when he first came upon the deck, but upon the whole his manner was commanding and agreeable. He is a dark, tall, brave looking fellow. He was saluted, on coming alongside and on leaving the ship, with thirteen guns, the yards being manned. His rank in the Empire entitles him to this number of guns, as well as to thirteen beats of the gong when he passes along the street. Not a China boat was to be seen in the river as he came down. As soon as the ceremony of reception was over, we beat to quarters, and went through the general exercises in all its details.— The Admiral was inquisitive as to the rigging and exercising the battery. While examining one of the gun-carriages, he turned to one of his architects and said, 'take notice, for you must learn to do all this.' 'I can't,' replied the man. 'But you must,' said the Ty-Tuck, 'and I will find a way to teach you.' I quote this conversation only to show how far the Chinese acknowledge the superiority of our methods, and their disposition to avail themselves of them, and the means of acquiring information with regard to them. The wheel was a great novelty and its operation seemed to puzzle him more than any thing else; but upon explanation, he comprehended it perfectly. The Admiral, in company with the Commodore, afterwards went on board the Boston where he made even a more critical examination than on board the frigate.

We have heard that he expressed the utmost satisfaction with his visit, and that it is his intention to reciprocate the civilities shown. This conciliating disposition of the Chinese is what has never been known before, and I hope that it will lead to good results.

The Chinese description of the bursting of a shell is most humorously correct. 'He fall down—then he siz-iz-iz—then he snore—then he go to sleep—presently he spring up and kill piece at least ten men.' Kill piece means tears in pieces.'

I shall keep you advised of the sayings and doings in the Celestial Empire, and I have every reason to believe I am here at a fortunate time. I shall go up to Canton this week.

Rhode Island Constitution.—The votes as received for the New Constitution of Rhode Island are 5112 in its favor to 21 against. To admit blacks to vote 3157 to 1001. The Providence Journal says:

"The indications are that the whole vote will not be far from 6000, which was about what we calculated upon. The absence of all opposition rendered it impossible to get out any thing like the full strength of the friends of the Constitution. In some parts of the State, particularly in the Southern, many of our staunchest friends refused to vote. They were willing the Constitution should be adopted, but preferred the old charter, and they would not help to pull it down."

Sailing of Missionaries.—Rev. Philander O. Powers and wife, and Rev. Azariah Smith the former destined to Broosa, and the latter to the Nestorian mission, sailed from this port on Saturday last, in the barque Fame, Capt. Scott, for Smyrna. Rev. John F. Lanneau and wife, destined to Jerusalem, sailed on Monday, in the barque Emily Wilder, Capt. Brown, for Gibraltar. Religious services were held on board both vessels on the occasion of their departure.—Boston Recorder.

Caution to Females.—On Monday last, a young woman of this village, who has suffered severely for some time past from a pain in her right side—so much so as wholly to disable her from business at times,—extracted therefrom a common cambric needle an inch and three-eighths in length! Under the advice of her friends, she had tried various applications to remove the pain, the last of which was a plaster of Burgundy pitch. Upon the removal of this plaster, the point of the needle was discovered protruding through the skin, and the troublesome instrument was soon extracted. It was much discolored, and must have been swallowed by the young woman several months ago.—Herkimer Amer.

Popular Admiration of great Thieves.—Whether it be that the multitude, feeling the pangs of poverty, sympathize with the daring and ingenious depredators who take away the rich man's superfluity, or whether it be the interest that mankind in general feel for the records of perilous adventures, it is certain that the populace of all countries look with admiration upon great and successful thieves. Perhaps both these causes combine to invest their career with charms in the popular eye. Almost every country has its traditional thief, whose exploits are recorded with all the graces of poetry. Among these traditional thieves the most noted in England, or, perhaps, in any country, is Robin Hood—a name which popular affection has encircled with a peculiar halo, 'He robbed the rich to give to the poor.' Romance and poetry have been emulous to make him all their own; and the forest of Sherwood, in which he roamed with his merry men, armed with their long bows and clad in Lincoln green, has become the resort of pilgrims, and a classic spot sacred to his memory. His charity to the poor, and his gallantry and respect for women, had made him the preeminent thief of all the world.

Among the English thieves of a later date, who has not heard of Claude Duval, Dick Turpin, Jonathan Wild, and Jack Sheppard, those knights of the road and of the town, whose peculiar chivalry formed at once the dread and the delight of England during the eighteenth century? Turpin's fame is unknown to no portion of the male population of England after they have attained the age of ten. His wondrous ride from London to York has endeared him to the imagination of millions. Not less familiar to the people of England is the career of Jack Sheppard, as brutal a ruffian as ever disgraced his country, but who has claims upon the popular admiration which are very generally acknowledged. He did not, like Robin Hood, plunder the rich to relieve the poor, nor rob with an uncouth sort of courtesy, like Turpin; but he escaped from Newgate with the fetters on his limbs. This achievement, more than once repeated, has encircled his felon brow with a wreath of immortality, and made him quite a pattern thief among the populace.

Jonathan Wild—whose name has been immortalized by Fielding—was no favorite with the people. He had none of the virtues, which, combined with crimes, make up the character of the great thief. He was a pitiful fellow, who informed against his comrades, and was afraid of death.— This meanness was not to be forgiven by the crowd, and they pelted him with dirt and stones on his way to Tyburn, and expressed their contempt by every possible means. How different was their conduct to Turpin and Jack Sheppard, who died in their neatest attire, with nosegays in their button holes, and with a courage that a crowd expects! The death of Claude Duval would appear to have been no less triumphant. Claude was a gentlemanly thief. In fact he was the pink of politeness, and his gallantry to the fair sex was proverbial.

The Elephant and the Turnpike Gate.—Yesterday's night, as Mr. Van Amburgh's elephant was going to Wellington, ready for the next day's performance, on coming to the turnpike gate, which was shut, the gate man refused to open the gate unless the conductor paid extra toll, which he refused to do, went through the side wicket, saying to the elephant, "Jack, I must go without you." But it was not to be so; for Jack would be as good as his master; so without any ceremony, Jack applied his proboscis to the gate and just eased itself of the hindrance by prostrating the gate in the road, to the no small amazement of the gate keeper. We understand there was some injury done to the gate, the expense of which the keeper cheerfully paid.—Salopian N. Y. Journal.

Fire in the Moon.—A writer in the Philadelphia Inquirer denies the fact mentioned in the New Bedford Mercury, that the volcanoes of the Moon could be seen blazing. The writer surveyed the appearances indicated, with a powerful telescope, at the High School Observatory. The appearance he ascribes to another cause. The mountains in the Moon, he says, after examining them at the time specified, were just enjoying their sunrise—it was not yet sunrise at the base of their peaks, and the illuminated sides of the mountains, sloping as stated in the account, presented the appearance of bright gleams of light on a dark field, viz: the unenlightened base of the mountains.—New Haven Palladium.

Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews.—The aggregate amount of contributions received the past year, towards the general and special purposes of this Society, is £[illegible] 8s. [illegible], being an increase of £[illegible] above the receipts of the preceding year. This is the largest sum ever received by the Society in one year.

Lord Morpeth and the Americans.—The Sheffield (Eng.) Iris says:—

It is said that Lord Morpeth is preparing his observations on the Americans for the press. "The opinions of so distinguished a statesman, so honest a politician, and so good a man, with regard to the Americans and their institutions, would be particularly useful at this period. All classes of politicians would look with anxiety, and be prepared to receive with reverence, his lordship's opinion with regard to the working of the ballot and 'the man suffrage' in America—points that will inevitably be brought forward and discussed in the next session of Parliament.

The Duck Shooting on the shore is now very fine. Four gentlemen of this city, who had been spending a week at Sam Perrine's, at Barnegat, came back on Saturday night, in high glee and with a wagon full of game—250 brant, black ducks, broad bills, &c., shot in five days; or in four rather, for they lay the whole of Tuesday among the sea weed without getting a shot, but all the time in delightful expectation of one. The largest duck they got was when one of them, in the sudden confusion produced by a first rate chance at a fine flock, was tumbled out of the boat and soused into the sea. It was great sport.—Trenton State Gazette.

A singular circumstance took place in Fishlake township, Me., a short time since. The facts are given by the Portland American as follows: A married female beyond the meridian of life, and whose name is Ann Wrath, had been ill for some time, and on Thursday, the 4th ult., her friends and family assembled around her, and took their last mournful farewell. She appeared to expire about 5 o'clock that afternoon. The ceremonies of laying out the dead were duly performed, the bandages were placed beneath her chin to her head, and every preparation was made for the solemn rites of the burial ground. The sexton tolled the bell; but at half past eight o'clock, some minutes before his work was accomplished, she reared her hand in astonishment, and was amazed to find that she was able to partake of the refreshments at her funeral!

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW-YORK:

To all to whom these present shall come:

Whereas, at a Court of General Sessions of the Peace, held in and for the City and County of New-York, in the month of November, 1842, JAMES WATSON WEBB was convicted of leaving this State for the purpose of giving or receiving a challenge to fight a duel with deadly weapons, and giving or receiving such challenge, and was thereupon sentenced to be imprisoned in the State Prison at hard labor for the term of two years; and whereas an unconditional pardon is solicited in behalf of the said James Watson Webb, by the Court, by the Grand Jurors, by the Municipal Councils, by the Officers of Justice in the said City, and by many good and worthy citizens of this State, because he was not the challenger in the said duel; because the challenger, though holding a high representative trust, has not been brought to justice and is not amenable to the laws of this State: because the combat was not mortal, and the challenged party sincerely manifested a determination to avoid depriving his adversary of life, and he was unharmed; because the said James Watson Webb voluntarily submitted himself to justice and confessed his offense, waiving all advantage of legal defense; because although the practice of dueling, is in wanton and flagrant violation of Divine laws, and is inconsistent with the morality and humanity which ought to distinguish a civilized people, and has, therefore, been forbidden by the laws of this State with forfeitures, pains and penalties, through a period of nearly forty years, and the Attorney-General, Judges and Grand Juror, have been expressly required to bring all offending to condign punishment; yet, until now the moral sentiment prevailing among us, has not adequately sustained those laws, and all persons who have offended against the same have remained unmolested, except three, who, after conviction, received pardon through the hands of our former Chief Magistrates, and many such offenders have been raised by their fellow-citizens to high Executive, Legislative and Judicial trusts; wherefore it is represented to us that it would be partial and unequal to enforce in the present case penalties which may have been regarded as obsolete; and that the said James Watson Webb is deserving of our clemency:—Now, therefore, know ye, that in consideration of these premises, but upon the express condition that the said James Watson Webb shall not, while he remains a citizen of this State, violate any of the laws designed to prevent dueling, nor by any act, aid, assist or abet any such violation, nor print or publish any justification or defense of the practice of dueling, or any paper with intent to advocate or uphold the same, we have pardoned, remised and released, and by these Presents, do pardon, remise and release said JAMES WATSON WEBB, of and from offense whereof, in our said Court, he stands convicted as aforesaid, of and from all sentences, judgements and executions thereon, hereby restoring to him all the rights and privileges of citizenship forfeited by him, in consequence of the said offense or the said conviction.

In testimony whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made Patent, and the Great Seal of our said State to be hereunto affixed: Witness, WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Governor of our said State, at our City of Albany, the twenty-eighth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand, eight hundred and forty-two.

[L. S.]

Signed, WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Gratifying Indications.—The recent movements in Virginia are auspicious of glorious results for the cause of humanity. The galling influenence of slavery—accursed to the master as well as the bondsman—is seen in the resolute efforts made by the people of Western Virginia to remedy the political evils with which they are afflicted by the prevalence of Slavary in Eastern Virginia. As free labor is cherished in preference to slavery in the West, the improvement of that region is remarkable in population and prosperity—while Eastern Virginia, which is stationary or receding with its slavery, has yet a large majority of representatives in the Legislature and otherwise monopolizes an undue share of political power.

This is a really cheering affair. Virginia, as a free state, would soon be one of the noblest in the world; and as an important part of her own people are now aroused to the evils of slavery by its effects on themselves, we may hope for blessed results.

Burial of a Foot.—The following important item appears in a Mexican paper of the 28th September. We are inclined to the belief, that the other foot, accompanied by the head and body of the owner, will ere long follow in the "footsteps of its illustrious predecessor."

"Yesterday was buried with pomp and solemnity, in the cemetery of St. Paul, the foot which his Excellency President General Santa Anna lost in the action of the 5th December, 1838. It was deposited in a monument erected for that purpose, Don Ignacio Sierray Rosa having pronounced a funeral discourse appropriate to the subject.

Drawback on Exportations to Canada.—We do not believe Foreign Goods can be introduced, to any cosiderable extent, into Canada from the States, unless they are smuggled in British Navigation laws and general policy forbid it. There can be no objection, however, to allowing drawback on goods imported on our Atlantic frontier and exported to Canada, provided they truly are so exported. There will be a fine opening for smuggling and Custom House swearing under such a system of drawback, if it be not carefully guarded in this respect. A bale that comes into New York Silks will go out at Oswego mainly Sheetings or Paper, if not sharply looked after—while the Silks will remain here to be no harm in exercising a prudent wariness.—N. Y. Tribune.

The New York Herald says that the President and his Cabinet "are determined in some shape, to maintain the independence of Texas; and measures have already been adopted preparatory to putting a stop to the invasion threatened by Mexico."

At Cincinnatti, on Thursday of last week, 2500 hogs were sold at $2 per cwt. This was also the opening price of last year.

It is now proposed to carry the Croton water over to Brooklyn, by means of large iron pipes laid at the bottom of the East River by means of the coffer dam. It is thought the expense would not be too great to render it an object to Brooklyn and the Government Navy Yard.

Miller is preaching the day of Judgement, in New York, to crowded audiences. The Clergy are taking up the question with considerable zeal—attempting to show that this fair earth will not be a smoking ruin next April.

A Slave was claimed by his owner in Newark, Ohio—the case tried—and the decision given by the Judge that the law of Ohio, under which the slave was arrested, was unconstitutional. He was accordingly discharged, and posted off at race-horse speed toward Canada.

We learn from the Little Rock Gazette, that the police of that city are still making arrests. Some apprehensions have been entertained that an attempt would be made, by the friends and accomplices of those persons committed to prison, to rescue them. The citizens are arming and organizing themselves for the conflict. All loafers, black legs, vagabonds, &c., are warned to keep away from that place. It is feared they will have the Vicksburgh tragedy acted again. The band who have been committing the forgeries and robberias is supposed to be very extensive, and to be connected from Texas to Maine with others fully as desperate as themselves.

A Kidnapper Caught.—A man named Palmer in Huron county, Ohio, was overtaken near Norwalk, by several Kentuckians, whose slaves he had secreted, and was conveying them to the mouth of Huron, and from thence to be taken to Canada. He had thirteen under his charge, twelve of whom belonged to the Kentuckians, and after an impartial examination before a justice in Norwalk, he was committed to jail to await his trial at the Supreme Court in Columbus.

Dreadful Boiler Explosion.—SCARBOROUGH, Oct. 19.—An occurrence of an awful description took place at Middlesborough yesterday morning, at a quarter past 9 o'clock, the steam boiler belonging to the iron manufactory (principally used for making rails for railroads) of Messrs. Bulcho and Co., exploded, which blew the roof of the building up, and, sad to relate, the principal part fell upon the men at work, where they had just arrived from breakfast.

About 100 men are employed, but to my latest information it could not be stated how many were on the premises at the moment; two hours, however, after the accident, I had some conversation with a respectable gentleman, (resident in the town) who had then left the ruins, and had seen about 11 bodies taken out most sadly mutilated and scalded, of course they were quite dead. All the particulars I could collect in my route from Stockton to this place I forward, thinking it will be the earliest.

What is above stated may be relied upon; other exaggerated accounts were in circulation, but I proved them from conversations with various parties to be erroneous. I have handed you nothing more than I consider will be found correct. The same manufactory had an explosion about six months ago, when one life only was lost; what it may be now, time will shortly show. It is the general opinion that the engine was working beyond its power, which caused the boiler to explode.

Middlesborough is a town on the south bank of the river Tees, about four miles from Stockton; the two towns are connected by rail-way.

The Mammoth Cave, of Kentucky, is becoming a great place of resort for the curious, and is, in truth, one of the marvels of the earth. Dr. Croghan of Louisville, the present proprietor of the cave, has invited two geologists, or other learned men in each State, as guests, to the Cave Hotel, during the present season.

Dr. Locke, of Cincinnati, has visited the cave, and states that "the specimens of fibrous gypsum found in a cave so lately discovered, are among the most wonderful mineral productions in the world, being of snowy whiteness, and imitating with great exactness numerous leaves, plants, and flowers." Dr. L. has enriched his cabinet with specimens from the rare mineral treasures found in the cave, some of which he declares "have nothing like them in the whole earth."

Rail Road Iron.—One hundred tons of Rail Road Iron, Pittsburgh manufacture, have arrived, says the Cleaveland Herald, by the Cross Canal, for the Pontiac Rail Road, Michigan. This use of home manufactured iron for Rail Roads is one of the fruits of a Protective Tariff. Heretofore Rail Road iron has nearly all been imported, our own manufacturers being unable to successfully compete with the products of the pauper labor of Europe. The opening of a water communication between Pittsburgh and the lakes will prove of incalculable benefit to the iron manufactures of that city, provided the present Tariff is permitted to become the settled policy of the country. The great market of the North West is now brought directly to the furnaces and forges of the iron city.—Roch. Dem.

BY WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Governor of the State of New York.

A PROCLAMATION.

Thursday, the eighth of December next is hereby appointed to be observed by the people of this state as a day of public Thanksgiving and Praise to Almighty God for the manifold blessings of the year.—We have tilled the earth in safety and gathered plentiful harvests; relieved labor by inventions of art and new applications of science; brought to successful termination works of physical improvement, designed to promote social intercourse and to guard against accidents to human life and augment its enjoyments; rendered our system of intellectual and moral instruction more equal and efficient, and acquired comprehensive knowledge of the agricultural, forest and mineral resources which Providence has supplied in the territory assigned for our habitation. The savage warfare which so long prevailed on the southern border of our country, scarcely less painful to humanity, whether our arms were victorious or were unsuccessful against a rude and injured people, has ceased. Commotions which threatened to involve a sister state, and even the whole American family, in the calamities of civil war, and thus repress the growing confidence of mankind in their capacity of self-government, have peacefully subsided; and our controversies with a distinguished European nation have been adjusted by a treaty securing reciprocal advantages, and directing the efforts of both states to the removal of a great reproach upon Christendom, by the extirpation of the slave trade. Philanthropy has not abated her zeal within our borders, while extending her visitations to distant regions; and the labors of Philosophy throughout the civilized world have been crowned with discoveries tending to ameliorate human life and elevate the dignity of mankind.

Let us reverently acknowledge that these and all the blessings we enjoy, descend from HIM by whom the nations of the earth are governed in righteousness, and all human affairs are regulated and controlled with infinite wisdom and mercy.

Given under my hand and the privy seal of the state, at the city of Albany this seventh day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, and the sixty-seventh year of American independence.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

TO THE LOCAL AGENTS OF THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

DEAR BRETHREN:—You will observe by the Minutes of the last session of the Society, that we are instructed to exert our utmost to settle up its concerns. Therefore, we would request each of you to do what you can in your several neighborhoods, to ascertain the state of the funds, and collect all that may be due, as far as possible; and transmit what you may thus collect to the Treasurer, Henry C. Hubbard, of Scott, and to give us a correct account of the state of the funds in your hands as soon as possible. We hope that each of you will attend to it without delay; for delays are dangerous. And as S. S. Griswold has been appointed by the Society, to collect its funds where he may travel, it is NECESSARY and EXPECTED, that those who are indebted to the Society, will be punctual and efficient in settling up the same.

LIVE AND HELP LIVE.

J. W. T. RICE, D. D. S.,

WOULD return his thanks to the Ladies and Gentlemen of De Ruyter for past favors, and would again tender to them his professional services for one or two weeks only, commencing Friday, December 23, hence immediate application will be necessary to secure his services. He will while here strictly attend to all operations pertaining to his profession, such as inserting entire sets of teeth by atmospheric pressure, also, parts of sets with springs, clasps, and pivots. Particular attention will be paid to cleansing, and filling decayed teeth with gold or tin foil.

From experience, he feels the utmost confidence in his profession, and would ask nothing more of the public, than his merit as an Operative Dentist deserves; therefore, let those persons desiring such manipulations, please honor him with a call, and if by social conversation and candid reasoning he may not be able to convince them of the fact, that his garment's are free from the stain of quackery, he will ask nothing more.

ODONTALGIA.

The tooth-ache, this most to be dreaded, and in fact, the most severe and excruciating affection or pain with which the human family are afflicted, may be, by applying to him, almost instantaneously relieved and effectually cured, (by the application of his chemical preparation,) without causing even the slightest degree of pain to the patient. Teeth will be extracted, (he was about to say without pain,) causing the least possible degree of pain, with the latest improved, and most scientific instruments.

N. B. Prices to correspond with the times. Room at Martin Spear's Tavern.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—[illegible]

To [illegible] never [illegible] For [illegible] merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents.—Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

POETRY.

From the Christian Secretary.

Eternity and the Soul.

Eternity!—Eternity!—when first
Pealed out Jehovah's all-creating voice,
Which bade the Light thro' realms of darkness burst,
And orbs unnumbered in their course rejoice—
Thy years were countless as the stars on high,
And thou wast then, as now, the same—Eternity!

When crashing spheres shall wail the death of Time,
Melting away at God's consuming ire;
When he shall wrap the world in flames sublime,
And bid the starry lamps of heaven expire—
Thou, fearless, in thy track shalt onward run,
Nought but the childhood of thy endless years begun!

The soul, undying as its glorious Sire,
Shall live, like thee, in its immortal state;
And joys that wake the purest seraph's lyre,
Shall bid it welcome at thy golden gate;
Or anguish deeper than the world can show,
Shall sink it down for aye, amidst thy darkest woe!

Eternal destinies the soul await—
They hang on the decisions of an hour;
And if its interests be deferred too late,
Oh, how shall it escape avenging power!
Scan, mortal, well the path thy feet have trod—
Eternity proclaims, Prepare to meet thy God!

DICKENS ON SLAVERY.

The "American Notes" are, for the most part facetious, hyperbolical, and superficial. They are adapted to convey anything but correct impressions, to those who have never been residents of the country, because the author's sole object seems to be, through most of his chapters, to make his readers laugh—sometimes at our expense, sometimes at his own wit—sometimes at things of no interest or moment whatsoever, to us, his readers or himself. Every thing indicating eccentricity, ill humor or ill manners, on the part of American, from the President down to the boot-black of a country hotel, he humorously exaggerates—as much as he can and keep his countenance. But on the subject of slavery, he lays as de all his wit and humor, and speaks forth the words of truth and soberness. This seems to have been, in his view, too serious a matter to be trifled with. He manifests a sincerity upon it, seldom discoverable in other parts of his book. It is the only subject of national interest to which he devotes even a single page. To this he gives an entire chapter, of many pages—the only chapter in which he endorses his opinions by his testimony, and exhibits any solicitude lest his word should be doubted, or his language misunderstood.—This sober chapter, following abruptly upon so many humorous ones, strikes the reader singularly—but no plan could be so admirably adapted to make it tell on the public mind. It seems almost like an order of Providence, that a book, which the most superficial and prejudiced, and persons in every part of the Union, will read, from beginning to end—should embrace one of the most decided, tremendous, yet truthful and candid anti-slavery documents that ever was penned. It will surprise the ignorant and rouse the indifferent. It will do good. It is an index to common opinion and feeling of the civilized world.

Dickens refers to our slavery incidentally, before he comes to the chapter devoted to its description. Having arrived at Baltimore, he says:

"We stopped to dine, and being now in Maryland, were waited on, for the first time, by slaves. The sensation of exacting any service from human creatures who are bought and sold, and being, for the first time, a party to their condition, is not an enviable one. The institution exists, perhaps, in its least repulsive and most mitigated form in such a town as this but it is slavery; and though I was with respect to it an innocent man, its presence filled me with a sense of shame and self-reproach."

Referring to a scene in Congress, while engaged upon its description, he says:

"It was but a week since an aged, gray haired man, a lasting honor to the land that gave him birth, who has done good service to his country, as his forefathers did, and who will be remembered scores upon scores of years after the worms bred in its corruption, are but so many grains of dust, it was but a week since this old man had stood for days upon his trial before this very body, charged with having dared to assert the infamy of that traffic which has, for its accursed merchandize, men and women, and their unborn children. Yes. And publicly exhibited in the same city all the while; gilded, framed and glazed; hung up for general admiration; shown to strangers, not with shame, but pride; its face not turned towards the wall, itself not taken and burned; is the Unanimous Declaration of the Thirteen States of America, which solemnly declares that all men are created equal, and are endowed by their Creator with the inalienable rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness!"

"But again; this class, together with that last one I have named, the miserable aristocracy spawned of a false republic, lift up their voices and exclaim, 'Public opinion is all sufficient to prevent such cruelty as you denounce.' Public opinion! Why, public opinion in the slave States is slavery, is it not? Public opinion in the slave States has delivered the slaves over to the gentle mercies of their masters.—Public opinion has knotted the lash, heated the branding-iron, loaded the rifle shielded the murderer. Public opinion threatens the abolitionest with death if he ventures to the South, and drags him with a rope about his middle, in a broad, unblushing noon through the first city in the East. Public opinion has, within a few years, burned a slave alive at a slow fire in the city of St Louis; and public opinion has to this day maintained upon the bench that inestimable judge who charged the jury empanelled there to try his murderers, that their most horrid deed was an act of public opinion, and being so, must not be punished by the laws the public sentiment had made. Public opinion hailed this doctrine with a howl of wild applause, and set the prisoners free to walk the city, men of mark, and influence, and station as they had been before.

Public opinion! what class of men have an immense preponderance over the rest of the community, in their power of representing public opinion in the legislature? The slave owners. They send from their twelve States, one hundred members, while the fourteen free States, with a free population nearly double, return but a hundred and forty-two. Before whom do the presidential candidates bow down the most humbly, on whom do they fawn the most fondly, and for whose tastes do they cater the most assiduously in their servile protestations? The slave-holders always.

Public opinion! hear the public opinion of the free South, as expressed by its own members in the House of Representatives at Washington. 'I have a great respect for the chair,' quoth North Carolina, 'I have a great respect for the chair as an officer of the house, and a great respect for him personally; nothing but that respect prevents me from rushing to the table and tearing that petition which has just been presented for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia to pieces.' 'I warn abolitionists,' says South Carolina, 'ignorant infuriated barbarians as they are, that if chance shall throw any of them into our hands, he may expect a felons death.' 'Let an abolitionist come within the borders of South Carolina,' cries a third, mild Carolina's colleague, 'and if we can catch him we will try him, and notwithstanding the interference of all the governments on earth, including the federal government, we will hang him.'

Public opinion has made this law; it has declared that in Washington, in that city which take its name from the father of American liberty, any justice of the peace may bind with fetters any negro passing down the street and thrust him into jail; no offence on the black man's part is necessary. The justice says, 'I choose to think this man a runaway; and locks him up. Public opinion impowers the man of law when this is done to advertise the negro in the newspapers, warning his owner to come and claim him, or he will be sold to pay the jail fees. But supposing he is a free black and has no owner, it may naturally be presumed that he is set at liberty. No; he is sold to recompense his jailor. This has been done again and again. He has no means of proving his freedom, has no advertiser, messenger or assistance of any kind; no investigation into his case is made, or inquiry instituted. He, a free man, who may have served for years and bought his liberty, is thrown into jail on no process, for no crime, and on no pretence of crime, and is sold to pay the jail fees. This seems incredible even of America, but it is the law.

* * * * * *

Let us try this public opinion by another test which is important in three points of view, first, as showing how desperately timid of the public opinion slave owners are are, in their delicate descriptions of fugitive slaves in widely circulated newspapers; secondly, as showing how perfectly contented the slaves are, and how very seldom they run away; thirdly, as exhibiting their entire freedom from scar, or any blemish, or any mark of cruel infliction, as their pictures are drawn, not by lying abolitionists, but by their own truth masters.

The following are a few specimens of the advertisements in the public papers.

"Ran away negress Caroline. Had on a collar with one prong turned down."

"Ran away, a black woman, Betsey.—Had an iron bar on her right leg.'

"Ran away the negro Manuel, much marked with irons."

"Ran away, negro boy about twelve years old. Had round his neck a chain dog-collar with 'De Lampert' engraved on it."

"Ran away, the nego Hown. Has a ring of iron on his left fot. Also Grise his wife, having a ring and chain on the left leg."

"Ran away, a negro boy, named James. Said boy was ironed when he left me.,'

"Committed to jail, a man who calls his name John. He has a clog of iron on his right foot, which will weigh four or five pounds."

"Detained at the police jail, the negro wench Myra. Has several marks of lashing, and has irons on her feet."

"Ran away a negro woman and two children; a few days before she went off I burned her with a hot iron on the left side of her face. I tried to make the letter M."

"Ran away, a negro man named Henry; his left eye out, some scars from a dirk on and under his left arm, and much scarred with the whip."

"Ran away, Sam. He was shot a short time since through the hand, and has several shots in his left arm and side."

"Ran away, my negro man Dennis.—Said negro has been shot in the left arm between the shoulder and elbow, which has paralyzed the left hand."

"Ran away, my negro man named Simon. He has been shot badly in his back and right arm."

"Ran away, a negro man named Arthur. Has a considerable scar across his breast and each arm, made by a knife; loves to talk much of the goodnes of God."

Mr. Dickens inserts twenty-eight more of these advertisements, and adds,

"I could enlarge this catalogue with broken arms and broken legs, and gnashed flesh, and missing teeth, and lacerated backs, and bites of dogs, and brands of red hot irons innumerable; but as my readers will be sufficiently sickened and repelled already, I will turn to another branch of the subject."

He then proceeds to give an idea of the effects of slavery, on Southern society, quoting, from their newspapers, accounts of murders, duels, horrible tragedies, terrible affrays, &c.

These he follows with an outburst of indignant appeal, which for withering and contemptuous rebuke of character and of conduct, has scarce a parallel in the English language. We pity the man that must read this as a slaveholder; or even as a Southern native. It is enough that we are bound to the oppressor by the ties of citizenship. O, when shall the oppressed go free!

"Now I appeal to every human mind, imbued with the commonest of common sense, and the commonest of common humanity; to all dispassionate, reasoning creatures, of any shade of opinion; and ask, with these revolting evidences of the state of society which exists in and about America before them, can they have a doubt of the real condition of the slave, or can they for a moment make a compromise between the institution or any of its flagrant fearful features, and their own just conscience? Will they say of any tale of cruelty and horror, however aggravated in degree, that it is improbable, when they can turn to the public prints, and running, read such signs as these, laid before them by the men who rule the slaves, in their own acts and under their own hands?

Do we not know that the worst deformity and ugliness of slavery are at once the cause and the effect of the reckless license taken by these free-born outlaws? Do we not know that the man who has been born and bred among its wrongs; who has seen in his childhood husbands obliged at the word of command to flog their wives; woman indecently compelled to hold up their own garments that men might lay the heavier stripes upon their legs, driven and hurried by brutal overseers in their time of travail, and becoming mothers on the field of toil, under the very lash itself; who has read in youth, and seen his virgin sisters read, descriptions of runaway men and women, and their disfigured persons, which could not be published elsewhere, of so much stock upon a farm, or at a show of beasts—do we know that man, whenever his wrath is kindled up, will be a brutal savage? Do we not know that as he is a coward in his domestic life, stalking among his shrinking men and women slaves armed with his heavy whip, so he will be a coward out of doors, and carrying coward's weapons, hidden in his breast, will shoot men down and stab them when he quarrels? And if our reason did not teach us this and much beyond; if we were such idiots as to close our eyes to that fine mode of training which rears such men; should we not know that they who among their equals stab and pistol in the legislative hall, and in the counting-house, and on the market-place, and in all the elsewhere peaceful pursuits of life, must be to their dependants, even though they were free servants, so many merciless and unrelenting tyrants?

What! shall we declaim against the ignorant peasantry of Ireland, and mince the matter when these American taskmasters are in question? Shall we cry shame on the brutality of those who ham-string cattle; and spare the lights of Freedom upon earth who notch the ears of men and women, cut pleasant posies in the shrinking flesh, learn to write with pens of red-hot iron on the human face, rack their poetic for liveries of mutilation which their slaves shall wear for life and carry to the grave, break living limbs as did the soldiery who mocked and slew the Savior of the world, and set defenceless creatures for targets! Shall we whimper over legends of the tortures practised on each other by the pagan Indians, and smile upon the cruelties of Christian men! Shall we, so long as these things last, exult above the scattered remnants of that stately race, and triumph in the white enjoyment of their broad possessions? Rather, for me, restore the forest and Indian village; in lieu of stars and stripes, let some poor feather flutter in the breeze; replace the streets and squares by wigwams; and though the death-song of a hundred haughty warriors fill the air, it will be music to the shriek of one poor slave."

PATMOS.

We were close in with "the isle that is called Patmos" several hours, and I had a good opportunity of examinining its appearance, so far as is possible, from the sea. It is about twenty miles in circumference, and its aspect is forbidding and cheerless. The shores are in most places steep and precipitate, and from our vessel it appeared as if the inhabitants would be in constant danger of rolling down into the sea. The highest part of the island is surmounted by a monastery, dedicated to St. John, round which are built the houses of a respectable town. We could discover very few trees. The sailors were lavish in their praises of the inhabitants.

It was with unutterable feelings I gazed on this dreary rock. The situation of the weeping exiles was before me, who were banished from the pleasures and applauses of imperial Rome, and were sent to inhabit this dull and distant region, with none to converse with but sufferers in the same calamities, whose very attempts at consolation would only add still deeper sorrow.—What must they have felt, and how they must have wept, when they beheld from the horizon the horizon the little speck that was to constitute their world? There was one among the exiles whose brow was calm, whose eye was bedimmed by no tear, and from whose countenance seemed to beam the serenity of a spirit in bliss. It was the beloved disciple of the Lord. The banishment of the venerable apostle was from a cause perhaps different from that of any of the exiles who had preceded him, as it was "for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ," Rev. i. v.

Standing upon one of the eminences, of the island, and turning towards the continent, St. John would be able to distinguish mountains that might also be seen from the whole of the seven churches of Asia; and as he had planted some of them with his own hand, and probably visited all of them, can we doubt he often would stand thus, and looking towards these interesting spots, lift up his hands to heaven and pour out his soul in prayer, that He who walked among the golden candlesticks, would continue to visit them in mercy, and save them from the power of the Antichrist that was to come. It is one of those [illegible] upon which the mind so much delights to dwell, that from this rock, surrounded only by other similar rocks, and looking out upon distant mountains, there should have been an insight given into futurity farther and clearer than in any other place was ever afforded unto mere man.—Hardy's Notices of the Holy Land.

Ten Rules of Life.—The following rules for practical life, were given by Mr. Jefferson, in a letter of advice to his namesake, Thomas Jefferson Smith, in 1817.

1. Never put off till to-morrow what can be done to-day.
2. Never trouble others to do what you can do yourself.
3. Never spend your money before you have it.
4. Never buy what you do not want because it is cheap.
5. Pride costs us much more than hunger, thirst and cold.
6. We never repent of eating too little.
7. Nothing is troublesome that we do willingly.
8. How much pain have those evils cost us which never happened.
9. Take things always by their smooth handle.
10. When angry, always count ten before you speak.

THE RESCUE.

There lived in a single room of an old house, situated in a secluded street of our city, a drunkard and his wife and two children. He was a man lost to every tender susceptibility of our nature; his mind dwelt mostly upon the groveling plans of obtaining his next supply of liquid poison. His only aim, his only wish, was to silence conscience and bury himself in the spirit bowl.

I entered this man's house armed with the sword and shield of a true Washingtonian, determined if possible to conquer the fiend that possessed him. The scene that presented itself to view, was one that might be expected in the abiding place of the sloth and the drunkard; every thing spoke of wretchedness and poverty. Prepared to meet with an unwelcome reception, in a lively tone, I accosted him thus: "Mr. Hayward, how do you do? I have good news for you.' As he returned my salutation, he staggered a little, but recollecting himself, endeavored to appear sober. 'What news?' inquired he, 'have you that can be termed good to a man in my situation?' From the manner of his speaking I found the tender spot had been touched, the cord had been sprung that vibrated to the tone of my most [illegible] hopes. He felt that I wished him well, and that feeling was the highway to my success.

I told him I knew of a way that would alleviate his present condition—raise him from the state in which he then was, and place him in the path of usefulness and content, but it must be conditionally, it must cost an effort, resolution must be your motto, determination your friend.

'To be dictated, too, no man likes,' said the drunkard, 'but you are a friend and I will listen to you.' I drew from my pocket the temperance pledge, and placing it in his hand, said, 'these are my conditions, sign them.' He took the paper and while reading it, strange were the emotions visible in his countenance; anger, shame and hope, were seen follow in quick succession, as each feeling was uppermost in his mind. At this critical moment his poor wife, who had been a silent spectator of what had passed, stepped forward, and tremblingly asked what was the contents of the paper. I replied, it was the temperance pledge. At these words her face was bright with joy, she sprang to the side of her husband, and looking him in the face, said, in a tone that went to the soul, "Dear William, sign it, and we shall again be happy.'

He turned to me with a voice full of emotion, and said, 'I will sign it.' As he did so he uttered these words, 'May God help me to keep the pledge.'

His wife was in ecstacies, she seemed another being, so completely had this joyful news transformed her. She thanked me with the heart-stirring warmth of a woman, while the tears of joy rolled down her pale cheek. I took her husband by the hand, and said to him, 'You have done a noble deed, wait the result and you shall be happy. My promise to you shall be fulfilled, you can have work whenever you wish.' That man did work, and by his industry and economy raised himself from what he was to what he is, a master mechanic, enjoying the comfort of peace in the abode of plenty.

There is hope for the drunkard though his bed be the gutter, and his pillow the flag-stone.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To Families and Invalids.

THE following indispensable family remedies may be found at the village drug stores, and soon at every country store in the state. Remember and never get them unless they have the fac simile signature of Comstock & Co. on the wrappers, as all others by the same names are base impositions and counterfeits. If the merchant near you has them not, urge him to procure them at 71 Maiden-lane, the next time he visits New York, or to write for them. No family should be a week without these remedies.

BALDNESS.

Balm of Columbia, for the hair, which will stop it from falling out, or restore it on bald places; and on children make it grow rapidly, or on those who have lost their hair from any cause. All vermin that infest the heads of children in schools, are prevented or killed at once. Find the name of Comstock & Co. on it, or never try it. Remember this always.

RHEUMATISM AND LAMENESS.

Positively cured, and all shrivelled muscles and limbs are restored, in the old or young, by the Indian Vegetable Elixir and Nerve and Bone Liniment—but never without the name of Comstock & Co. on it.

PILES &c.

Are wholly prevented, or governed if the attack has come on, if you use the only true Hay's Liniment, from Comstock & Co. All sores and every thing relieved by it that admits of an outward application. It acts like a charm. Use it.

HORSES that have Ring-Bone, Spavin, Wind-Galls, &c., are cured by Roofs' [illegible]; and Foundered horses entirely cured by Roofs' Founder Ointment. Mark this, all horsemen.

Extracts From Carlow.

Binius Councils tomi tertii pars Altera, Fol. 1448. A Council was celebrated in Scotland about the first bringing in of the dominical day, which some now call the Lord's day, or Sunday, which he calls the dominical, which council he says was held Anno Dom. 1203, in the time of Pope Innocent the third. See Roger Houeden, whom Binius quotes, page 1202, and Matthew Paris old impression, Fol. 192, 193, and Lucius' Ecclesiastical History, which he gathered out of the oldest and best writers, printed at Basil 1624.

Lucius, Centry 13, Fol. 264. Lucius says of the dominical day in a certain council in Scotland, it was enacted that it should be kept, beginning it from the twelfth hour on Saturday noon till Monday. Boethius, Lib. 13, de Scottis, and Fol. 357, in Scotland, Anno Dom. 1203. William King of Scotland called a council of the principal of his Kingdom, there it was decreed that Saturday from the twelfth hour at noon should be holy, and that they should do no prophane work, and this they should observe till Monday. Roger Houeden says this council was about the observation of the first day. There came also a legate from the Pope with a sword and a purple hat, indulgences and privileges to the young King, when it was decreed, that the seventh day from the twelfth hour at noon should be holy, that the people should do nothing prophane, but apply themselves to things sacred, and this they should do even until the second day morning sun rising. Boethius Lib. 13 de Scotis, 788. So as I take it, here are these witnessess to the truth of this story, Roger Houeden and Matthew Paris, Lucius and Boethies, great authorities as to the truth of the matter of fact; says Binius the cause of celebrating this council in Scotland seems to be what Roger Houeden describes; so that the first day Sabbath stands without all scripture, yet upon as firm ground as Easter, Whitsuntide, or Christmas. It is no great wonder then that Mr. Ward should so quarrel with the scripture Sabbath, seeing he is for one that is without scripture, tho' he fathers it there, for some reasons it may be, himself best knows; but the scriptures being altogether silent of a first day Sabbath, he flies to history, and tells us Eusebius says that the first day was called the Queen of days; and what of all this, the same history makes it manifest that the seventh day was reckoned the King of days, or the chief of days for holy worship, and in a manner almost all the congregations in the world did keep the seventh day for the Sabbath as hath been shewed; and Athenasius, Bishop of Alexandria, saith, they assembled on Saturday, not that they were infected with Judaism, but only to worship Christ, the Lord of the Sabbath, see Dr. Care, p. 175. And seeing that neither the holy scriptures, nor the history which you mentioned for a first day Sabbath, will afford you any relief in this distress that you are in, sir, for something like a command for the first day of the week for a Sabbath, I will produce another humane institution and command, to help you at this dead lift, to do you a kindness, and what spirit hath been at work to make a Sabbath for you? the passage is Dr. Heylin's book called Sunday no Sabbath. p. 221, 222, part 2. Eustachius, Abbot of Flay, returned into England, and therein preached the word from city to city, and from place to place, he prohibited using markets on the first day of the week, for he said, That this command under written about the observation of the dominical day came from Heaven, so this device, by the Abbot, of a new command from Heaven was used by him to alter the Sabbath day in England.

JEWISH INTELLIGENCE.

In choosing the title for the remarks we are about to make, an opportunity is at once afforded us of stating that we owe our information to the London Monthly Periodical which bears this name. In perusing its pages, we were so much impressed with the many important facts it contains, that we could not resist the temptation of drawing up a few remarks for publication.

It will excite no surprise that the Bishopric in Jerusalem should occupy a very prominent place in these documents. The fact, as the king of Prussia expresses it, that Protestant England and Protestant Prussia have given each other the right hand of fellowship over the tomb of the Savior, and of which we can hardly think without a feeling very much akin to the romantic; this fact has been already productive of the most practical and important consequences. As was anticipated, those who now become converts of the Anglican Church, are at the same time enrolled among the members of an acknowledged community; the presence of Dr. Maggovan has proved a powerful means of attracting the suffering Hebrew, in spite of the excommunications threatened by his Rabbi; and more than all, in the missionaries which are now ordained in Jerusalem, we see in a delightful manner the prophecy fulfilled which declares that "the law shall go forth out of Zion." An interesting feature in connection with the subject of ordination, is found in the fact that candidates of German descent, after having signed the Augsburg Confession, can be ordained by the Bishop, and yet retain the use of their German Liturgy. How far this step is to be regarded as an indication that the King of Prussia proposes to introduce Episcopacy into his dominions, it would probably be very difficult to determine. That the See of Rome should be provoked by this mission to a similar effort is not very astonishing, but that the dignitary of that See has received the name of the Bishop of Babylon, is, to say the least, of very ominous sound. It would almost seem as if once again Caiphas had ignorantly proved a true prophet, and as if Rome had been thus permitted to write her awful doom on her own brow. The mission of the Church of Scotland has led to results which in the document before us are summed up under three heads.

1. The distinction between true and false Christianity has been clearly opened up before the eyes of the Jews.

2. The study of the Old Testament has been forced upon them, so that they cannot avoid it.

3. The word of God has become more and more the ground of controversy. The authority of the Talmud is not now appealed to; the only dispute about it being, whether it is to be referred to at all, or what is its real value.

In regard to the latter point, the systematic opposition of the congregation calling itself the "British Jews," has attracted general attention. They will know, they declare, of no ritual observances based on the Divine authority of the Talmud, but at the same time at variance with the word of God. The same opposition, but in a very different spirit, has been manifested by another and a very large class of Jews; and the Hamburg congregation may be regarded as their index, who reject the word of God, not less than the Talmud, and have embraced some form or other of the Rationalism of our time. As an offset to this tendency, we may regard the efforts lately made for the purpose of establishing a Missionary Society for the spread of Judaism—an additional proof of the spirit of inquiry which has been awakened among the people of Israel.

As for the important question of the Restoration of the Jews, it is touched in several instances, in the documents before us. The extreme view of a Gentile millenium, in which every distinction of Hebrew and Gentile is removed, is opposed on the one hand, while on the other no sympathy is manifested for the expectation of a Hebrew millenium, for the appearance of which no preparation is needed. A remnant "is first to be gathered, before the Reedemer shall come out of Zion, and turn away the ungodliness of Jacob; and when we glance at some of the glorious scenes presented by the Rev. Mr. Paule, stationed at Berlin; when we think of the thousands and thousands of Jews and Gentiles who are assembling there time after time, to witness the baptism of a Hebrew, we are little inclined to embrace the advice of those who tell us to wait for the time when the restoration of Israel will take place without our instrumentality.

The operations of the Society are at present directed to the printing and distribution of Scriptures and Tracts; in sustaining in the city of London an Episcopal chapel, Hebrew schools and operative institutions, a Hebrew college, and an institution for the widows of missionaries. Missionaries of the Society are stationed at Beyroot, Poland, Cracow, Posen, Konigsberg, Dantzig, Berlin, Creuznach, Breslau, Frankfort-on-the-Maine, Offenbach, Brussels, Strasburg and Mentz. Constantinople and Tunis are temporarily occupied.

In perusing the reports of the missionaries, the most striking contrasts present themselves to our view. Here is a body of Jews surrounding one of the missionaries, and robbing him of his books; in another place a fearful tumult is raised, to obstruct his labors of love; but again and again the scene changes, and we see a venerable Rabbi appearing, and guileless receiving the Savior, or we hear another protesting with great solemnity that he is willing to go on in his humble employment, and that he only comes to seek Christianity, as the only means to obtain peace for his soul. The cross which many of the new converts have taken upon themselves, is, in the eyes of the world, often one of unusual severity.

And now, in conclusion, it remains only to say, that the more we read of the present condition of this people, the more we feel persuaded that they have great reason, in accordance with a touching custom of theirs, to mourn on the Rock of Moriah, where now, alas! the Mosque of Omar stands over the ruin of their race. There they think that prayer still goes up with most acceptance, if breathed through the crevices of the building of which Jehovah said, "Mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually;" and there bowed down in the dust, they realize the prophetic sorrow of Jeremiah, when he asks, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Behold and see whether there be any sorrow like my sorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me, in the day of his fierce anger."

> "The wild dove hath her nest, the fox his cave, > Mankind their country, Israel but—their grave."

It is hardly possible for an American—and we are happy to feel as an American—to peruse these papers without engaging in a momentary search, at least for a passing statement of what the church of America has done in this cause.

With the exception of a single notice of a donation of 20*l*., transmitted to the Society of England, through the Rev. Dr. Tyng, no mention is made of her labors. It seems that the church has been sitting still; and it may be that in her case it is strength to sit still for the present. Still we cannot but add that we should rejoice, with feelings of the warmest gratitude, if she were to follow soon the example of Great Britain, with regard to the people of Israel. Pity for the physical and moral degradation of the Jew—justice for the injuries we have done him—gratitude for the benefits we have received through his instrumentality—in short, the best and noblest feelings of our nature plead in his behalf. Time and place fail us to urge our appeal as we would gladly do if it were in our power. May the blessings of the Lord rest on this humble attempt to draw the attention of the church to the condition of the children of Israel.

I DO NOT FEEL RIGHT.

This is an excuse often made by professing Christians for neglecting their religious duties. Are they not required to pray in secret? They do not feel right, and therefore the closet is neglected and the opportunity for communing with the Savior suffered to pass. Are they called upon to lead the devotions of a prayer meeting? They do not feel right, and therefore they are justified in refusing, and thus throw a chill on the minds of all present. Are they summoned to the table of the Lord? They do not feel right, and therefore pray to be excused from showing forth the Lord's death, and calling to remembrance his sufferings for their redemption. Are they requested to visit the afflicted, and minister to the distressed and sorrowing? They do not feel right, therefore they justify their absence from the house of the mourning, or their withholding from the destitute the consolation which they might impart.

Is this a good excuse for these neglects of duty? We ought to feel right, and to feel right is to feel like doing whatever is required of us by the gospel. We suppose, however, the excusers mean by "feeling right," feeling comfortably or happy. They are enjoying the pleasures of religion and therefore neglect its duties. Now this is the most certain method they can possibly take to debar themselves of all spiritual enjoyments. The reward which the gospel gives is to the obedient, not the disobedient. And most likely they do not feel right; because they have been negligent of duty, or they have performed it for the sake of the comfort they seek, and have thus manifested the selfishness of their aims. Let all such do their duty without respect to feeling, but a sincere desire to honor the Savior by their obedience, and they will eventually find that in keeping his commandments there is great reward.

We would suggest this thought for the consideration of such and ask them to reflect upon it when tempted to neglect duty because they do not feel right.

Religion is a matter of principle, not feeling. We are to believe its truth, not because we feel, but because they are revealed to us from heaven. We are to practice its duties, not because we feel, but because they are required of us by the Redeemer, and that we may glorify Him. If we attended to them only when it comports with our feelings, where is our self-denial? We would not be misunderstood.—We believe there is much feeling in religion, but all we contend for is, that feeling is not religion. No man can believe the truths of religion and not feel, nor can he attend to the duties it enjoins without having excited its feelings of love to the Redeemer, and desire for the salvation of his fellow-men. When the world presses its cares upon him, it may be irksome to attend to religious claims, but we should beware how we give place to the world and let it get an advantage over us. It will surely rob us of all right feeling, and bring distress upon our souls. We must act from principle, and our kind and gracious Savior will take care to bestow upon us the feelings which we need, and which are for us to enjoy.—Bap. Record.

ENTIRE SANCTIFICATION.

BY DR. A. CLARKE.

Can any man expect to be saved from inward sin in the other world? None, except such as hold the Popish anti-scriptural doctrine of purgatory. "But this deliverance is expected at death." Where is the promise that it shall then be given?—There is not one such in the whole Bible! And to believe for a thing essential to our glorification, without any point to support that faith in reference to the point on which it is exercised, is a desperation that argues as well the absence of true faith as it does of right reason. Multitudes of such persons are continually deploring their want of faith, even where they have the clearest and most explicit promises; and yet, strange to tell, risk their salvation at the hour of death on a deliverance that is no where promised in the sacred oracles!

'But who has got this blessing?' Every one who comes to God in the right way for it. 'Where is such a one?' Seek the blessing as you should do, and you will soon be able to answer the question. 'But it too great a blessing to be expected.'—Nothing is too great for a believer to expect, which God has promised, and Christ has purchased with his blood. 'If I had such a blessing I should not be able to retain it.' All things are possible to him that believeth. Besides, like all other gifts of God, it comes with a principle of preservation with it: 'and upon all thy glory there shall be a defense.' 'Still, such an unfaithful person as I cannot expect it.' Perhaps the infidelity you deplore came through the want of this blessing: and as to worthlessness, no soul under heaven deserves the least of God's mercies. It is not for thy worthiness that He has given thee any thing, but for the sake of his Son. You can say, 'When I felt myself a sinner, sinking into perdition, I did then flee to the atoning blood, and found pardon; but this sanctification is a far greater work.'—No; speaking after the manner of men, justification is far greater than sanctification. When thou wert a sinner, ungodly, an enemy in thy mind by wicked works, a child of the devil, an heir of hell, God pardoned thee on thy casting thy soul on the merit of the great Sacrificial Offering; thy sentence was reversed, thy state was changed, thou wert put among the children, and God's Spirit witnessed with thine that thou wert his child. What a change! and what a blessing!

What, then, is this complete sanctification? It is the cleansing of the blood that has not been cleansed; it is washing the soul of the true believer from the remains of sin; it is the making one who is already a child of God more holy, that he may be more happy, more useful in the world, and bring more glory to his heavenly Father. Great as this work is, how little humanely speaking, is it when compared with what God has already done for thee? But suppose it were ten thousand times greater, is any thing too hard for God? Are not all things possible to him that believes? And does not the blood of Christ cleanse from all unrighteousness?

"As the winds digs up the waves of the sea, so the devil digs up sin in my heart; he is always, this day and that day at work there. When I wake in the middle of the night he wakes also to contend with me, and to hold fast my soul so that I may not fly to the Savior.'

Another complains of the conflict within: "I have two hearts which are always struggling one with the other. The one is a very good heart; the other altogether bad. I am wondering which will be thrown down and put undermost at last."

Some of the first inquirers at the Sandwich Islands, thus addressed the missionaries: One said, "My heart is dark, you are light and must enlighten it." Another, "My heart is a wilderness, you must cultivate it." Another, "My heart is a lamp, you must fill it with oil." Another, "My heart is like a dry field, you must water it."

THE WORLD A LABYRINTH.—The world says Coleridge, is a vast labyrinth, in which almost every one is manifesting hatred to those who don't run the same way A few, indeed, stand motionless, and not seeking to lead themselves or others out of the maze—laugh at the failures of their brethren, yet with little reason, for more grossly than the most bewildered one, does he act, who never aims to get right.

Pleasure every Where.

There's pleasure every where,
To hearts that rightly feel,
And no one need complain of care,
Or on his brow a sorrow wear,
Or painful sight reveal.

Nature below---above,
How beautiful to view!
In every path we choose to rove,
We find a thousand things to love,
Each, wonderful and new.

Then be not sad, I pray.
The earth, the sea, the sky,
Are clothed in smiles---and full of play,
The beasts and birds wear time away---
Then why not you and I!

A glorious world is ours,
In peerless beauty dressed
With trees and shrubs, and blushing flowers,
O'er which the sun-light falls in showers,
And slumbers on its breast.

From the Adv. of Moral Reform.

The writer of the following can vouch for its correctness. Her object in giving it publicity is simply to use it as an illustration of the tendency of light reading on the minds of children and youth:

THE YOUNG NOVEL READERS.

There were two little girls living in the county of H——, in this State, who were great novel readers. They were less than twelve years of age, but they had read many volumes of novels. Their parents loved them very much, sent them to school, and did a great many things to make them happy. But they did not know, or, if they knew, did not consider what an injury it might be to the minds of their beloved daughters to suffer them to read works of fiction, and so they let them choose the kind of reading that pleased them best.—Among other tales that fell in their way, was one giving an account of two young Misses who became heroines.—As the story says, they made up their minds to run away from home and seek their fortune.—Every thing they met with was made to turn to their advantage, till they were raised to a princely station on the eastern continent. The story was so well told, that the children took it for granted that it was all reality, and one suggested to the other the plan that had entered her head of having a similar adventure, in which they too should become heroines. It was dwelt upon and conned over till their young brain was reeling with excited hope. Their purpose was settled, and the day fixed for their elopement. They filled their satchels with corn to parch when they should get hungry, and put in some matches to light a fire in the woods when they were cold.

In the morning they asked their mother for clean aprons, and went to school as usual One of them wrote a hasty note to her father, and committed it to a schoolmate, with the request that she would keep it till evening. During recess they took their departure very quietly, and were not missed until afternoon. It was late in the winter of the present year, and the ground was covered with sleet and snow, but they made the best of their way along, and though they soon got wet and cold their ardor did not at all abate.

When the shades of evening began to gather, they had walked some four miles from home, and found themselves in the vicinity of a rail-road, near which were a great many temporary huts, occupied by Irish laborers. Owing to the damp and wet every where in the woods, they had not succeeded in lighting a fire, or parching their corn, and as it began to grow dark they knew not where to stop over night. They were about deciding to go into one of the little huts, and ask to lodge upon the floor, when they were accosted by a stranger who had been observing them, and questioned as to where they were going. They were unwilling to answer; but as the matter was pressed, they very gravely told him they had started for Europe! His curiosity was excited, and finding they were rational on other subjects, he conversed with them till he drew from them some of the incidents of the wonderful narrative that had incited them to such a brave undertaking. Having learned their names, he took them to an Inn, and despatched a messenger to inform the parents of their safety.

After it was known by their friends that they were missing, the village, the creek, and the woods in the neighborhood were searched, till the letter given to the schoolmate revealed the mystery of their sudden disappearance. The course of the search was then changed till the pursuers came in contact with the messenger. And, instead of the romance of a journey to Europe, "afoot and alone," and the air castles so nicely built, our young heroines found themselves the next morning in the chimney corner at home.

REMARKS.—It is a very common thing for children to love to read stories. I have known some children who disliked to read any thing else. Sometimes in Sabbath school, when the librarian has been passing the books, and I have been about selecting some for my class, I have heard two or three little voices at once, saying, Teacher, will you please to get me a story book? Now if all the story books that are published contained true stories instead of false ones, the morals of the dear children who read them, would not be endangered by their perusal. But a great many of the books that children read, are just like the one that made the little girls, above alluded to, act so foolishly. Children and youth very often read books of this sort, and think they may be true. Sometimes they do not inquire whether they are true or false. They like the story, and find it so much easier to think over the curious and strange events that it tells about, than to remember history, geography, or other common studies, or even their Bible lessons, that they sometimes regard it as a great hardship, if their parents or guardians deprive them of this kind of reading and give them something better. But there are two good reasons why children should not read novels. One is, because it is wrong to waste their precious time in reading what is false. A good child would not want to spend a great many hours in hearing a playmate tell lies. Another is, because novel reading leads them not only to dislike application to useful studies, but makes them hate to read the Bible, the best of all books. Had the little girls above alluded to, been faithful to love and obey the word of God, they would never have thought of being so ungrateful to their kind parents as to go away from home without their knowledge. Had they gone to the Bible for entertainment and instruction, it would have taught them how unwise and wicked it was to cherish the vain ambition of becoming rich and great, instead of striving to be wise and good.

In closing, I want to tell the dear children who read this, another true story.—By the way, children need not be afraid to read stories that are true. It is right that they should read and profit by them. They will find a great many such in the Bible, and other good books. But they should always find out whether the book they wish to read is true; and then, if it is at all worth reading, they should read carefully, and think about it, and endeavor to store their minds with all the ideas it contains, that are good and useful. But to my story

A PAUPER'S DEATH-BED.

Yesterday I went to visit the New York Penitentiary on Blackwell's Island. Nearly 400 women and girls, and a great many men, are there in prison for drinking and other crimes. In one of the wards of the hospital where the sick are kept, I saw a girl who was dying. The death-rattle was in her throat, and she struggled till she could not breathe any more, and then her face looked ghastly and frightful—but her soul was gone to God. I looked around, but I saw no kind mother, or sister, or relative, who had been near to smooth her dying pillow, or weep because they loved her. She had said that she had such friends, who were worthy and respectable, but—if living—they were across the ocean, and knew nothing of her fate.—When quite young, she ran away to seek her fortune.* A stranger in a strange land—forsaken by a young man who had accompanied her, and made fair, but false promises—crime and sickness made her a fit subject for this dreadful place, where, unpitied and unknown, she has slept in death, and to-day finds a pauper's grave in yonder Potter's Field.

Youthful reader, whatever else you do, or leave undone, never think of going any where, or doing any thing about which you could not ask and expect the consent and approbation of your parents, and the blessing of the God who made you.

O——A.

New York, Nov. 19, 1842.

THE VAIN GIRL.

We sometimes think we are more the objects of attention than we really are; and it is our vanity that leads us to think so. Thus it happened in the case of Ellen B.

On one lovely summer day, I was walking with this little girl in our garden. She was very neatly, and, moreover, she thought, very prettily dressed; but above all she carried a parasol in her hand, and this parasol Ellen thought made her look very grand indeed!

Well, we walked on; and I tried to draw her attention, in a simple way, to better things and nobler objects; but she was so engrossed by herself and what she thought was her elegant appearance, that she felt little inclination to listen to instruction. As I could not get her to attend, I began seriously to think on the pride of the human heart: when a coach, with a great number of passengers, whirled rapidly past as we were standing at the garden gate. As soon as it was gone, Ellen turned round to me. 'Oh, dear!' said she, "did not you see how all the people on the coach looked at me?" No doubt she concluded that she was admired, and she drew up her head and walked more on tiptoe, and held her parasol still higher!—Just then she turned down a walk, and I could not help looking after her with pity. Poor thoughtless child! she passed on with a mincing step, holding up her parasol in one hand, as though the whole world was gazing at her: in her other hand she held a fan, which no doubt added a little to her self-estimation. I thought to myself that the hollyhock blooming near her was finer, and Flora, who ran barking beside her, was far happier than she. I had not observed any of the passengers on the coach gazing on my companion. I dare say they had other business and more important concerns to engage their attention, than thinking of a child at the gate who carried a parasol!

The reader may learn from this little circumstance that the heart is proud, self-elated, and deceitful above all things. I pray you guard it well. Was Jesus Christ vain and high-minded? No. And if we have the mind of Christ, we shall constantly seek to be more and more humble. "Before honor is humility, and a haughty spirit is before a fall." We are too apt to think ourselves of great account, and then if every body does not pay us due respect, we are offended. "Learn of me," said our blessed Redeemer, "for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest to your souls." If your limbs are well formed, God has made them so; to him be all the glory. If the roses of health and beauty bloom upon your cheeks, God has placed them there; and it should humble you to reflect that, when he pleases, they will wither away. Have you good understandings, be grateful to God, for he gave them. Have you comfortable clothing, be thankful, but not vain; for the tulip and the butterfly are more gaily decked than you can possibly be. What then have we, any of us, to glory in? Let us never forget that in the sight of God we are sinners; surely this thought ought to keep us humble, and send us continually to the cross of Christ, that by believing in him our sins may be pardoned, and our souls saved. O, let us seek more and more to be nothing in our own esteem, and not think of ourselves more highly than we ought to think. For he that exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, December 14, 1842.

☞Some of that WOOD, now, if you please ?

Ourself.

We have never claimed the privilege of speaking of our personal affairs or conduct in the Register. We have now but one word to say, and that is for the information of some of our readers who might otherwise be misled. Our conduct has been misrepresented, and our language misstated, in a public print. Supposing it to have been an oversight in the Editor, we forwarded an explanation, which was published, but headed with editorial remarks more offensive than the former article. Having once made an honest and true statement to the Editor, denying the charges laid, we do not feel called upon to controvert the matter further. Our reason is this; that we have adopted the motto of Lord Bacon, which some one has versified nearly as follows :

A decent, honest, well-bred man
Will not insult me, and no other can.

Here we leave the matter with our readers and with those who have assailed us.

"If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar."

In these days of rebuke and blasphemy, of change and innovation, the church is liable to become corrupted through the influence of ignorant or designing men. Among professed Christians may be found an abundance of zeal and untiring efforts to build up particular sects ; and to much extent, if we may judge from the fruits, has a zeal for God and the conversion of souls been superseded by anxiety to increase the numbers and wealth of a sect. So far has this misguided zeal extended itself, that members have been received into churches without the scriptural evidence of a change of heart. Those who act a prominent part in this labor, are by no means sparing of their denunciations of other Christian professors, and it is not uncommon to find them exercising the most determined opposition and hatred to those of a different faith.

Causes, very slight in themselves, sometimes call out the hatred of some who sustain important places in the church ; and we doubt not that many whose observation has been less than our own, have witnessed a change from apparent warmth of love to the most unrelenting hatred in such a person when external circumstances have changed. Will one who loves God and his cause allow a reversion in his feelings and conduct when external circumstances have changed ? And will he use any or all of his energies to defame and injure the character of a brother or a church ? The strength of Christian love is above the reach of worldly matters. It is stronger than personal interests,& cannot change with the changes of time and place. A Christian cannot hate a child of God nor a church of God. His soul may grieve over an aberration from the right way of the Lord, but his hatred can not be called forth into an effort to injure and defame. If a man love God he must of necessity love the children of God. If he hate the children of God it is a sure evidence that he does not love God. Mark that man who makes use of every means in his power to vilify and injure the character and influence of any Christian.—He has not the love of God in his heart, and has either never known and felt the divine and peaceful influence of the Spirit of God in his soul, or he has so estranged himself from God as to lose sight of the true character of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Remember the Poor.

In almost every community there are those who need assistance and who, perhaps, are suffering for the necessary comforts of life. Poverty is not always the result of imprudence or mismanagement.—There may be honest, virtuous persons who are suffering from misfortunes that could not be avoided by them. The sympathies of human nature, as also the principles of the gospel, demand an attention to the interests of such persons. Let those who have in abundance, or who are supplied with things needful for comfort, remember that it is God who has supplied them, and that they are only stewards of what they have. Let them remember the poor, the widow and the fatherless, and as God has made them comfortable, so let them extend supplies and comforts to the needy and afflicted.

We shall not apologize for the small amount of original matter in this week's paper. We have several reasons for being so laconic ourself, but we know not what is the matter with our correspondents.

The President's Message has arrived too late for insertion in this weeks paper. The Express thinks it a well written document, and thinks it will do us no discredit at home or abroad.

News of the Day.

From the Frankfort Correspondence of the Britannia.

CONSPIRACY TO MURDER THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA AND THE KING OF PRUSSIA.

All England will be startled and horrified at this announcement. It is but too true. It comes from a source which defies contradiction. The grand day of the nuptial jubilee at St. Petersburg had nearly proved a day of deep and dreadful mourning. Under Divine Providence, the terrible calamity was averted only by the wonderful presence of mind of the King of Prussia. From the very first moment that the Emperor of Russia resolved upon promulgating the ukase which has redeemed millions of slaves from the chains of their tyrants, the nobles became enraged against him to the utmost pitch of exasperation, and entered into a dark and widely-spread conspiracy to take his life upon the first opportunity that might present itself. Believing that the emancipation of the serfs had been earnestly recommended to the Emperor by the King of Prussia, they determined that the latter great and good monarch should perish at the same moment with their sovereign. With the fixed and fell purpose of carrying their atrocious project into execution, they waited with impatience for the hour which was to bring both monarchs together, amidst the acclamation of hundreds of thousands.

In the meantime the Emperor received private information of their diabolical design ; but concealing it from his illustrious brother-in-law, he ordered that the chiefs of the conspiracy should be seized and sent off to Siberia. His orders were promptly executed, but this only served to increase the number of murderous villains who had previously doomed him to death, and decided that he ought never to have been permitted to live, unless as the passive instrument of their will. Looking forward to the 25th of July (O. S.) as their ides of March, they prepared to muster in overwhelming numbers on that day, caring not whether they deluged the streets of St. Petersburgh with blood, provided they shed the blood of their intended victim.—The signal for slaughter was to be given at a late hour of the day, when all their forces should have assembled. Meanwhile the Emperor, being accurately informed of all their proceedings and machinations, throughout his European dominions, adopted every possible precaution to guard against danger so awfully imminent.

He ordered to the capital all those troops on whose fidelity he thought he could rely, and removed to a considerable distance those whom he distrusted. He quadrupled the number of his body guards, selecting his augmentation from corps of tried and devoted loyalty. By this time the King of Prussia was on his way to St. Petersburg ; and scarcely had his Majesty landed on the shores of the Neva, when he could perceive, from his reception, the envenomed feelings of prejudice and hatred which the nobles had excited against him. Hastening on to the palace of Peterhoff with all possible speed, he resolved to go back to his own country with as little delay as decency would permit, being impatiently anxious to escape from a rude, barbarous, and inhospitable land. There is no doubt, however, that fearing the worst, he was prepared to be continually upon his guard.

The interchange of domestic and affectionate regards between him and the members of the Imperial family were short and abrupt on this account. But it was deemed politic that, at any risks, a public demonstration of family union and family happiness should be made upon a scale of unprecedented grandeur. The Prussian monarch, however, was immoveably resolved that the time which his part in the pageant was to occupy should not exceed one short hour !

Leaving the palace of Peterhoff amidst compact masses of faithful guards, both cavalry and infantry, their imperial majesties arrived in the great square of St. Petersburgh at a much earlier hour than those who were intent upon their destruction were led to expect. The admirable foresight of the King of Prussia thus disconcerted all the plans of the conspirators ;—for while they thought the grand scenes of the day were about to commence, they were nearly all over. The monarch embraced each other in the midst of the grand square with evident emotion—the troops presenting arms, and peals of artillery resounding in all directions, as well from the land side as from the shipping in the Neva.

The guards were then put through some few evolutions, but in no instance so as to interfere with the compactness of their lines, and immediately afterward their Majesties returned in safety to Peterhoff, which was, in all respects, converted into a strong garrison, while every spot of ground around it was covered with the imperial guards, and all the staunchest troops of the line occupied all the principal streets of St. Petersburg. In the mean time, as the hour for giving the signal approached, the conspirators were seen advancing in separate detachments towards the spot where they were to act—a vast united host; but the force opposed to them being overwhelming, they were obliged to disperse in various directions, however, before they gave convincing proofs that among the Russian nobles and their adherents are to be found thousands of the most ferocious and bloodthirsty savages in the universe.

Thus ended the grand jubilee of the imperial marriage! Having providentially escaped from the hands of the noble assassins, the King of Prussia lost not a moment in making arrangements for his final departure from their abominable country. He conferred several marks of distinguished favor on the principal officers of the imperial household, and most munificently rewarded certain persons who were the first to apprise him of his danger, and to suggest to him the means of guarding against it. On quitting the imperial palace, never more to enter it, his Majesty traveled with the greatest possible rapidity until he reached Kœnigsburg, the capital of his hereditary dominions, where he was received with reiterated acclamations.

The Lynch Murder in Alabama.—The Hartford Review of Saturday states, on the authority of a letter from the scene of the tragedy, that warrants have been issued for the arrest of all the parties concerned in the hanging of George W. Lore, and that the sheriff has orders to raise a sufficient force to ensure their capture. The letter also says that one of the Mitchells, who were the accusers of Mr. Lore, is strongly suspected of the murder of Blake, for which Lore was three times tried.—Com. Adv.

Bustle Chair.—One of our ingenious cabinet makers, says the New York Aurora, has invented what he calls the 'Bustle Chair ;" being a chair with a cavity in the back, sufficient to contain a lady's bustle of the ordinary size ; he thinks this preferable to extending the seat ; one or the other he thinks must be done. "Sitin" on the edge of the chair he thinks to be unlady-like.

Dueling.—The Secretary of the Navy, in reply to a letter in relation to the recent duel at Burlington, says : "I look with as much abhorrence as any one upon the practice of dueling, and shall be pleased to know that the civil power has acted on the offenders in question. As a military offence, it has engaged my serious attention, and I trust that it may be ultimately suppessed in the Navy."

The N. O. Picayune says, "One of our friends, in a punning epistle, declares it is no harm to pick a painter's pocket, because he pict-ures ?"

A manufactory of delft-ware is in successful operation in Alton, Ill., under the supintendence of Mr. Thomas Croxton, late of England. The ware is said to be of a superior quality.

The editor of a western newspaper thus introduces some verses :—"The poem published this week, was composed by an esteemed friend, who has lain in his grave many years, merely for his own amusement."

Hints For the Times.—"No man can ever borrow himself out of debt : if you wish for relief, you must work for it. You must make more and spend less than you did while you were running in debt. You must ware homespun instead of broadcloth, drink water instead of champagne, and rise at four instead of seven. Industry, frugality, economy—these are the handmaids of wealth. and the sure means of relief. A dollar earned is worth ten borrowed, a dollar saved is worth forty times its amount in worthless gewgaws. Try this scheme—it is much better than to depend upon bank favors, and a thousand times more honorable than to resort to the bankrupt laws."

A Bear Scrape.—On Saturday, the 1st of the current month, a son of Mr. Robert McDonald, of Earl town, (not far from Pictou) was sent to examine a potatoe field to ascertain if any cattle had broken into it. After proceeding about twenty rods from the house, he was attacked by a she bear with four cubs. The bear immediately seized him and threw him violently on the ground. As soon as he rose again she struck him and he fell. When he rose the second time he attempted to strike her with a small stick, but she caught him and tore his head fearfully and he was prostrated a third time. Providentially, at this critical moment some cubs withdrew her attention from the boy, who seized the opportunity and sprung over a fence near which the event occurred. The bear instantly followed, but when she alighted on the fence it gave way under her, and before she could recover, the boy happily effected his escape. When he arrived at the nearest house, he was literally covered with blood and not a shred of his clothing remained except the collar of his shirt. For some time his life was despaired of, but now sanguine hopes of his recovery are entertained.—Pictou Mechanic and Farmer.

The Grand Jury of New Castle county closed their labors on Wednesday afternoon last, after having been arduously engaged for ten days, (the longest session ever held in this county,) and finishing a large amount of business. We understand that between thirty and forty true bills were found against persons for illegal voting.—Delaware State Journal.

Steamboat Eliza.—The New Orleans Bulletin of the 23d ult. says—"We hear that upon cutting into the steamboat Eliza, sunk a few weeks ago, near the mouth of the Ohio, two cabin passengers were found with their hands grasping the handles of their trunks. It has not hitherto been supposed that any cabin passengers perished, save Capt. Littleton's wife and child. One of the passengers on that boat, whom we conversed with yesterday, computes that nearly sixty lives were lost !"

A Good Example.—The Lieutenants of the Marine Barracks in Charlestown Navy Yard, have circulated a pledge of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks, among the men under their charge, to which their own names were first attached, and have procured the signatures of nearly all in the barracks—Boston Mail.

The Directors of the Bunker Hill Monument Association have invited Mr. Webster to deliver an Address at the celebration of the completion of the monument, on the 17th of June next, and that gentleman has accepted the invitation.

Remedy for Frozen Hydrants.—Having discovered that the hydrants of many of my neighbors are a little frozen, at least so much as to impede the water from running which is very inconvenient these cold mornings, if they will hold a basin of boiling water to the nossel of the hydrant and steam it, it will open without any further exertion.—Harrisburg Reporter.

Land Sales.—The settlers in the Iowa Territory are about to petition the President to postpone the land sales in that district, until next June. Aside from the objections that they are now appointed to take place in the most inclement season of the year, it is said that scarcely a tenth of the settlers will be able to raise sufficient money to purchase their claims.

A lady asked a clergyman if she might pay attention to dress and fashion without being proud. "Madam," replied the minister, "whenever you see the tail of a fox out of a hole, you may be sure the fox is there also."

Discovery of Large Bones.—A discovery of bones of the defunct mastodon have recently been made at a lick about two miles from Warsaw, Mo., which exceed, in number and size, any yet discovered. The bones were found two or three feet below the surface, embeded in a black gravel.—The number of different heads found, amounts to seventy or eighty, and the large amount of detached teeth shows that a greater number of these monsters have found a common grave in this basin. The skeletons of various species of animals are found deposited in this basin—as the buffalo, elk, deer, &c.

Witness rejected for Atheism.—In the course of the trial of the case, Barnard vs Tileston, before the Court of Common Pleas, holden in this town last week, a witness was objected to on the ground of his alleged disbelief in the existence of a Supreme Being, and in a future state of existence—and several credible witnesses testified to his repeated declarations of such disbelief. On the other hand, in order to counteract this testimony, it was proved that the proposed witness was a member of the Congregational Church in Williamsburgh, in regular standing, and that he had constantly attended the ordinances ! Judge Allen, however, regarding the case as a clear one, rejected him.—Northampton Courier.

An order from the War Department prescribes that after to-day the allowance to officers of the Army, and also for their servants, for traveling shall not exceed the actual cost, at the usual rates. Porterage may be included, but not board, nor the extra expense of taking a circuitous route.

The New-York Bible Society has been the means of distributing 10,000 Bibles or New Testaments during the past year.—Receipts $5,800, being about $3000 less than last year. This decrease is attributed to the pressure of the times.

Somnambulism.—A few nights ago, a young woman in this town got up in her sleep, and, with a pair of scissors, cut off the whole of her ringlets, and retired to bed again without being conscious of what she had done. What is more remarkable, she had taken more than usual pains with her hair the night before.—Bradford Herald.

Land Distribution.—The Distribution Act of the extra session was in force during the half year ending June 30, 1842, and the National Executive, as has been previously noticed, has made preparation to distribute the amount to which each state is respectively entitled. The gross proceeds of the land sales for that time, was $837,216 70, and the amount of the various allowances, expenses, &c., to be deducted before distribution, was $275,072 52, leaving the sum of $562 144 18 to be divided among the states and territories.

The Pennsylvanian contains the following table, carefully prepared at the General Land Office, giving the amount to which each State and territory is entitled :

Fire Extraordinary.—About 6 o'clock yesterday morning, some mischievous person or persons fired the hollow trunk of the tree fronting the south gate at the entrance to the Park, which has stood the "peltings of the pitiless storm" for years. A few buckets of Old Croton extinguished the fire—but of course the tree is destroyed.—N. Y. Amer.

The Daniel Boon of the Press.—The Editor of the Washingtonian, a temperance paper published at Canton, Ohio, gives the following glowing description of Mr. Pike, a former partner of his, but now editor of the Circleville Watchman:

"Mr. Pike and I published a newspaper in 1837 among the Miami Indians, in the state of Indiana. It was a great partnership, that. We had two advance paying subscribers, one of whom liquidated his subscription with white beans, and the other with sawlogs. Godfroy the chief took five copies and couldn't read a word. Our paper was called the Peru Forester, which being printed in the woods, that title was appropriate.

The town of Peru had many magnificent names for its streets, such as Pearl, Broadway, &c. which streets exhibited the animating and bustling spectacle of stumps, trees, and weeds as high as a man's head. The stirring events which transpired in this interesting city imperiously demanded a couple of chroniclers, and Pike and I were at hand to discharge that important function.

Pike wrote poetry, and I dipped considerably into State politics, and discussed in a learned manner, every question of interest to the few settlers and Indians. Pike was a queer fish. He had more irons in the fire than I ever knew. Besides being an editor and printer, he kept the Broadway Hotel, was postmaster, justice of the peace, land agent, pettifogger, canal contractor, merchant, overseer of the poor, painter, had been a school master, and a day laborer, was brought up a Quaker, was twice a widower, and the last time I saw him was a Baptist, had his third wife, and was on another! Most wonderful versatility! A Caleb Quotem in real life! And now he is editor of the Circleville Watchman. Who more fitted than he to control the press, or furnish his readers with profound disquisitions upon matters and things in general? Who more capable than he to write a voluminous desertation upon miscellaneous small things? Success attend thee, friend Pike."

Mr. Pike says that the above statement of Dr. A. W. Baker, 'in chief,' is nearly correct, and thanks him kindly for the complimentary part of the article. Go ahead!—a Pike is a greedy fish and swallows every thing which comes in his way.

Revolutionary Anecdote.—It is well remembered that a reward of £500 was offered for John Hancock. When he signed the Declaration of Independence, he dashed it with a bold hand in a conspicuous manner, and rose from his seat pointing to it and exclaimed, "There! John Bull can read my name without spectacles. He may double his reward, and [illegible]"

When I asked Mr. Adams in November, 1820, [illegible] Stephen Hopkins the Quaker patriot from Rhode Island, who had been afflicted with a paralytic stroke. Mr. Adams acted as his amanuensis and asked him if he should sign his name to the Declaration of Independence for him he replied, "No! I will sign it myself—if we are hung for signing it, you shall not be hung for signing it for me."

Mr. Adams, then in imitation of Hopkins, took his pen, clasped his wrist with his left hand, went through the tremulous motion of signing his name, and in the language of Hopkins, emphatically said, "If my hand trembles, John Bull will find my heart won't!" which Mr. Adams said electrified all Congress and made the most timid firm in their purpose.

Portland, Nov. 23.—Sentence was awarded yesterday in the cases of the prisoners found guilty of adultery, as follows: Edward Blackstone of Portland, four years in the state prison; James Walker, Jr. of Poland, two years in the state prison; Mary Ann Dean [illegible] Polly [illegible] each ten months in the county's house of correction.

The Treasurer of New Jersey, Mr. Southard, has received from the Federal Government the dividend of the sales of the public domain for the six months ending in June last, amounting to $13,[illegible]. The proceeds of the sales from June to Aug. 30th when the Distribution was suspended by a clause in the new tariff bill, will be divided in January. The share of this sale will probably not exceed three or four thousand dollars.—[illegible] Day Adv.

The Delaware State Journal of Tuesday last, informs us that the Grand Jury of New Castle county have found true bills against Col. Webb, Mr. Marshall, and their associates for a violation of the laws of Delaware in relation to dueling.—Evening Journal.

Mail to Texas.—Several papers forwarded to a person in Galveston, by way of New Orleans, have been returned from New Orleans for want of payment of postage. This notice may be of use to those who have occasion to communicate by mail with Texas.—Boston Adv.

We learn from the Little Rock Gazette that the police of that city are still making arrests. Some apprehensions have been entertained that an attempt would be made by the friends and accomplices of those persons committed to prison, to rescue them. The citizens are arming and organizing themselves for the conflict. All loafers, blacklegs, vagabonds, &c., are warned to keep away from that place. It is feared they will have the Vicksburgh tragedy acted again The band who have been committing the forgeries and robberies is supposed to be very extensive, and to be connected from Texas to Maine with others fully as desperate as themselves.—Buff. Com. Adv.

Western Rail Road.—The receipts last week were nearly $11,000. The Directors of the road have established the fare from Boston to Albany at six dollars, instead of five, which has been the rate during the past summer.

The Execution.—The execution of David Douglass has just taken place within the walls of the new jail in this village, pursuant to his sentence.

The gallows were erected in the space way between the entrance door and the end of the tier of cells. It consisted of two upright posts—connected by a beam at the top. On the outside of the upright posts ropes with two 56's attached run on pulleys over the ends of the transvere beam and through a mortice hole in the centre of it, where they are connected with the tie rope—the position of the criminal being on the floor underneath. A lever for withdrawing the supports which held up the weights at a distance of several feet from the floor completed the array of machinery for the work of death.

Within a few minutes of two o'clock, the prisoner, clad in his grave habiliments, was led to his position under the gallows, and commended to God in prayer, by Rev. Mr. Carty. Rising from his knees, Douglas then addressed a few words to the spectators, affirming that he and the man he was to suffer for, were good friends—he had no spirit of animosity against Cunningham, and did not intend to take his life.—He said that he forgave all men—that he had been treated kindly by the Sheriff, Mr. Stone—that his counsel, Messrs. Carter and Hunt, had also been very kind in what they had done for him without pecuniary reward. He closed by reiterating his denial that he had any intention of killing Cunningham.

The moment he concluded, the rope was adjusted—the cap drawn over his face, and a remark that he had but a moment to live, the Sheriff pulled the rope attached to the lever—the weights fell—the prisoner was suddenly drawn up, and passed beyond the reach of human tribunals to his last account. After hanging some twenty minutes, the body was cut down, and conveyed to the Cold Spring Cemetery for burial.

The appearance of the prisoner was up to the last moment cool and self-possessed. Not a sign of fear was discoverable. From the moment of his sentence his conduct had been variable—at times manifesting a spirit of penitence, and then relapsing into the most hardened obstinacy. The evening before his execution he made an attempt to hang himself, and from his whole demeanor there is too much reason for apprehending that he met his fate an unrelenting man.

As it is the first so may it be the last execution in our county.—Niagara Cour.

An Explosion.—Yesterday afternoon a portion of the pipe used for conveying the Croton water through Canal street, between Greenwich and Washington streets, on the north side, exploded with so much force as to throw up the pavement and the earth, from the line of the pipe to the surface, and to form a hole of about eight or ten feet square by five deep. Indeed the whole of the pavement, for about six feet in extent from the place where the pipe burst, appears to be loosened, and in one place, some distance from where the main damage was done, the stones have sunk down as if something had collapsed between them. The water rushed out with great force, and some damage was done to the cellars of the three houses next to Greenwich street by the overflow. The inhabitants of the vicinity were much alarmed, fearing that the water would occasion extensive injury to their stores or dwellings, but the supply was soon shut off, and it will not take a very large sum to compensate for the damage by the flood.—Commercial.

Sir Walter Scott and a Scotch Blacksmith.—It happened at a small country town that Scott suddenly required medical advice for one of his servants, and on inquiring if there was any doctor at that place, he was told there were two, one long established and the other a new comer. The latter gentleman being luckily found at home, soon made his appearance; [illegible] attired in black, with a shovel hat, in whom to his utter astonishment, Sir Walter recognised a Scotch blacksmith, who had formerly practised with tolerable success, and as a veterinary operator in the neighborhood of Ashestiel. 'How, in the world!' exclaimed he, 'can it be possible that this is John Lundie?' 'In troth is't, your honor; just a' that of him.' 'Well but let us hear; you were a horse doctor before; now it seems that you are a man doctor; how do you get on?' 'Oh, just extraordinar, weel; for your honor maun ken my practice is vera sure and orthodox. I depend entirely upon twa simples.' 'And what may their names be? Perhaps it is a secret.' 'I'll tell your honor,' (in a low tone) 'my twa simples are just laudamy and calomy.'—'Simples with a vengeance!' replied Scott. 'But John, do you never happen to kill any of your patients?' 'Kill? Ou ay, may be sae! whilst they die, and whilst no; but its the will of Providence. Ony how, your honor, it wad be lang before it makes up for the Flodden!'—Reminiscences of Sir Walter Scott.

Buffalo, Nov. 25.—The Grand Jury, recently in session here, have found bills against some of our bank men in relation to the frauds practiced whilst the institutions were under their charge ; but they are prominent men amongst us. I suppose we must keep mum for the present, lest, forsooth, their reputations should be injured.—Corres. of Roch. Dem.

Bible Anniversary.—On the 24th ult., the anniversary of the Jersey City Bible Society was held in the Methodist Episcopal Church in that place. T. Edwards, Esq., presided. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. Mr. Goddard, of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Brooklyn; Samuel A Foot, Esq., of New York, and the Rev. Messrs. Brigham and Janes, Secretaries of the American Bible Society.

Equestrian Portrait of Washington.—Mr. Sully has just completed an equestrian portrait of Washington of the full size of life. The artist, in his picture, has represented the Father of his Country in the act of reviewing a body of troops. He has wisely adopted Stewart's likeness, which is the one now universally acknowledged. Washington is mounted on a fine bay horse, with his chapeaux in his right hand, with his arm extended. The attitude is at once dignified and commanding. In the distance on the right of the picture, a detachment of Artillerymen in the Continental uniform, are employed in firing a salute—on the opposite side, part of a column of troops are seen marching to the rear, the front of the column being hidden from view by a rising ground in the middle of the picture. Taken altogether, we think this work is calculated to increase Mr. Sully's justly well established reputation as one of the best artists in this country. We understand that there is some probability that the Legislature of North Carolina may become the possessors of this excellent picture. We learn that it will be exhibited at Sully and Earle's Gallery in the course of a few days, when we shall take occasion to recur again to the subject.—Phila. North Amer.

The unknown nation of Central America, of which Mr. Stephens received some intimation during his first visit to the celebrated ruins of our Continent, is also spoken of by the French traveler Wardeck.—Mr. Norman thus speaks of the reports concerning it in his recent work on Yucatan and the ancient ruin:—

"There is a district of country situated between Guatamala, Yucatan, and Chiapas. that has never yet been subdued. This section is surrounded by mountains, and is said to be inaccessible, except by one way, and that not generally known. No one yet, who has had the boldness to follow the inhabitants to their wild retreat, has ever returned to render an account of his journey.

"The inhabitants are represented as speaking the Mays and Tcholo languages, and many of them as conversing well in Spanish. From the latter circumstance, they are enabled to visit the nearest cities, sell their tobacco, the principal article they cultivate, and afterwards return to their retreat. They are constituted of the Lacadrones and other savage tribes; they are expert warriors, remarkably athletic and very cruel. They are worshipers of idols and their religious ceremonies are said to have undergone little or no change."

"Palenque is in the neighborhood of this settlement; and Waldeck, who says he has conversed with some of these people, understood that they had white persons among them—but whether they stay voluntarily, or are detained as prisoners, he has not mentioned.

"The same nation is spoken of by Mr. Stephens. Their number is estimated at thirty thousand; their secluded mode of life makes it almost impossible to arrive at any thing like correct impressions respecting them. The Indians of Yucatan and the neighboring provinces have been seen in conversation with persons from this district; they, however, appear to know as little of the people of whom I speak as others. Could a friendly intercourse, by any possibility, be established with this surprising country, there is scarcely a doubt that a complete knowledge of the former inhabitants of the immense ruins scattered throughout the provinces would be revealed. That their temples and records remain in safety, and are capable of speaking to posterity, there can scarcely be a question.

"I doubt if the above be a true estimate of their numbers, since they have been enabled to sustain themselves for ages (no one knows how long,) against enemies and intestine wars and dissolution. It would be more reasonable to suppose that they are the outcast Pelasgi of some invading nation, and the remnants of power that once defended those wasted towns that now lie a huge mass of scattered ruins.—The gathered fragments of Palenque, and other conquered places of equal importance, may have concentrated their broken strength within the boundaries of these hills, and under the strong impulse of desperation, they may have preserved their nationality of defiance of all the force that surrounded them.

"It may well excite universal astonishment, when the fact becomes known, that there actually exists, within a territory of five hundred miles, a distinct people, that have governed themselves for ages, and that they continue to do so without assistance or protection. It would be a lesson to mankind to ascertain how they have managed their self-governing principles, and how they have preserved their national individuality. Three centuries have transpired since the conquest: and, if neither Yankee nor Irishman have found his way among the Lacadrones before this, it deserves the careful consideration both of the psychologist and the statesman."

More Villainy on the Rail Road.—We learn that on last Thursday morning, as the cars had got just beyond Saco, some obstructions were discovered. The train was stopped, and they were found to be two planks and a log placed several rods apart. On one of the posts, at a crossing, was a written notice that these obstructions would continue until the Company paid certain workmen on the road, who had been defrauded by a sub-contractor, and also settled fairly for certain land through which the track extends in Biddeford. Until then, the notice said, passengers would travel at the peril of their lives.

We presume the directors will take immediate measures to ferret out these wretches. If it is suffered to pass by without attention, their next annual dividend will be very small.—Portland Amer.

Sentence of the Prize Fighters—White Plains, Saturday morning.—Judge Ruggles this morning passed the sentence of the law on the parties convicted of manslaughter in causing the death of Thomas Mc Coy, as follows:

James Sullivan alias Yankee Sullivan to the State Prison for two years.

John McCluskey to the County Jail for eight months, and to pay the sum of $500.

James Kensett to the County Jail for four months and to pay a fine of $200.

Watson Simmons, the negro who was convicted of an assault on a farmer's daughter, to the State Prison for five years.

Albert Hamilton, convicted of burglary, to the State Prison for five years.

The Court then adjourned.

Escape of a Prisoner.—On Tuesday last, as officer Wilkinson, of this village, was proceeding to Poughkeepsie, having a prisoner in charge, who had been committed to await his trial, on a charge of breaking open and robbing the store of B. Pugsley, near Mattewan, made his escape when within a mile of the jail. Although he had his arms pinioned, and had been searched, he threw himself from the wagon and by means of a knife which he had concealed in his shoe, cut the cord and made off. Upon being pursued, he kept those in pursuit at bay by a volley of stones. He calls himself Mat Tillotson, is an old offender, and had been out of the State prison but about six weeks, whither he had been sent for a similar offense committed in our village. He is about 23 years of age, middle size, dark complexion, much marked with the small pox, which he recently had, and has a very downcast look. He had on a fustian jacket and pantaloons, coarse shirt, and a brown cloth cap. The public will do well to be on the alert.—Fishkill Standard.

Closing Ports against the United States.—The Chronicle, published at St. John, N. B., calls upon the press of Canada to agitate the importance on the part of Great Britain, of closing the West India ports against the commerce of the United States, as a retaliatory measure for their increase of duties on British manufactures, and as a compensation to the Colonies for their partial loss of the timber trade. "The British Americans," says the Chronicle, "are both by climate, fertility, and geographical position, admirably calculated to supply not only the West Indies, but the Parent State, with provisions, flour and fish, in any quantities that may be required, and it only requires to be made apparent to the British Government, to have it so arranged. To those conversant with the flour trade, it is well known that a very great portion of the flour shipped from New York is the produce of Upper Canada, and is there sold as the production of the United States."

Late from Jamaica.—By the arrival on Sunday night of the British barque Corsair, Capt. Daly, we have files of Kingston papers as late as the 10th inst.

The Legislature of the Island is in session; but the business before it is of a local nature.

The Governor General, the Earl of Elgin, was laboring under an attack of chills and fever.

The parties who participated in what is called the "Myal delusion" have been tried, convicted, and duly punished. This Myal delusion was a religious excitement, got up on the Mormon or Miller system.

The Island throughout is now tranquil. Trade remains dull, and money is scarce; they speak of establishing a national bank on colonial principles—an institution which would advance further business facilities on the hypothecation of bona fide property. The sugar planting interests complain that the taxes press onerously on them. They call for, and say the altered state of things demand, a more equitable distribution of them among the several other classes of society.—N. O. Pic.

The Morning Star, published at Cincinnati, relates the following anecdote of a young gentleman of the South, who had expended a large fortune,—money, lands, negroes—every thing in a course of intemperance and profligacy. He had just paid a last year's grog bill of $800. One day he was walking in the street very leisurely, when seeing a physician on the opposite side, he called out to him, saying he wanted him to come over. 'Doctor,' said he, 'I wish you'd just take a look down my throat.' 'I don't discover any thing, sir,' said the doctor after looking very carefully. 'You don't! said he, why that's strange! will you be kind enough, sir, to give me another look?' 'Really, sir,' said the doctor, after a second look, 'I don't see any thing.' 'Not? why, doctor, there is a farm, ten thousand dollars, and twenty negroes gone down there.'

The Observatory, &c.—We have before us a copy of the plan adopted by the Secretary of the Navy for the buildings which are soon to be erected as a branch of that department of the public service, to serve as a depot in which to deposite for preservation its charts and scientific instruments. This is the language of the act of Congress describing the appropriation for this building, which, is, however, substantially an appropriation for the erection of an observatory for the assistance and improvement of nautical science, as well as a depository of charts, &c. The drawing before us represents the main building as a substantial edifice, of the Ionic order of architecture, and of the dimensions of fifty feet square, surmounted by a spacious dome. Attached to the building are two wings, each eighteen feet wide by twenty-five feet long, which with the dome, are designed for the Observatories. It is also intended, as we learn, to build at the same time a Magnetic Observatory, to be modeled after the one at Dublin. These buildings, when completed, will be an additional ornament to our city. The site assigned by the President for their location is University Square, usually known as Camp Hill, and the excavation necessary to their commencement is to be completed without delay, so as to facilitate their erection in the spring. Mr. Bird, of this city, is the contractor for the work, which is to be done under the superintendence of Lieut. J. M. Gillies, of the Navy.—Nat. Intel.

Length of Rail Roads in the United States.—The following summary of the aggregate length of Rail Roads completed and in operation in the United States will be found very nearly correct:—

New Jersey,	204
Pennsylvania, (about)	700
Delaware.	49
Maryland,	331
Virginia,	350

Georgia,	350
Alabama,	61
Florida,	32
Louisiana,	76
Mississippi,	66
Kentucky,	60
Ohio,	73
Indiana,	28
Michigan,	226
Total,	4,442

A large number of miles already graded and nearly ready for the iron rails, on roads in various sections of the country, are not included in this statement. Probably 590 or 600 miles may be expected to be completed in one or two years and added to the above amount, which already exceeds the total length of rail roads in all other countries combined. The cost, so far, is at least one hundred million of dollars. Nearly all the iron for these roads has been imported from England, costing probably twelve or thirteen millions of dollars.

A Child recovered from the Indians.—A party of Kickapoos brought into Fort Gibson, a few days ago, a boy about ten years old, which they say they purchased from the Cumanches, giving three hundred dollars for him. He could not speak a word of English. The little fellow's sisters were still in possession of the Cumanches, and arrangements were making to obtain them.—St. Louis New Era.

Important Application of Mesmerism.—The efficacy of this agent in important surgical operations has at last been tested in a case of amputation of the leg, performed last Saturday week by Mr. Ward, surgeon, Ollerton, near Workshop, and with the most successful result. The patient, a man, had previously been mesmerized by a gentleman from York, of high standing in the legal profession, whose humanity on this occasion entitles him to the highest credit, and he succeeded in rendering him perfectly insensible to the pain of perhaps one of the severest operations to which mankind can be subjected. On being questioned afterwards, he stated that all the sensation he had was an indistinct recollection of having heard a crash, but he had felt no pain or inconvenience. He was mesmerized, and kept in a state of somnolence during the night, when roused next morning seemed quite refreshed, and going on very well. At the first dressing he was again mesmerized, and was perfectly unconscious during the course of it, and by the last accounts was going on very favorably. The case has naturally excited great interest in that part of the country, as it has opened up quite a new era in the medical profession.—Sheffield Iris, Oct. 29.

Campbell's Estimation of Knighthood.—"The King will knight you," said Anson to Campbell, as they were proceeding to Court. "I kennae use that will be to me," was the reply. "But your lady might like it," said Anson. "Weel, then," rejoined Campbell, "his Majesty may knight her, if he pleases."

TO THE LOCAL AGENTS OF THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

DEAR BRETHREN:—You will observe by the Minutes of the last session of the Society, that we are instructed to exert our utmost to settle up its concerns. Therefore, we would request each of you to do what you can in your several neighborhoods, to ascertain the state of the funds, and collect all that may be due, as far as possible; and transmit what you may thus collect to the Treasurer, Henry C. Hubbard, of Scott, and to give us a correct account of the state of the funds in your hands as soon as possible. We hope that each of you will attend to it without delay; for delays are dangerous. And as S. S. Griswold has been appointed by the Society, to collect its funds where he may travel, it is NECESSARY and EXPECTED, that those who are indebted to the Society, will be punctual and efficient in settling up the same.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

BY VIRTUE of one writ of Fieri Facias, issued out of the Supreme Court of the People of the State of New York, and to me directed and delivered, against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of Adin Burdick, I have levied on, seized, and taken all the right, title, claim and interest, of the said Burdick, of and to the following described pieces of land, on the 24th day of December, 1840 or at any time since, all that certain piece or parcel of land situate in the 18th township, town of Brookfield, county of Madison, being part of lot No. 60 & 69, and bounded as follows. Beginning at the south east corner of lot No. 60, thence west to the south east corner of J. H. Burch's land, thence northerly along said Burch's line and up the creek to Benjamin Burdick's land, thence easterly along said Benjamin's line to S. P. Burdick's land, thence south to the south west corner of said S. P. Burdick's land, thence east to the centre of the highway, thence along said highway to the south east corner of a piece of land on lot No. 69, owned and occupied by Benjamin Burdick, thence east to Jacob Langworthy's land, thence south about 20 rods to the place of beginning, containing about 60 acres of land, be the same more or less. Also, one other piece or parcel of land in the town and county aforesaid, bounded as follows: [illegible] stake near the corner of the mill dam [illegible] ash, thence north 79 degrees, east 11 rods to the road, thence on the road easterly [illegible] stake, thence south 68 degrees, west 19 rods [illegible] thence north 78 degrees, west 16 rods [illegible] of the said lot, thence north 15 degrees, [illegible] rods and 5 links between the barn and shed [illegible] stake, thence north 79 degrees west, 3 1-2 rods, thence north 7 degrees, east 13 rods to a stake at the pond, thence around the pond on the westerly side until it comes to the lands of Oliver Brown at a stake, thence across the creek easterly to a stake on the east bank of said creek, thence down the pond on the easterly bank till it comes to the first mentioned bound, containing 8 acres of land more or less, together with the mills and water privileges thereon and the appurtenances thereto belonging. Also, one other piece or parcel of land, situate in the town and county aforesaid, on which the store stands, bounded, south by the highway, west by Truman Miller's house lot, north by land owned by Roswell P. Dowse, and easterly by the above described piece, supposed to contain one half of an acre of land be the same more or less, together with the buildings thereon, which I shall expose to sale at public vendue, at the inn now kept by Isaac P. Miner, in the village of Leonardsville, town of Brookfield, on the 9th day of January, 1843, at 10 o'clock, A. M.—Dated, Morrisville, Nov. [illegible] 1842.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and traveling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, trouble and expense. The principal advantage to be derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inkstand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents — Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

POETRY.

From the Advocate of Moral Reform.

The Winding up of the Drama.

Friday eve. Nov. 18, 1842.

The sun has set; and set to rise no more
On one around whose infancy and youth,
Were gathered hopes that parents only know.
How strong the yearnings of the Father's heart,
Over the son he nurtured at his side,
In helpless childhood, and in his riper years,
Let Fathers answer! They alone can tell!
Why have the ties of kindred thus been rent!
Why is the mass within this busy mart
So deeply moved! The murderer has fallen!
Has gone with double murder on his soul;
Has gone, to answer in the court of heaven
For crimes unpardoned; follies unforgiven,.
A funeral pall seems mantled round us here,
But there the funeral of the soul is held!
A silent awe, a fearful gloom is felt,
The good, and bad, are led to meditate:
The annals of a life so fraught with guilt,
Teach solemn lessons to the human heart.
Which of the crimes conspicuous on the list,
Before blood-guiltiness became unrolled;
Are unconnected in the life of Colt
With the last outrage that has sealed his doom'
Each had an agency most deeply felt
And the strange act before the closing scene,
Done to retrieve what will wipe away,
Evinces plainly that remorse was there,
And condemnation for those guilty deeds
Outraging virtue; trampling in the dust,
The sacred mandates of the King of kings.
The arm of Justice cannot always sleep;
And when its power is felt, the guilty quake!
How many, guilty as the wretched Colt
In every sense save one,—are round those wal s
Where he has met his fate! But one more step
To the same level as to moral worth.
Young man—beware! If stains are on thy soul
Seen only by His eye who scans the heart;
Add not another. Quick, retrace thy steps!
For thou art near a cataract's fearful edge;
Advance, and thou wilt take the final plunge,
No power in earth or Heaven will hold thee back,
Recede—repent—forsake the evil way
And thou art safe—safe from the fear of ill
With a safe passport to the Port of Peace.

Miscellaneous Department.

"EXERCISE."

The suffering of the man of leisure and the student, for want of exercise, is enormous; and should the diet and bathing be in exact accordance to the laws of nature, failure here will greatly weaken, if not demolish, the whole structure. He who rises at five, and applies cold water and the flesh-brush effectually, yet seats himself by a good coal fire, or pent-up stove, and yawns away the morning, til the breakfast hour, loses a great part of the comforts of life. He knows not what rational enjoyment is. The motionless muscles will flag, and the stupified mind sinks with the body, into a state of inertion, if not into ruin "The virtuous woman," "who rises while it is yet dark, and prepares meat for her household," if that meat be eaten before the household have well exercised, may be the only one who will have a keen zest; and hers the only stomach that is properly fitted for the well prepared meal. The habit of sitting down by the fire, or elsewhere, immediately after rising, should always be avoided. It is never beneficial to mind or body, for the time being, and its consequent evils still more to be dreaded. Let the doating father, while his son is yet tender, inure him to the exhilarating breezes of morning, if he give a healthy tone to the stomach, which will impart a cheerful buoyancy throughout the day. Let the daughter, too, learn, that though her "hands do not take hold of the distaff," they must not be folded in sloth when she has risen in the morning. All animated nature rouses man to activity. The bird as it skims through the air; the frolicksome lamb, and the playful kitten, the bounding fawn; the prancing colt; the fish, that sport in the mighty waters; and even the great leviathan that plays therein, tell us that animated nature, delights in exercise, and receives a greater part of her comforts thereby.

"Great cheerfulness should be cultivated during the hours and moments of exercise."—To exercise for health, with "dull, moping melancholy" for a companion, would be Combe's "solemn march" indeed. The most rigid superstition seldom prohibits a moderate glee in the playful child, and even cultivates in the laughing infant. If this be wrong—if it must be unlearned in maturer years—why allow its first budding in life's young openings? Why not pluck up the baneful weed in its first shootings? What should be the first work of education? Surely, to inculcate such principles as should "grow with the growth and strengthen with the strength;" principles, that are not to be eradicated when ripening to maturity, but reduced to practice when need requires. Who is not more pleased—who is not more benefitted—in the society of the grey headed pilgrim, whose conversation is spiced with the cheerfulness of youth, than with the whining peevishness which is often manifest in old age? If it be a duty to "present the body a living sacrifice," is it not a duty to fit that body to be an active, willing offering, prepared for the highest state of exertion? And can the gloomy hearted man do this? Cheerfulness, then, should be cultivated, till it becomes habitual; till the heart feels a happy content in all the vicissitudes of life; till, alike, in the sunshine and in the storm, it can rejoice, though the "fig-tree does not blossom, and the flocks be cut off from the stall."—Mrs. Nicholson.

Of all thieves, fools and constant visitors are the worst, they rob you of your time and temper.

A TURKISH BATH.

A gentleman, now traveling in the East, writing to the Salem Gazette, gives the following description of a Turkish Bath. They do up the business of cleansing in a thorough manner, certainly.

Afterwards to refresh ourselves from our fatigues we went to the bath. You can have no conception of what a Turkish bath is, nor of the exquisite enjoyment it gives after a hot day's work and severe fatigue; I always take one after a journey and frequently merely for the pleasure of it.

At first you enter a large room, furnished with 'divans' all around it, and in the centre a marble fountain of water; here you undress, and although it is the common room of all who enter, undressing is perfectly decent, for as fast as you remove an article of your inner clothing a man stands by with several large cloths to envelope you. Finally, when all is ready, and yourself wrapped up in two table cloths and a towel round your head, he brings you a pair of wooden shoes to put on, in order that your feet may not be burned by the heat of the floor of the bath. Then leaning on his arm you pass a narrow winding passage into a room filled with steam, the heat of which is such as almost to suffocate you; you stay here a few minutes until you get used to the unusual temperature, and then you pass on to another room, lighted by small round glasses in a dome on the top, which is hotter still; around this are several marble basins of hot water, into which a small stream of hot water is constantly running. You lie down by the side of one of them and in a moment or two the most profuse perspiration breaks forth.

You are left some ten minutes to enjoy this (and it is a luxury) and then a man appears armed with a strong horse hair mitten; with this he rubs every part of your body, rolling off large rolls of cuticle a quarter of an inch in diameter,—after this has continued some ten minutes, he dashes over you several pailsfull of water hot enough to make one scream, and then commences pinching and kneading your flesh—this is perfectly delightful. After this he cracks every joint in your body, beginning with the fingers; he makes every vetebra crack distinctly and then twists your head until he has given your neck half a dozen more cracks also,—strange as it may seem, this operation is decidedly agreeable, though I confess I was startled when I heard my neck go off for the first time. After this is finished he leaves you to repose, and then appears with an immense bowl in which is a piece of perfumed soap, this he works up into a lather by means of a large sponge, and then proceeds to soap you all over with it; he washes it off by dashing hot water over you until you are blinded and almost drowned,—indeed he compels you to cry out for mercy, and does not think his work complete until he has forced you to beg him to desist. This is the end of the washing part, and most thorougholy washed you are. you remain a few minutes more lying on your back in the most delicious state of lassitude that can be imagined.—But your tormentor or operator does not leave you long. He appears bearing on his head a lot of hot clothes, in these he envelopes you and leads you out to the antechamber, which feels now comparatively cold; here you remain a few minutes in order to prepare for going into the outer room, where you have previously undressed; on arriving there dry clothes are again put over you, the damp ones are removed and you repose at full length on a divan; an attendant brings you a cup of coffee and a pipe, and while you enjoy these a boy squeezes and kneads your flesh, while another stands by fanning with a large cloth; under this operation you soon go to sleep, and after sleeping a half hour or so, wake up almost to new life.—You can have no conception of the way a man feels for the first hour after a Turkish bath.

Taking it Coolly.—The editor of the Portland Argus, who is now traveling, was recently in New York city, and thus details a little incident which happened to him there. He is undoubtedly a philosopher:

I arrived here this morning at 7 o'clock. Just as I was stepping off the steamboat Cleopatra, I had my pocket book cut from my inside coat pocket. It had about one hundred dollars in it, together with some papers of no use to any one but the owner. I had carried this book, I presume, more than one hundred thousand miles, in all, during the last twenty years. It had crossed the Alleghany mountains with me nine or ten times, at different points, and had been round them by the way of the lakes once. I saw the rascal that took it on board the boat, I suppose, as he came on from Boston. As usual, when surrounded by a crowd, I kept a cautious lookout. My hand was not off my pocket two seconds, and yet the scoundrel escaped without any one being able to identify him. I felt somewhat mortified at being thus outwitted; but it was necessary that it should be so, or I should have been without experience in such matters.

It was his business to get it if he could, and it was mine to see that he did not succeed in the attempt. I am thereforte provoked with myself much more than I am with him. I went to the place where I was informed by the officers, for my comfort, that it was done by an Englishman, and that the English pickpockets are the most accomplished villains in the world.—They cut open the pockets with a little blade fixed in a ring, worn upon the finger, and thrown out by a fine spring. It was also some comfort, that a poor fellow who had been robbed of two thousand six hundred dollars, near Albany, came into the police office after me to complain of his hard lot.

No man should carry money in his outer coat pocket; if he does he almost deserves to be robbed. The fellow took me to be a lawyer or merchant, no doubt, and concluded that the pockets would open rich. He did not know me to be a poor editor. He must have been sadly disappointed that he got so little.

Battle between a Spider and a Toad.—The following account of a battle between a reptile and an insect, will serve to show the courage of the insect, and the sagacity, approaching to medical skill, of the reptile tribe:

"A toad was observed to be engaged in battle with a large spider, which remained stationary, while the toad would make a pass at him and snap with his jaws in the same manner in which they are observed to do when taking small insects for food; and when making those passes, the spider would ward off the blow, and occasionally bite the toad. The toad, on receiving the wound, would hop off a short distance, where there was a plant growing, which is usually known by the name of plantain, and would nibble the leaves, apparently to apply as an antidote for the poison received from the fangs of the spider, and then return to battle again. After this process had been carried on for some time by the toad, that is, alternately fighting the spider, and biting the plantain leaf, one of the gentlemen very cautiously, while the toad was thus disputing the field, pulled up the plantain leaf and took it away. The toad was again wounded, and straightway proceeded to his old physician; but on arriving at the spot, discovered the loss of his antidote; and if ever dismay was exhibited in a reptile, it was now to be seen. The toad, for a few moments, hopped one way and another with all his powers, in search of another plantain, but found none, and immediately the poison from the spider took effect; still he kept in search of a remedy, but his hopes were weaker and weaker, and in a very few minutes he expired."

CONSEQUENCES OF GAMBLING.

In the year 184—, a number of individuals were arrested for keeping a gambling house on Chestnut street, near Independence Hall. The counsel for the prosecution was sitting in his office one day, when a young man of genteel exterior and good address entered, and the following dialogue ensued:

"I have been summoned, to appear tomorrow as a witness against ——— ———, for keeping a gambling house. Unless it is absolutely necessary," said he, as his agitation increased, "I wish, sir, you would not urge my attendance."

"I don't know," said the Counsel, "that the conviction will depend upon your testimony, but as you are an important witness, it may be necessary to bring you upon the stand."

"My reasons for asking this favor are urgent," said he, "and the consequence of a refusal may be fatal to my prosperity, and the happiness of others." He became more agitated, and at the request of the gentleman, he continued. "In a few days I am to be married to Mr. ———'s daughter, residing on Chestnut street. The preparations are made and the day is fixed. If I am called upon as a witness in this case, I shall criminate myself, and be exposed to the eyes of my friends and the public gaze as a gambler. My character will be lost, my prospects in life blighted, and of course, my domestic happiness destroyed."

"You shall not be called, young man," said the counsel; "unless it is absolutely necessary," and with this assurance, they separated—not without some painful misgivings on the legal gentleman, that he was about to be accessary to a wrong, which might result in the utter ruin of a confiding yet unsuspecting girl. The trial came on, but conviction was obtained without summoning the young man, and he went on in his course of duplicity and crime unexposed. In a few days, he was married!

Two years passed, and a young but heart broken wife appears before the legal tribunal, seeking a divorce! Her counsel was startled, when the husband came forward, at discovering, confronting the wife, the identical young man, who plead not to be exposed as a gambler! The interview with the witness instantly occurred to the counsel's mind. The painful incidents of a deserted house, neglected wife, and the cruelties which had followed his gambling habits, then came up in fearful array before the individual who saved him from his merited exposure.

The trial proceeded, and a gradual pursuit of acts of injustice, neglect, coldness, alienation, domestic discord and cruelties, on the part of a husband against a confiding and affectionate young wife, were disclosed, which melted the heart of the oldest spectator. His defense was feeble, and her cause triumphed. Happily she was liberated from the monster who had wounded her heart, destroyed her peace, and deprived her of that happiness which beamed upon her so joyously during the morning of her bridal day.

His fate hardly need even briefly be told. He soon lost the esteem of his friends, if the gambler has friends, and credit followed with his reputation. His fashionable and elegant esfablishment on Chestnut-street, was closed by the Sheriff a few weeks since, and more recently, he has been arrested for forgery! What a brief but melancholy detail of the fruits reaped from the pursuits of a gamester.

Virtue will catch, as well as vice, by contact; the public stock of honest manly principle will daily accumulate. We are not to nice to scutinize motives as long as action is irreproachable. It is enough (and for a worthy man perhaps too much) to deal but its infamy to convicted guilt and declared apostacy.

The following dialogue occurred at one of our popular colleges between the celebrated Dr.———, and a pupil whose lucubrations seldom interfered with his devotions to the leaden god:

"Pray, Sir what is ratio?"
"Ratio, Sir? ratio is proportion."
"And what is proportion?"
"Proportion, Sir? why propoition is ratio.
"And pray, Sir, what are they both taken together?"
"Excuse me, Sir, I can't answer but one at a time."

Fire in the Moon.—A writer in the Philadelphia Inquirer denies the fact mentioned in the New Bedford Mercury, that the volcanoes of the Moon could be seen blazing. The writer surveyed the appearance indicated, with a powerful telescope, at the High School Observatory. The appearance he ascribes to another cause.—The mountains in the moon, he says, after examining them at the time specified, were just enjoying their sunrise—it was not sunrise at the base of the peaks, and the illuminated sides of the mountains, sloping as stated in the account, presented the appearance of bright gleams of light in a dark field, viz. the unenlightened base of the mountains.—N. Haven Palladium.

Remember the Poor.—"Remember the poor," said the greatest philanthropist the world ever saw or ever will see. The chilled faces in our streets—the shivering boy—the bowed widow, gathering her thin garments still more closely around her shivering limbs to keep out the cold—and especially that old bent woman, who is now picking up chips beneath our window—reminds us that the season is at hand when this command is particularly emphatic.

"Remember the poor," for the wheel of fortune may, in its unceasing whirl, place you among them in after years.

"Remember the poor," for they are your equals, and many of them are infinitely your superiors in all but clothing and food.

"Remember the poor," for the surplus in your hands belongs to you as stewards for the suffering. That old woman is starving! dare you hord it up and let her starve on? Send her some food, and her prayers and blessings will fall upon your head like a shower of Jewels.—Portland American.

THE TWO ROSES.

Vanity; or admiring ourselves.

Two roses grew together near the brink of a pond made in a flower garden. One was very modest, though beautiful, but the other was very vain of what beauty she possesssed. One day she was looking with much pride on her fair form as it was reflected in the water, when her companion warned her, that though she was frail, and it was folly to be proud of that which she might lose in an hour. The warning had no sooner been given, than an east wind suddenly blew a killing blast, when she withered and died.

Nothing is more foolish than to admire ourselves in the glass and be proud of our beauty, if we really possess it, for beauty is but like a fading flower; in a few hours it may be spoiled by disease, or destroyed by death. Let us take care that we love and fear God, and then we shall look beautiful in his sight; and though death may wither our forms, and destroy all the beauty of the body, the soul shall remain untouched, and flourish in immortal vigor.—Gobbin's Fables.

An Irish Argument.—As the late Mr. G——, a farmer at Duddingstone, once stood at his gate, an Irish lad came up to him and requested to be employed.

Mr. G.—Go away, sir! I will never employ any of your country again.

Irishman.—Why, yer honor? Sure, we are good workers. God bless you! do give me a job.

Mr. G—No, sir, I wont; for the last Irishman I employed died on my hands, and I was forced to bury him at my own charge.

Irishman.—Ah, your honor, you need not fear that of me, for I can get a certificate that I never died in the employment of any man I ever served.

He could not resist this. Poor pat got employment, and without the certificate.

Things that I have seen.—I have seen a farmer build a house so large and fine, that the Sheriff turned him out of doors.

I have seen a farmer travel about so much, that there was nothing at home worth looking after.

I have seen a rich man's son begin where his father left off—wealthy; and end where his father began—pennyless.

I have seen a worthy farmer's son idle away years of the prime of life in dissipation, and end his career in a poor house.

I have seen a fine young man marry a girl of dissolute habits, and repent of it as long as he lived.

There is nothing purer than honesty—nothing sweeter than charity—nothing warmer than love—nothing richer than wisdom—nothing brighter than virtue—and nothing more steadfast than faith.—These united in one mind, form the purest—the sweetest—the richest—the brightest, and the most steadfast Happiness.

The best friends, are those who stimulate each other to do good.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To Families and Invalids.

THE following indispensable family remedies may be found at the village drug stores, and soon at every country store in the state. Remember and never get them unless they have the fac simile signature of Comstock & Co. on the wrappers, as all others by the same names are base impositions and counterfeits. If the merchant nearest you has them not, urge him to procure them at 71 Maiden-lane, the next time he visits New York, or to write for them. No family should be a week without these remedies

BALDNESS.

Balm of Columbia, for the hair, which will stop it from falling out, or restore it on bald places; and on children make it grow rapidly, or on those who have lost their hair from any cause. All vermin that infest the heads of children in schools, are prevented or killed at once. Find the name of Comstock & Co. on it, or never try it. Remember this always.

RHEUMATISM AND LAMENESS

Positvely cured, and all shrivelled muscles and limbs are restored, in the old or young, by the Indian Vegetable Elixir and Nerve and Bone Liniment, but never without the name of comstock & Co. on it.

PILES &c.

Are wholly prevented, or governed if the attack has come on, if you use the only true Hay's Liniment, from Comstock & Co. All sores and every thing relieved by it that admits of an outward application. It acts like a charm. Use it.

HORSES that have Ring-Bone, Spavin, Wind-Galls, &c., are cured by Roofs' Specific; and Foundered horses entirely cured by Roofs' Founder Ointment. Mark this, all horsemen.

How to make money,

IS the study of mankind and of the Yankee Nation in particular. The easiest and most practicable plan for accomplishing the desired end in these times is to "Save Money," which can be done by purchasing NEW GOODS, instead of the trashy accumulations of many shops and many years. The place to do this, is at ELMORE'S whose stock of NEW GOODS is nearly equal to all the rest received in this village and who is daily dispensing great bargains to "Fortune's Favorites."

Extracts From Carlow.

The Arts used by the Papists to bring the first day to be kept for a Sabbath into Scotland and England, by a lying Miracle.

Of the observation of the dominical day, an holy command of the dominical day which came from Heaven, they say, unto Jerusalem, found on St. Simeon's altar in Golgotha, where Christ was crucified for the sin of the world, and the Lord, they say, commanded this epistle, which was taken upon the altar of St. Simeon, which for three days and as many nights men looked on it, struck with such terror on all that saw it, that falling to the ground they besought God's mercy, praying to God; and after this the Patriarch erected himself, and Akarias the Archbishop, and stretched out the Bishop's mitre, and they ventured to take into their hands this dreadful letter, which was written thus: (now wipe your eye and look awhile on the contents, which I shall render with as much brevity as the thing requires.) "I the Lord who commanded you that ye should observe the dominical holy day, and you have not kept it, and ye have not repented of your sins; I have caused repentance to be preached unto you, and ye have not believed. I sent Pagans against you who shed your blood, yet ye repented not, and because ye kept not the day holy; for a few days he had famine, but I soon gave you plenty, and afterwards ye did worse. I will again, that none from the ninth hour of the Sabbath. [So the Abbot of Flay still called the seventh day the Sabbath, and put part of the Sabbath into the first day, until the rising of the Sun on Monday, they were not to do any work, unless what is good, which if any do, let him amend by repentance] And if ye be not obedient to this command, I say unto you, and I swear unto you by my seat and throne, and cherubims who keep my holy seat, because I will not command you any thing by another epistle, but I will open the Heaven, and for rain I will rain upon you stones, and logs of wood, and hot water by night, that none may be able to prevent; but that I may destroy all wicked men, this I say unto you, ye shall die the death because of the dominical holy day, and other festivals of saints,* which ye have not kept; I will send unto you beasts having the heads of lions, the hair of women, the tails of camels, and they shall be so hungered, starved, that they shall devour your flesh, and ye shall desire to flee to the sepulchres of the dead, and hide you for fear of the beasts, and I will take away the light of the sun from your eyes; and I will send upon you darkness, that without seeing ye may kill one another, and I will take away my face from you, and I will not shew you mercy, for I will burn your bodies and hearts, and of all those who keep not the dominical holy day. Hear my voice least ye perish in the land, because of the dominical holy day; turn from evil and be penitent for your sins, which if ye do not ye shall perish as Sodom and Gomorrah; now know ye that you are safe by the prayers of my most holy mother Mary, and of my holy Angels and Saints, who daily pray for you; I gave you corn and wine abundantly, and then ye did not obey me, for widows and orphans daily cry unto you, to whom you do no mercy; Pagans have mercy but ye have not; the trees which bear fruit I will make to dry up for your sins; the rivers and fountains shall not yield water; I swear to you by my right hand, unless ye keep the dominical day, and the festivals of my Saints, I will send Pagans to kill you."

There is more of this wretched stuff, to make the people believe they should keep the first day for the Sabbath. Then the Lord Eustachius, Abbot of Flay, came to York in England, and being honorably received by Galfred, Archbishop of York, and the clergy, and the people of that city, he preached of the transgressing the dominical day, and the other festivals or holy days, he gave the people repentance and absolution, under this condition, that they hereafter should bestow due reverence to the dominical day, and other festivals of the Saints, nor doing in them any servile labor, nor should exercise or keep markets of vendible on the dominical day, but should devoutly employ themselves in good works and prayers. It seems the people here in England had little reverence for the Sunday before this, or for holy days.

These things the Lord Eustachius, Abbot of Flay, constituted to be observed from the ninth hour, i. e., our three of the clock in the afternoon of the seventh day Sabbath, until the rising of the sun on Monday, and the people upon his preaching, vowed to God that they hereafter would neither buy nor sell any thing upon the dominical day, unless perhaps food and drink to such as passed by; they vowed also, that of all things which they sold of the value of five shillings, they would give a fourth part to buy a lamp or candle for the church, and for the burial of the poor; and for the collecting of this, the aforesaid Abbot ordained to be made an hollow piece of wood in all parish churches, under the custody of two or three faithful men, where the people should cast in the forementioned money. He ordained also an alms-dish, or platter, should be daily had to the table of the rich, in which they should send part of their meat to the use of those who were indigent and poor, who had not prepared for themselves, which impart was a very charitable appointment. The same Abbot prohibited that none should buy or sell any thing in Churches, or in the Church porch, or Church yard. This refers to England. So Scotland did not receive the change till one thousand two hundred and three years, and the King and princes of England would not agree to change the Sabbath, or keep Sunday by this command. This was I think in the time of King John, against whom the Popish Clergy had a great pique and quarrel, as not favoring their Prelacy and Monks, by one of whom he was poisoned; so we have here an authority, and for matter of fact undeniable, for ought I know or can find, of a council held in Scotland for initiating, that is, for the first bringing in there the observation of the dominical day, i. e., the first day of the week or Sunday, and the King, Princes and People of England were then against the observing of Sunday.

The Kingdom of Scotland was Christians very early, and generally received the Christian religion about Anno Dom. 435, and have this honor, that they were one of the last in this part of the world which admitted the first day to be kept for the Sabbath, and that was not till one thousand two hundred and three years after Christ, and to Binius, Bœtieus, Havedon, and Matthew Paris, and to the records of that Kingdom of Scotland, where so great a transaction cannot probably be lost, further enquiries are referred.

Which matter of fact strikes off one thousand two hundred and three years out of the Kingdoms of Scotland and England, from the seventeen hundred and twenty one years, so confidently affirmed by Mr. Ward concerning the first day Sabbath; and take out one thousand two hundred and three out of seventeen hundred and twenty-one, and there remains five hundred and eighteen years, which is a prescription much too modern and weak to alter and lay aside a lesser matter than the ancient established law of God's seventh day Sabbath; I may safely leave any one to make his own inferences in so plain a case. Now although this precedent of Eustachius be somewhat longer, yet being seconded by a council, and that transmitted and published to the world in one of the volumes of the general and provincial councils, out of which it is translated, and this passing at the initiating, or first bringing in of the celebration of the first day of the week, or Sunday, into the Kingdom of Scotland, which is famous for having the gospel early preached there, and in this as famous, viz. for not receiving this innovation of the first day, so soon as some other parts of the world, and England being then much of the same mind, as before has been said, and this being one precedent which may serve to abate what is printed about the first day, as if all the world since Christ and the Apostles time had observed it, and as if the Sabbath ever since had been universally laid aside.

I MUST DIE.

In the giddy whirl of the world, men to little pause to reflect that they are mortal. On and on they delve and toil, strive and contend, criminating and recriminating, throwing their whole souls into the vortex of the world, as if it and its objects were worthy to absorb their whole being. Painful object of contemplation! A few more passing seasons, and all who are engaged in the exciting and maddening strife of the world, will, one after another, have silently dropped into the bosom of the earth, no more to be seen of men, soon to be remembered no more on earth. How unimportant, then, to the disembodied spirit, will appear the trifles which to-day are so much magnified, and which by partial, interested and selfish views, are clothed with so much consequence. I must die! This short sentence, frequently uttered and pondered upon, would go far to moderate asperity of feeling, to eradicate enmity from the heart, to cool the ardor of worldly pursuits, to abate strife and jarring discord. I must die! Let us in imagination overleap the bounds of earth, and placing ourselves on some far off point in the eternal world, look back upon the scenes in which we have mingled, which have absorbed so much of our thoughts and our feelings, and which have so frequently aroused and lashed into fierce excitement our passions.—How does these things now appear? How does this great world, with all its glitter and its tinsel, its honors and its applause, appear? Absolutely worthless and insignificant, not deserving a thought or a wish. But there we must stand at no distant period, and thus survey this empty, passing scene, in memory's magic glass, shall put a proper estimate upon its comparatively unimportant concerns. It is the part of wisdom to view these things now, somewhat as they will then appear. And such a contemplation, while it will serve to blunt the sorrows, lighten the cares, and ease the burdens of this life, will tend to magnify eternal realities. I must die! Yes, this handful of earth of which I am now so careful, and for whose decoration, ease and comfort, I expend so much, will be so loathsome as to be hidden carefully from the sight of men, and will soon mingle with the clods of the valley. Well will it then be, if the spirit is not so loathsome and defiled with sin, as to be forever excluded from the presence of a pure, and holy, and sinless God. I must die! Yes, and I must appear at the judgment, and there my motives and my true character will be read and known of all. Think of this, reader! Ponder often upon it, and if you are wise, you will think, and act, and feel far otherwise than do the men of the world.—Ch. Watchman.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We have continued reason to express our profound gratitude to the great Creator of all things for numberless benefits conferred upon us as a People. Blessed with genial seasons, the husbandman has his garners filled with abundance, and the necessaries of life, not to speak of its luxuries, abound in every direction. While in some other nations steady and industrious labor can hardly find the means of subsistence, the greatest evil which we have to encounter, is a surplus of production beyond the home demand, which seeks and with difficulty finds, a partial market in other regions. The health of the country, with partial exceptions, has for the past year been well preserved; and, under their free and wise institutions, the United States are rapidly advancing towards the consummation of the high destiny which an overruling Providence seems to have marked out for them. Exempt from domestic convulsion, and at peace with the world, we are left free to consult as to the best means of securing and advancing the happiness of the people. Such are the circumstances under which you now assemble in your respective chambers, and which should lead us to unite in praise and thanks, giving to that great Being who made us, and who preserves us as a nation.

I congratulate you, fellow citizens, on the happy change in the aspect of foreign affairs since my last annual message.—Causes of complaint at that time existed between the United States and Great Britain, which, attended by irritating circumstances, threatened most seriously the public peace. The difficulty of adjusting amicably the question at issue between the two countries, was in no small degree augmented by the lapse of time since they had their origin. The opinion entertained by the Executive on several of the leading topics in dispute, were frankly set forth in the Message at the opening of your late session. The appointment of a special minister by Great Britain to the United States with power to negotiate upon most of the points of difference, indicated a desire on her part amicably to adjust them, and that minister was met by the Executive in the same spirit which had dictated his mission. The Treaty consequent thereon, having been duly ratified by the two Governments, a copy, together with the correspondence which accompanied it, is herewith communicated. I trust that whilst you may see in it nothing objectionable, it may be the means of preserving for an indefinite period, the amicable relations happily existing between the two Governments.

The question of peace or war between the United States and Great Britain, is a question of the deepest interest not only to themselves, but to the civilized world, since it is scarcely possible that a war could exist between them without endangering the peace of Christendom. The immediate effect of the Treaty upon ourselves will be felt in the security afforded to mercantile enterprise, which, no longer apprehensive of interruption, adventures its speculations in the most distant sea; and, freighted with the diversified productions of every land, returns to bless our own. There is nothing in the Treaty, which, in the slightest degree, compromits the honor and dignity of either nation.—Next to the settlement of the boundary line, which must always be a matter of difficulty between States as between individuals, the question which seemed to threaten the greatest embarrassment, was that connected with the African slave trade.

By the 10th article of the Treaty of Ghent it was expressly declared that "whereas the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice; and whereas both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition, it is hereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object." In the enforcement of the laws and treaty stipulations of Great Britain, a practice had threatened to grow up on the part of its cruisers of subjecting to visitation ships sailing under the American flag, which, while it seriously involved our maratime rights, would subject to vexation a branch of our trade which was increasing, and which required the fostering care of the Government.

And although Lord Aberdeen, in his correspondence with the American Envoys at London, expressly disclaimed all right to detain any American ship on the high seas, even if found with a cargo of slaves on board, and restricted the British pretension to a mere claim to visit and enquire, yet it could not well be discerned by the Executive of the United States how such visit and enquiry could be made without detention on the voyage, and consequent interruption to the trade. It was regarded as the right of search, presented only in a new form and expressed in different words; and I therefore felt it to be my duty distinctly to declare in my annual message to Congress, that no such concession could be made, and that the United States had both the will and the ability to enforce her own laws, and to protect their flag from being used for purposes wholly forbidden by those laws and obnoxious to the moral censure of the world.

Taking the Message as his letter of instructions, our then Minister at Paris felt himself required to assume the same ground in a remonstrance which he felt it his duty to present to M. Guizot, and through him to the King of the French, against what has been called the Quintuple treaty; and his conduct, in this respect, met with the approval of this Government. In close conformity with these views, the eighth article of the Treaty was framed, which provides that "each nation shall keep afloat separately, and apart, under instructions from their respective Governments, and for the reinforcement of the respective laws and obligations."—From this it will be seen that the ground assumed in the Message has been fully maintained, at the same time that the stipulations of the Treaty of Ghent that a force not less than eighty guns to act in the African seas, are to be carried out in good faith by the two countries, and that all pretence is removed for interference with our commerce for any purpose whatever by a foreign Government.

While, therefore, the United States have been standing up for the freedom of the seas, they have not thought proper to make that a pretext for avoiding a fulfilment of their Treaty stipulations, or a ground for giving countenance to a trade reprobated by our laws. A similar arrangement by the other great powers could not fail to sweep from the ocean the slave trade, without the interpolation of any new principle into the maratime code. We may be permitted to hope that the example thus set will be followed by one, if not all of them. We thereby also afford suitable protection to the fair trader in those seas, thus fulfilling at the same time the dictates of a sound policy, and complying with the claims of justice and humanity.

It would have furnished additional cause for congratulation, if the Treaty could have embraced all subjects calculated in future to lead to a misunderstanding between the two governments. The territory of the United States, commonly called the Oregon Territory, lying on the Pacific Ocean, north of the 42d degree of latitude, to a portion of which Great Britain lays claim, begins to attract the attention of our fellow citizens, and the tide of population which has reclaimed what was so lately an unbroken wilderness, in more contiguous regions, is preparing to flow over these vast districts, which stretch from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific ocean. In advance of the acquirements of individual rights to these lands, sound policy dictates that every effort should be resorted to by the two governments, to settle their respective claims.

It became manifest at an early hour of the late negotiations, that any attempt for the time being satisfactorily to determine those rights, would lead to a protracted discussion, which might embrace in its failure other more pressing matters, and the Executive did not regard it as proper to waive all the advantages of an honorable adjustment of other difficulties of great magnitude and importance, because this, not so immediately pressing, stood in the way. Although the difficulty referred to may not for several years to come involve the peace of the two countries, yet I shall not delay to urge on Great Britain the importance of its early settlement. Nor will other matters of commercial importance to the two countries be overlooked; and I have good reason to believe that it will comport with the policy of England, as it does with that of the United States, to seize upon this moment, when most of the causes of irritation have passed away, to cement the peace and unity of the two countries by wisely removing all grounds of probable future collission.

With the other powers of Europe our relations continue on the most friendly footing. Treaties now existing with them should be rigidly observed, and every opportunity, compatible with the interests of the United States should be seized upon to enlarge the basis of commercial intercourse. Peace with all the world is the true foundation of our policy which can only be rendered permanent by the practice of equal and impartial justice to all. Our great desire should be to enter only into that rivalry which looks to the general good in the cultivation of the sciences, the enlargement of the field for the exercise of the mechanical arts, and the spread of commerce—that great civilizer—to every land and sea.—Carefully abstaining from interference in all questions exclusively referring themselves to the political interests of Europe, we may be permitted to hope an equal exemption from the interference of European Governments, in what relates to the States of the American Continent.

On the 23d of April last, the Commissioners on the part of the United States, under the convention with the Mexican Republic, of the 11th of April, 1839, made to the proper department a final report in relation to the proceedings of the commission. From this it appears that, the total amount awarded to the claimants by the commissioners and the umpire appointed under that convention, was $2,026,079 68. The arbiter having considered that his functions were required by the convention to terminate at the same time with those of the commissioners, returned to the board, undecided for want of time, claims which had been allowed by the American Commissioners, to the $928 620 88.

Other claims, in which the amount sought to be recovered was $3,336,837 05, were submitted to the board too late for its consideration. The Minister of the United States at Mexico has been duly authorized to make demand for the payment of the awards according to the terms of the Convention, and the provisions of the act of Congress of the 12th of June, 1840.—He has also been instructed to communicate to that Government the expectations of the Government of the United States in relation to those claims which were not disposed of according to the provisions of the Convention, and all others of citizens of the United States against the Mexican Government.

He has also been furnished with other instructions to be followed by him in case the Government of Mexico should not find itself in a condition to make present payment of the amount of the awards in specie or its equivalent.

I am happy to be able to say that information which is esteemed favorable, both to a just satisfaction of the awards, and a reasonable provision for other claims, has been actually received from Mr. Thompson, the Minister of the United States, who has promptly and efficiently executed the instructions of his Government, in regard to this important subject.

The citizens of the United States who accompanied the late expedition to Santa Fe, and who were wrongfully taken and held as prisoners of war in Mexico, have all been liberated.

A correspondence has taken place between the Department of State and the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs, upon the complaint of Mexico that citizens of the United States were permitted to give aid to the inhabitants of Texas in the war existing between her and that Republic.—Copies of this correspondence are herewith communicated to Congress, together with copies of letters on the same subject, addressed to the Diplomatic corps at Mexico, by the American Minister and Mexican Secretary of State.

Mexico has thought proper to reciprocate the mission of the United States to that Government, by accrediting to this a Minister of the same rank as that of the representative of the United States in Mexico. From the circumstances connected with his mission, favorable results are anticipated from it. It is so obviously for the interests of both countries as neighbors and friends that all just causes of mutual dissatisfaction should be removed, that it is to be hoped neither will omit or delay the employment of any practicable and honorable means to accomplish that end.

The affairs pending between this Government and several others of the States of this hemisphere formerly under the dominion of Spain, have again within the past year, been materially obstructed by the military revolutions and conflicts in those countries.

The ratifications of the Treaty between the United States and the Republic of Ecuador, of the 13th of June, 1839, have been exchanged, and that instrument has been duly promulgated on the part of this Government. Copies are now communicated to Congress with a view to enable that body to make such changes in the laws applicable to our intercourse with that Republic, as may be deemed requisite.

Provision has been made by the government of Chili for the payment of the claim on account of the illegal detention of the brig Warrior at Coquimbo, in 1820. The government has reason to expect that other claims of our citizens against Chili will be hastened to a final and satisfactory close.

The empire of Brazil has not been altogether exempt from the convulsions which so afflict the neighboring republics. Disturbances which recently broke out are, however, now understood to be quieted.—But these occurrences, by threatening the stability of the governments or by causing incessant and violent changes in them, tend greatly to retard provisions for a just indemnity for losses and injuries suffered by individual subjects or citizens of other states.

The government of the United States will feel it to be its duty, however, to consent to no delay, not unavoidable, in making satisfaction for wrongs and injuries sustained by its own citizens. Many years having, in some cases, elapsed, a decisive and effectual course of proceeding will be demanded of the respective governments against whom claims have been preferred.

The vexatious, harrassing, and expensive war which so long prevailed with the Indian tribes inhabiting the territory of Florida, has happily been terminated; whereby our army has been relieved from a service of the most disagreeable character, and the Treasury from a large expenditure.—Some casual outbreaks may occur, such as are incident to the close proximity of border settlers and the Indians; but these as in all other cases may be left to the care of the local authorities, aided, when occasion may require, by the forces of the United States. A sufficient number of troops will be maintained in Florida, so long as the remotest apprehensions of danger shall exist; yet their duties will be limited rather to the garrisoning of the necessary posts, than to the maintenance of active hostilities. It is to be hoped, that a territory so long retarded in its growth will now speedily recover from the evils incident to a protracted war, exhibiting in the increased amount of its rich productions, true evidences of returning wealth and prosperity.

By the practice of rigid justice towards the numerous Indian tribes residing within our territorial limits, and the exercise of a parental vigilance over their interests, protecting them against fraud and intrusion, and at the same time using every expedient to introduce among them the arts of civilized life we may fondly hope not only to wean them from love for war, but to inspire them with a love for peace and all its avocations. With several of the tribes great progress in civilizing them has already been made. The schoolmaster and the missionary are found side by side, and the remnants of what were once numerous and powerful nations, may yet be preserved as the builders up of a new name and country.

The balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1842, (exclusive of the amount deposited with the States, Trust Fund, and Indemnities,) was $230,483 68. The receipts into the Treasury during the three first quarters of the present year, from all sources, amount to $26,616,594 78; of which more than fourteen millions were received from customs, and about one million from the public lands. The receipts for the first quarter are estimated at nearly eight millions; of which four millions are expected from customs, and three millions and a half from loans and treasury notes. The expenditures of the first three quarters of the present year exceed twenty-six millions; and those estimated for the fourth quarter amount to about eight millions; and it is anticipated there will be a deficiency of half a million on the 1st of January next—but that the amount of outstanding warrants (estimated at $800,000,) will leave an actual balance of about $224,000 in the Treasury. Among the expenditures of the year, are more than eight millions for the public debt, and $600,000 on account of the distribution to the States of the proceeds of sales of public lands.

The present tariff of duties was somewhat hastily and hurriedly passed near the close of the late session of Congress.—That it should have defects, can, therefore, be surprising to no one. To remedy such defects as may be found to exist in many of its numerous provisions, will not fail to claim its serious attention. It may well merit inquiry, whether the exaction of all duties in cash does not call for the introduction of a system which has proved highly beneficial in countries where it has been adopted. I refer to the Warehousing System. The first and most prominent effect which it would produce, would be to protect the market alike against redundant or deficient supplies of foreign fabrics—both of which, in the long run, are injurious as well to the manufacturer as the importer.

The quantity of goods in store being at all times readily known it would enable the importer, with an approach to accuracy, to ascertain the actual wants of the market, and to regulate himself accordingly. If, however, he should fall into error, by importing an excess above the public wants, he could readily correct its evils by availing himself of the benefit and advantages of the system thus established. In the storehouse the goods imported would await the demands of the market, and their issues would be governed by the fixed principles of demand and supply. Thus an approximation would be made to a steadiness and uniformity of price, which, if attainable, would conduce to the decided advantage of mercantile and mechanical operations.

The apprehension may be well entertained that without something to ameliorate the rigor of cash payments, the entire import trade may fall into the hands of a few wealthy capitalists in this country in & Europe. The small importer, who requires all the money he can raise for investments abroad, and who can but ill-afford to pay the lowest duty, would have to subduct in advance a portion of his funds in order to pay the duties, and would loose the interest upon the amount thus paid for all the time the goods remain unsold, which might absorb his profits. The rich capitalist abroad, as well as at home, would thus possess, after a short time an almost exclusive monopoly of the import trade, and laws designed for the benefit of all, would thus operate for the benefit of a few—a result wholly uncongenial with the spirit of our institutions, and anti-republican in all its tendencies.

The Warehousing System would enable the importer to watch the market, and to select his own time for offering his goods for sale. A profitable portion of the carrying trade in articles entered for drawback, must also be most seriously affected, without the adoption of some expedient to relieve the cash system. The Warehousing System would afford that relief, since the carrier would have a safe recourse to the public store houses, and might, without advancing the duty, reship within some reasonable period, to foreign ports. A further effect of the measure would be to supercede the system of drawbacks, thereby effectually protecting the Government against fraud, as the right of debenture would not attach to goods after their withdrawal from the public stores.

In revising the existing tariff of duties, should you deem it proper to do so at your present session, I can only repeat the suggestions and recommendations which, upon several occasions I have heretofore felt it to be my duty to offer to Congress. The great, primary, and controlling interest of the American people is union—union not only in the mere forms of government—forms which may not be broken—but union founded in an attachment to States and individuals for each other. The union in sentiment and feeling can only be preserved by the adoption of that course of policy which, neither giving exclusive benefits to some, nor imposing unnecessary burdens upon others, shall consult the interests of all, by pursuing a course of moderation, and thereby seeking to harmonize public opinion, and causing the people every where to feel and to know that the Government is careful in the interests of all alike. Nor is there any subject in regard to which moderation, connected with a wise discrimination, is more necessary than in the imposition on imports.

Whether reference be had to revenue, the primary object in the imposition of taxes, or to the incidents which necessarily flow from their imposition, this is entirely true. Extravagant duties defeat their end and object, not only by exciting in the public mind a hostility to the manufacturing interests, but by inducing a system of smuggling on an extensive scale, and the practice of every manner of fraud upon the revenue, which the utmost vigilance of the Government cannot effectually suppress. An opposite course of policy would be attended by results essentially different, of which every interest of society, and none more than those of the manufacturer, would reap important advantages. Among the most striking of its benefits would be that derived from the general acquiescence of the country in its support, and the consequent permanency and stability which would be given to all the operations of industry. It cannot be too often repeated, that no system of legislation can be wise which is fluctuating and uncertain. No interest can thrive under it.

The prudent capitalist will never adventure his capital in manufacturing establishments, or in any other leading pursuit of life, if there exists a state of uncertainty as to whether the Government will repeal to-morrow what it has enacted to-day. Fitful profits, however high, if threatened with a ruinous reduction by a vacillating policy on the part of the Government, will scarcely tempt him to trust the money which he has acquired by a life of labor, upon the uncertain adventure. I, therefore, in the spirit of conciliation, and influenced by no other desire than to rescue the great interests of the country from the vortex of political contention, and in the discharge of the high and solemn duties of the place which I now occupy, recommend moderate duties imposed with a wise discrimination as to their several objects, as being not only most likely to be durable, but most advantageous to every interests of society.

The report of the Secretary of the War Department exhibits a very full and satisfactory account of the varions and important interests committed to the charge of that officer. It is particularly gratifying to find that the expenditures for the military service are greatly reduced in amount—that a strict system of economy has been introduced into the service, and the abuses of past years greatly reformed. The fortifications on our maratime frontier have been prosecuted with much vigor, and at many points our defenses are in a very considerable state of forwardness. The suggestions in reference to the establishment of means of communication with our territories on the Pacific, and to the surveys so essential to a knowledge of the resources of the immediate country, are entitled to the most favorable consideration. While I would propose nothing inconsistent with friendly negotiations to settle the extent of our claims in that region, yet a prudent forecast points out the necessity of such measures as may enable us to maintain our rights. The arrangements made for preserving our neutral relations on the boundary between us and Texas, and keeping in check the Indians in that quarter, will be maintained so long as circumstances require.

For several years angry contentions have grown out of the disposition directed by law to be made of the mineral lands held by the Government in several of the States. The Government is constituted the landlord, and the citizens of the States wherein lies the lands are its tenants. The relation is an unwise one, and it would be much more conductive of the public interest that a sale of the lands should be made than that they should remain in their present condition. The supply of the ore would be more abundantly and certainly furnished when to be drawn from the enterprise and the industry of the proprietor, than under the present system.

The recommendation of the Secretary in regard to the improvements of the Western waters and certain prominent harbors on the lakes, merit, and I doubt not will receive your serious attention. The great importance of these subjects to the prosperity of the extensive region referred to, and the security of the whole country in time of war, cannot escape observation.—The losses of life and property which annually occur in the navigation of the Mississippi alone, because of the dangerous obstructions in the river, make a loud demand upon Congress for the adoption of efficient measures for their removal.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy will bring you acquainted with that important branch of the public defenses.—Considering the already vast and daily increasing commerce of the country, apart from the exposure to hostile inroad of an extended seaboard, all that relates to the Navy is calculated to excite particular attention. Whatever tends to add to its efficiency, without entailing unnecessary charges upon the Treasury, is well worthy of your serious consideration. It will be seen that while an appropriation exceeding by less than a million the appropriations of the present year, is asked by the Secretary, yet that in this sum is proposed to be included $100,000 for the purchase of clothing, which, when once expended, will be annually reimbursed by the sale of the clothes, and will thus constitute a perpetual fund, without any new appropriation to the same object

To this may also be added $50,000 asked to cover the arrearages of past years; and $250,000 in order to maintain a competent squadron on the coast of Africa; all of which when deducted will reduce the expenditures nearly within the limits of those of the current year. While however the expenditures will thus remain very nearly the same as of the antecedent year, it is proposed to add greatly to the operations of the Marine, and in lieu of only 25 ships in commission, and but little in the way of building, to keep, with the same expenditure, 41 vessels afloat, and to build 11 ships of a small class.

A strict system of accountability is established, and great pains are taken to insure industry, fidelity, and economy in every department of duty. Experiments have been instituted to test the quality of various materials, particularly copper, iron, and coal, so as to prevent fraud and imposition.

It will appear by the report of the Postmaster General that the great point which, for several years, has been so much desired, has during the current year, been fully accomplished. The expenditures of the Department, for the current year, have been brought within its income without lessening its general usefulness. There has been an increase of revenue equal to $166,000 for the year 1842 over that of 1841, without, as it is believed, any addition having been made to the number of letters and newspapers transmitted through the mails. The Post Office laws have been honestly administered, and fidelity has been observed in accounting for, and paying over by the subordinates of the Department, the moneys which have been received. For the details of the service, I refer you to the report.

I flatter myself that the exhibition thus made of the condition of the public administration will serve to convince you that every proper attention has been paid to the interests of the country by those who have been called to the heads of the different Departments. The reduction in the annual expenditures of the Government already accomplished, furnishes a sure evidence that economy in the application of the public money, is regarded as a paramount duty.

At peace with all the world—the personal liberty of the citizen sacredly maintained, and his rights secured under political institutions deriving all their authority from the direct sanction of the people,—with a soil fertile almost beyond example; and a country blessed with every diversity of climate and production,—what remains to be done in order to advance the happiness and prosperity of such a people? Under ordinary circumstances this enquiry could readily be answered.

The best that could probably be done for a people inhabiting such a country, would be to fortify their peace and security in the prosecution of their various pursuits, by guarding them against invasion from without, and violence from within. The rest, for the greater part, might be left to their own energy an enterprize. The chief embarrassments which, at the moment, exhibit themselves, have arisen from over-action; and the most difficult task that remains to be accomplished, is that of correcting and overcoming its effects. Between the years of 1833 and 1838, additions were made to bank capital and bank issues, in the forms of notes designed for circulation, to an extent enormously great. The question seemed to be, not how the best currency could be provided, but in what manner the greatest amount of bank paper could be put in circulation.

Thus a vast amount of what was called money—since, for the time being, it answered the purpose of money—was thrown upon the country; an over issue which was attended, as a necessary consequence, by an extravagant increase of the prices of all the articles of property, the spread of a speculative mania all over the country, and has finally ended in a general indebtedness on the part of the States and indviduals, the prostration of public and private credit, a depreciation in the market value of real and personal estate, and has left large districts of country almost entirely without any circulating medium.

In view of the fact that in '30, the whole bank note circulation within the United States amounted to but $61,323,898, according to the Treasury statements, and that an addition had been made thereto of the enormous sum of $28,000,000, in seven years, (the circulation on the 1st of January, 1837, being stated at $149,185,890,) aided by the great facilities in obtaining loans from European capitalists, who were seized with the same speculative mania which prevailed in the United States, and the large importations of funds from abroad the result of stock sales and loans—no one can be surprised at the apparent but unsubstantial state of prosperity which every where prevailed over the land; and while little cause of surprise should be felt at the present prostration of everything, and the ruin which has befallen so many of our fellow-citizens, in the sudden withdrawal from circulation of so large an amount of bank issues, since 1837—exceeding, as is believed, the amount added to the paper currency for a similar period antecedent to 1837. it ceases to be a matter of astonishment that such extensive shipwreck should have been made of private fortunes, or that difficulties should exist in meeting their engagements on the part of the debtor States.

Apart from which, if there be taken into account the immense losses sustained in the dishonor of numerous banks, it is less a matter of surprise that insolvency should have visited many of our fellow-citizens, than that so many should have escaped the blighting influence of the times.

In the solemn conviction of these truths, and with an ardent desire to meet the pressing necessities of the conntry, I felt it to be my duty to cause to be submitted to you, at the commencement of your late session, the plan of an Exchequer, the whole power and duty of maintaining which, in purity and vigor, was to be exercised by the representatives of the people themselves. It was proposed to place it under the control and direction of a treasury board, to consist of three commissioners, whose duty it should be to see that the law of its creation was faithfully executed, and that the great end of supplying a paper medium of exchange, at all times convertible into gold and silver, should be at hand.

The Board thus constituted, was given as much permanency as could be imparted to it, without endangering the proper share of responsibility which should be attached to all public public agents. In order to secure all the advantages of a well matured experience, the Commissioners were to hold their offices for the respective periods of two, four, and six years, thereby securing at all times in the management of the Exchequer, the services of two men of experience: and to place them in a condition to exercise perfect independence of mind and action, it was provided that their removal should only take place for actual incapacity or infidelity to the trust, and to be followed by the President with an exposition of the causes of such removal, should it occur.

It was proposed to establish subordinate boards in each of the States, under the same restrictions and limitations of the power of removal, which, with the central board, should receive, safely keep, and disburse the public moneys; and in order to furnish a sound paper medium of Exchange, the Exchequer should retain of the revenue of the Government a sum not to exceed $5,000,000 in specie, to be set apart as required by its operations, and to pay the public creditor at its own option, either in specie or Treasury notes, of denominations not less than five, nor exceeding one hundred dollars, which notes should be redeemed at the several places of issue, and to be receivable at all times and every where in payment of Government dues; with a restraint upon such issue of bills that the same should not exceed the maximum of $15,000,000.

In order to guard against all the hazards incident to fluctuations in trade, the Secretary of the Treasury was invested with authority to issue $5,000,000 of Government stock, should the same at any time be regarded as necessary, in order to place beyond hazard the prompt redemption of the bills which might be thrown into circulation.—Thus in fact making the issue of $15,000,000; and keeping in circulation never more than one and one-half dollars for every dollar in specie. When to this it is added that the bills are not only everywhere receivable in Government dues, but that the Government itself would be bound for their ultimate redemption, no rational doubt can exist that the paper which the Exchequer would furnish, would readily enter into general circulation, and be maintained at all times at or above par with gold and silver; thereby realizing the great want of the age, and fulfilling the wishes of the People. In order to reimburse the Government the expenses of the plan, it was proposed to invest the Exchequer with the limited authority to deal in bills of exchange, unless prohibited by the States in which an agency might be situated, having only thirty days to run, and bona fide basis. The Legislative will on this point might be so plainly announced as to avoid all pretext for partiality or favoritism. It was furthermore proposed to invest this Treasury agent with authority to receive on deposite, to a limited amount, the specie funds of individuals, and to grant certificates therefor, to be redeemed on presentation, under the idea, which is believed to be well founded, that such certificates would come in aid of the Exchequer bills in supplying a safe and ample paper circulation. Or, if in place of the contemplated dealings in exchange, the Exchequer should be authorized not only to exchange its bills for actual deposites of specie, but for specie or its equivalent to sell drafts, charging therefor a small but reasonable premium, I cannot doubt but that the benefits of the law would be speedily manifested in the revival of the credit, trade and business of the whole country. Entertaining this opinion it becomes my duty to urge its adoption upon Congress, by reference to the strongest considerations of the public interests, with such alterations in its detail as Congress may in its wisdom see fit to make.

I am well aware that this proposed alteration and amendment of the laws establishing the Treasury Department has encountered various objections, and that among others it has been proclaimed a Government Bank of fearful and dangerous import. It is proposed to confer upon it no extraordinary powers. It purports to do no more than pay the debts of the Government with the redeemable paper of the Government—in which respect it accomplishes precisely what the Treasury does daily at this time, in issuing to the public creditors the Treasury notes which, under law, it is authorized to issue. It has no resemblance to an ordinary Bank, as it furnishes no profits to private stockholders, and lends no capital to individuals. If it be objected to as a Government Bank, and the objection be available—then should all the laws in relation to the Treasury be repealed, and the capacity of the Government to collect what is due to it, or pay, what it owes, be abrogated.

This is the chief purpose of the proposed Exchequer; and surely if, in the accomplishment of a purpose so essential, it affords a sound circulating medium to the country and facilities to trade, it should be regarded as no slight recommendation of it to public consideration. Properly guarded be the provisions of law, it can run into no dangerous evil, nor can any abuse arise under it but such as the Legislaure itself will be answerable for, if it be tolerated; since it is but the creature of the law, and is susceptible at all times of modification, amendment or repeal, at the pleasure of Congress. I know that it has been objected that the system would be liable to be abused by the Legislature, by whom alone it could be abused, in the party conflicts of the day.—That such abuse would manifest itself in a change of the law which would authorize an excessive issue of paper for the purpose of inflating prices and winning popular favor. To that it may be answered that the ascription of such a motive to Congress is altogether gratuitous and inadmissible.—The theory of our institutions would lead us to a different conclusion, but a perfect security against a proceeding so reckless would be found to exist in the very nature of things. The political party which should be so blind to the true interests of the country as to resort to such an expedient, would inevitably meet with a final overthrow in the fact that, the moment the paper ceased to be convertible into specie or otherwise promptly redeemed, it would become worthless, and would in the end, dishonor the government, involve the people in ruin, and such political party in hopeless disgrace. At the same time, such view involves the utter impossibility of furnishing any currency other than that of the precious metals; for, if the government itself cannot forego the temptation of excessive paper issues, what reliance can be placed in corporations upon whom the temptations of individual aggrandizement would most strongly operate? The people would have to blame none but themselves for any injury that might arise from a course so reckless, since their agents would be the wrong doers, and they the passive spectators.

There can be but three kinds of public currency. 1st. Gold and silver; 2d. The paper of state institutions; or, 3d. A representative of the precious metals provided by the General government, or under its authority. The Sub-Treasury system rejected the last in any form; and as it was believed that no reliance could be placed on the issues of local institutions, for the purposes of a general circulation, it necessarily and unavoidably adopted specie as the exclusive currency for its own use.

And this must ever be the case unless one of the other kinds be used. The choice in the present state of public sentiment, lies between an exclusive specie currency on the one hand, and government issues of some kind on the other. That these issues cannot be made by a chartered institution is supposed to be conclusively settled.

They must be made then directly by Government agents. For several years past they have been thus made in the form of Treasury notes, and have answered a valuable purpose. Their usefulness has been limited by their being transient and temporary; their ceasing to bear interest at given periods, necessarily causes their speedy return, and thus restricts their range of circulation, and being used only in the disbursements of government, they cannot reach those points where they are most required.

By rendering their use permanent, to the moderate extent already mentioned, by offering no inducement for their return and by exchanging them for coin and other values, they will constitute to a certain extent, the general currency so much needed to maintain the internal trade of the country. And this is the Exchequer Plan, so far as it may operate in furnishing a currency.

I cannot forego the occasion to urge its importance to the credit of the Government in a financial point of view. The great necessity of resorting to every proper and becoming expedient in order to place the Treasury on a footing of the highest respectability, is entirely obvious. The credit of the Government may be regarded as the very soul of the Government itself—a principle of vitality without which all its movements are languid and all its operations embarrassed. In this spirit the Executive felt itself bound by the most imperative sense of duty to submit to Congress, at its last session, the propriety of making a specific pledge of the land fund, as the basis for the negotiation of the loans authorized to be contracted. I then thought that such an application of the public domain would, without doubt, have placed at the command of the Government ample funds to relieve the Treasury from the temporary embarrassments under which it labored. American credit has received a considerable shock in Europe, from the large indebtedness of the States and the temporary inability of some of them to meet the interest on their debts.

The utter and disastrous prostration of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, had contributed largely to increase the sentiment of distrust by reason of the loss and ruin sustained by the holders of its stock, a large portion of whom were foreigners, and many of whom were alike ignorant of our political organization, and of our actual responsibilities. It was the anxious desire of the Executive that, in the effort to negotiate the loan abroad, the American negotiator might be able to point the money lender to the fund mortgaged for the redemption of the principal and interest of any loan he might contract and thereby vindicate the government from all suspicion of bad faith or inability to meet its engagaments. Congress differed from the Executive in this view of the subject. It became nevertheless the duty of the Executive to resort to every expedient in its power to negotiate the authorized loan.

After a failure to do so in the American market, a citizen of high character and talent was sent to Europe with no better success; and thus the mortifying spectacle has been presented of the inability of this Government to obtain a loan so small as not in the whole to amount to more than one-fourth of its ordinary annual income; at a time when the Governments of Europe, although involved in debt, and with their subjects heavily burdened with taxation, readly obtain loans of any amount at a greatly reduced rate of interest. It would be unprofitable to look further into this anomalous state of things, but I cannot conclude without adding that, for a Government which has paid off its debts of two wars with the largest maratime power of Europe, and now owing a debt which is almost next to nothing when compared to its boundless resources, a Government the strongest in the world, because emanating from the popular will, and firmly rooted in the affections of a great and free people, and whose fidelity to its engagements has never been questioned; for such a government to have tendered to the capitalists of other countries an opportunity for a small investment of its stocks, and yet to have failed, implies either the most unfounded distrust in its faith, or a purpose to obtain which the course pursued is the most fatal which could have been adopted. It has now become obvious to all men that the Government must look to its own means for supplying its wants, and it is consoling to know that these means are altogether inadequate for the object. The Exchequer, if adopted, will greatly aid in bringing about this result. Upon what I regard as a well-founded supposition that its bills would be readily sought for by the public creditors, and that the issue would in a short time reach the maximum of $15,000,000, it is obvious that $10,000,000 would thereby be added to the available means of the Treasury without cost or charge. Nor can I fail to urge the great and beneficial effects which would be produced in aid of all the active pursuits of life. Its effects upon the solvent State Banks, while it would force into liquidation those of an opposite character through its weekly settlements, would be highly beneficial; and with the advantages of a sound currency, the restoration of confidence and credit would follow, with a numerous train of blessings.

My convictions are most strong that these benefits would flow from the adoption of this measure; but if the result should be adverse there is this security in connection with it, that the law creating it may be repealed at the pleasure of the Legislature, without the slightest implication of its good faith.

I recommend to Congress to take into consideration the propriety of re-imbursing a fine imposed on General Jackson at New Orleans at the time of the attack and defense of that city, and paid by him. Without designing any reflection on the judicial tribunal which imposed the fine, the remission at this day may be regarded as not unjust or inexpedient. The voice of the civil authority was heard amid the glitter of arms and obeyed by those who held the sword, thereby giving additional lustre to a memorable military achievement. If the laws were offended, their majesty was fully vindicated; and although the penalty incurred and paid, is worthy of little regard in a pecuniary point of view, it can hardly be doubted that it would be gratifying to the war-worn-veteran, now in retirement and in the winter of his days, to be relieved from the circumstances in which that judgment placed him.

There are cases in which public functionaries may be called on to weigh the public interest against their own personal hazards, and if the civil law be violated from praiseworthy motives, or an overruling sense of public danger and public necessity, punishment may well be restrained within that limit which asserts and maintains the authority of the law, and the subjection of the military to the civil power. The defense of New Orleans, while it saved a city from the hands of the enemy, placed the name of General Jackson among those of the greatest Captains of the age, and illustrated one of the brightest pages of our history. Now that the causes of excitement, existing at the time, have ceased to operate, it is believed that remission of this fine, and whatever of gratification that remission might cause the eminent man who incurred and paid it, would be in accordance with the general feeling and wishes of the American People.

I have thus, my fellow citizens, acquitted myself of my duty under the Constitution, by laying before you, as succinctly as I have been able, the state of the Union, and by inviting your attention to measures of much importance to the country. The Executive will most zealously unite its efforts with those of the Legislative Department in the accomplishment of all that is required to relieve the wants of a common constituency, or elevate the destinies of a beloved country. THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, December 21, 1842.

Eld. John Davis.

This venerable minister of the gospel died at his residence in Lewis co., Va., on the 22d of June last, at the advanced age of 87. He received ordination about the year 1800 He was a soldier in the revolution, and has drawn a pension for that service.—For some years he has been too infirm in body and enfeebled in intellect to attend to the ministry of the word. At the time of his death he was the oldest minister in the denomination.

Sabbath Discussion.

Rev. A. Estee is publishing a series of articles on the subject of the Sabbath in the Bridgeton (N. J.) Chronicle, and Rev. Lucius Crandall is also publishing a series of Sabbath articles in "John the Baptist," published at Providence, R. I.

☞ Our readers will not fail to see that our Editorial department has received but little attention. This is owing partly to an inflamation in one of our eyes, which prevents us from seeing much, and partly to the fact that the President's Message occupies so much space.

President's Message.

We give it entire this week, to the exclusion of other matter. It is probable that all of our readers will wish to see it, and that many of them would not obtain it in another way.

De Ruyter Institute.—The fall term closes to-day. The winter term will commence on Friday, the 30th inst.

Congressional News.

From the New York Tribune.

Washington, Dec 7, 1842.

A quorum of the Senate convened to-day, and thus both Houses of Congress being duly organized, the Annual Message of the President, which will have reached you and been presented to your readers before the arrival of this.

In Senate, Hon. S. C. Crafts of Vt., elected vice Judge Prentiss resigned, and Hon. Wm. Dayton of N. Jersey, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the decease of the late Hon. Samuel L. Southard, appeared, were qualified, and took their seats.

On motion of Mr. Merrick, the usual resolution for supplying Senators with papers, was adopted.

Mr. Benton gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal the Bankrupt Law.

Mr. Tallmadge gave notice of the introduction of a bill to amend the several acts establishing the Treasury department of the United States.

The resolution from the House, for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President, &c., was concurred in. Messrs. Kerr and King were appointed on the part of the Senate, who having performed the duty, soon returned and reported that the President would forthwith make a communication in writing to both Houses.

The Message was received and read by the Secretary. On motion of Mr. Kerr the usual number—1500 with and 2500 without the accompanying documents—were ordered printed.

A message was received from the House announcing the death of Hon. James W. Williams of Md., and after a few remarks from Mr. Kerr, laudatory of the character of the deceased, resolutions of respect to his memory were adopted and the Senate adjourned.

In the House, Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson gave notice that he should to-morrow, or at the earliest opportunity introduce a resolution to rescind the one-hour rule.

Mr. Adams called up his resolution to rescind the 21st rule excluding Abolition petitions, (the subject having been laid over till to-day by the refusal of the House yesterday to order the main question on the adoption of the resolution.)

The Speaker decided that the question yesterday ordered remained in force, and that the question now recurred on ordering the main question.

After some conversation on this point of order by Messrs. Pickens, Adams, and Everett,

Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered at the call of Mr. Briggs, and by a vote of 1 majority—viz: Yeas 90, Noes 91—the House refused to lay the Resolution on the table.

The question then recurring on ordering the main question, was taken and decided in the negative: Yeas 91, Nays 93. So the resolution again lies over till to-morrow.

Mr. Wise moved the re-appointment of the Select Committee of last Session on the public printing: carried.

Notices were given by various members of the introduction of bills. Among those of importance are the following: by Mr. Barnard, authorizing the issue of convertible Exchequer bills and further to amend the laws establishing the Treasury Department.

News of the Day.

A Treasury Robbed.—The Treasury Office of Morgan County, Ohio, was entered by means of false keys, on the night of the 5th inst., and robbed of about 19,000, about $300 of which was specie.

Some men in digging lately near the village of Happenbuhl, in Denmark, discovered at the depth of 15 feet an antique barque, formed out of a single oak tree, rounded at the bottom. It was much decayed by the moisture of its bed, but it is ascertained to have been 32 feet in length, 2 feet deep, and 2 1-2 feet broad at the middle. There were on each side several holes made with a borer, but no trace of mails or any iron work could be found. On the spot where it lay, there ran in ancient days a canal, which united the rivers Eider and Hever. This canal was dedicated to the god Oegir, the Neptune of the Scandinavians: but on the introduction of Christianity was filled up. It is therefore probable this boat had its existence in the eighth or, at least, in the ninth century. It has been purchased by the Government, with the intent of placing it among the northern antiquities of the public museum, which contains very few relics of the navigation of the aboriginals of Scandinavia.

Novel Parcel.—On Thursday night a somewhat novel parcel was received into the Glasgow post-office, viz. a pair of Boots, whose destination is Bombay, and for the transmission of which £6 sterling were paid as postage. The reduction of the rates has been the means of sending some very strange packets through the post, and the transmission of ladies' slippers from one place to another has become quite common; but we have never heard of Gentlemen's boots undertaking so long a journey under the care of the post office, and cannot help thinking they will be rather a costly pair to the destined wearer.—Glasgow Chronicle.

It will give great pleasure to the friends of Mr. Caruthers, Mr. Gentry, Mr. Lane, and Mr. Wallace, Representatives in Congress, who were so severely injured by the overturning of the stage in Ohio whilst traveling on to attend Congress, to learn that they reached this city yesterday, all still suffering, but improving.

Senator Smith, of Indiana, is still behind, but is recovering also from his hurts, and may be expected on in a day or two.

It gives us pain to learn, through a letter received from a member of his family, that Mr. Habersham, Representative in Congress from Georgia, was, on the 4th of this month, lying "extremely ill" at his residence in the State of Georgia.

The Grand Jury of Delaware county yesterday presented the Hon. Thomas F. Marshall, for fighting a duel. Col. Webb escaped the like notice by reason of his having occupied a position on the other side of the line during the fight.

The Century Plant, loaned for exhibition to the Albany Orphan Asylum by Gen. Van Rensselaer, has yielded to that Institution upwards of $2,000.

Some wicked wag says that Miller, the prophet, lately consoled a woman who had fallen into the fire, by assuring her that the pain she suffered, was nothing to what was coming.

Quick Traveling.—By the completion of the "last link," in the Fredericksburgh and Potomac rail road, the Globe thinks a man may travel from Portsmouth, New Hampshire, via Washington, to Augusta, (Ga.,) a distance of 1,068 miles, in about four days, which is at the rate of 267 miles per day!

Some money—161 Spanish dollars and a quantity of bills, was found in the ground at Cambridge, on Wednesday last, near a tree on which the name of Michael Martin was found. Martin was hung here some years ago for highway robbery. The money was found by some boys, a dog having pawed up one of the dollars.—Bunker Hill Aurora.

A petition addressed to the Common Council of New York, is in circulation, praying that the $1,000 which was sent to the sheriff by some unknown person to induce him not to hang Colt, may be secured to the widow of Samuel Adams (who was killed by Colt,) and the infant child of the latter.

The Boundary.—Capt. Talcott, of the corps of Topographical Engineers, states in a recent letter to the Secretary of State, that the extent of the boundary line separating the United States and Territories from the British possessions, and lying between the monument of the St. Croix and the Stony Mountains, is estimated as follows for each adjacent State,

New Hampshire,	40
Vermont,	90
New York,	420
Pennsyvania	20
Ohio	200
Michigan	740
Territory west of Lake Superior	1,159
Total length of boundary line	3,130

A new Jewish synagogue, built of brick, was dedicated at Easton, Pa., a few days since.

We understand that the four midshipmen recently engaged in a duel near Norfolk, have had their names struck from the roll of the Navy.

In Sweden, there are already upwards of fifty thousand pledged temperance members. Whenever, in that country, the work has been carried on by a clergyman, it has swept all before it. In one place not a drop of liquor has been drank at any of the weddings for sixteen months. In another, two hundred stills have been stopped.

The House of Representatives of New Hampshire have declared by a vote of 111 to 106, in favor of the abolition of capital punishment.

Immigration to Florida.—The tide has, we think, fairly set in. The incubus under which we have so long labored is fast disappearing. Last week a party from Houston county, ten in number, passed through this city on their way to explore the country in the neighborhood of Indian River, and select suitable sites for settlements.—On Friday last another party followed, who bring intelligence of others who are on the route.—St. Augustine Herald.

A very wealthy planter in Woodford Co., Ky., says: "I had rather be taxed for the poor boy's education, than the poor man's ignorance: for one or the other I am compelled to do."

The Dark Day.—The 19th of May, 1780, was a remarkable day. Candles were lighted in many houses; the birds were silent and disappeared, and the fowls retired to roost. The legislature of Connecticut was then in session at Hartford. A very general opinion prevailed, that the day of judgment was at hand. The House of Representatives being unable to transact their business, adjourned. A proposal to adjourn the Council was under consideration. Abraham Davenport, of Stamford, was then a member of the legislature; and his opinion being asked, he answered, "I am against an adjournment. The day of judgment is either approaching, or it is not; if it is, I choose to be found doing my duty; I wish, therefore, that candles may be brought."

Serville Insurrection.—We learn from the clerk of the steamer Missouri, that considerable excitement prevails in the neighboring parishes of Concordia, Madison, and Carroll, in consequence of the discovery of a contemplated rising of the negroes. It appears that there are now in the swamps of that region about 300 runaway negroes belonging to the parishes named, all of whom it is presumed, are armed. Some fifteen or twenty negroes have been arrested and examined; and from the facts elicited on the examination, it is believed that an insurrection was contemplated about Christmas.—The plot seems to have been extensive, embracing in its operations negroes from nearly every plantation in the three parishes.—N. O. Tropic.

LATER FROM CAMPEACHY.

General engagement between the Yucatecos and Mexicans. Capture by the Mexicans of the U. S. Steamer Champion and schooner Anna Maria.

By an arrival on the 2d instant, at New Orleans of the schooner Freland, Captain Smith, from Campeachy, the Crescent City has news up to the 22d ult.

A general engagement had taken place outside the walls of the city which lasted for several hours. The loss in killed and wounded on the part of the Mexicans, amounted to over two hundred. The loss of the Yucatecos was estimated at 150. Both parties thinking they had punished each other sufficiently for the time being, retired from the field to recruit for another engagement.

The Mexican army was decreasing rapidly; their loss from death and desertions amounted to over 500 since their landing at Champotan.

The schr. Anna Maria, Capt. Peters, hence for Campeachy, laden with flower and corn, owned in New Orleans, and sailing under the U. S. flag, was captured by the Mexican fleet as she was entering the port. The steamer Champion Capt. Hutton, hence from Tobasco, was also captured by the Mexican fleet.

The army of Yucatan was over 9,000 strong, and were receiving daily reinforcements from the interior. The enemy asked a capitulation, wich was peremtorily denied, the "natives" hoisted a red flag, and expressing a dertermination to resist the invading force, or perish in the attempt.

From the above it will be seen that the presence of an American fleet is imperiously demanded.

A bird's-eye view of the Commerce of New York.—There are now in port

70 ships,	equal to	32,385 tons.
22 barks,	"	5,599 "
62 brigs,	"	10,557 "
262 schrs.,	"	21,650 "
261 sloops,	"	15,086 "
Being in all		85.273 tons.

There are also 83 steamboats, including the ferry boats, amounting to about 17,495 tons. Of the ships, barks and brigs, about one-third are for sale, or lying idle, about one-third for freight or charter, and the balance taking in and discharging cargoes. Those lying idle are doing by far the best business at the present time, as the going freights are so low, and seamen's wages so high, that in whatever direction a merchant sends his ship to carrry, or seek freight, she must inevitably sink money for him.—One of the four first class Liverpool Packets arrived a short time since, with only a freight of four hundred and eighty dollars on board, and about the same time one of our first class London Packets arrived with only forty dollars freight. The regular New Orleans Packet Ships, which average about 600 tons each, make out only about six hundred dollars freight, a sum not sufficient to pay their tonnage up and down the Mississippi River. Their freights home are on an average only about equal to their port charges at New Orleans;—The averge rates of freight obtained for New Orleans, a distance of about two thousand miles, do not exceed 25 cts. per barrel; a sum about 20 per cent. less than our carmen charge for carrying a load the distance of one-fourth of a mile.—Cour. Enq.

Audubon's Ornithology.—Several numbers of Audubon's smaller work on Ornithology, in octavo form, have been issued The price of the work complete, is $100. The venerable author, on his return from Canada, stated to the editor of the Troy Whig, that he had discovered in the vicinity of Quebec a new species of Flying Squirrel, three times the size of the common Flying Squirrel. To use his own language—"he is a magnificent fellow, and will prove a valuable acquisition to my Quadrupeds."

The Old Hancock House.—Joe Sykes, of the N. Y. Commercial, thus speaks of the venerable mansion in Beacon street. "The old mansion house of John Hancock, the distinguished patriot and friend to liberty, whose name is so conspicuous on the Declaration of Independence, is in good preservation. It is elevated high above the level of the street on which it stands; is built of stone, and bears a venerable appearance. Did one drop of his blood run in my veins, I would not for the price of two such houses suffer one stone or tile to be touched by any modern improvement; and such appears to be the disposition of those who own it, for thus far it has been spared. Let no man come to Boston without visiting these mementoes of olden times and better men."

Commerce of Quebec.—There arrived at Quebec in 1838, 1031 vessels, exclusive of these from the lower ports and river; in 1840, 1234; in 1841, 1251; in 1842, only 856.

Fishy.—A recent writer on Fishology says that it is quite an act of mercy in men to catch fish—as, when they are not provided for in this way, the "surplus population" fall to, at certain periods, and devour each other. This is perfectly reasonable, and is merely following the example set them by human beings. This writer says that immense banks of the bones of fish thus disposed of are at present being formed at the bottom of the sea. One in particular may be mentioned, lying east of the Faroe Islands; this bank is composed almost entirely of bones, and it is two miles and a half long.

Judge Watts, of New Orleans, has decided in the case of a contested election, that witnesses could not be required by law to declare for whom they voted.—Their avowal must be voluntary, if made at all. This reverses Judge Buchanan's decision on the same question.

Important from Havana.—A letter from Havana was received last evening by our neighbors of the Tropic, from which we have been politely allowed to copy.

It seems that an expedition has been fitted out at Havana, to act against St. Domingo. The cause is as follows: Some time since, the Haytiens, contrary to the provisions in the recognition of their independence by the several European powers, fitted out a small armed vessel, which, cruizing in these seas, put into Porto Rico. The authorities immediately took possession of her, and the Haytiens, to retaliate, have fitted out a corvette and taken several Spanish merchantmen. On learning these facts, the Governor of Cuba immediately ordered all the Spanish man-of-war in the West Indies to rendezvous at Porto Rico, and then to act according to orders, and as circumstances may require. The force of the squadron will be—a 50 gun frigate, four brigs of from 18 to 28 guns, two steamers with 4 carronades, and a 68 pound Paixhan each, and several schooners. The only force possessed by the Haytiens, is said to be a sloop-of-war mounting 24 guns.

The writer of the letter closes by saying—"You may expect to hear of some bloody scenes yet."—N. O. Pic.

Notices.

TO THE LOCAL AGENTS OF THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

DEAR BRETHREN:—You will observe by the Minutes of the last session of the Society, that we are instructed to exert our utmost to settle up its concerns. Therefore, we would request each of you to do what you can in your several neighborhoods, to ascertain the state of the funds, and collect all that may be due, as far as possible; and transmit what you may thus collect to the Treasurer, Henry C. Hubbard, of Scott, and to give us a correct account of the state of the funds in your hands as soon as possible. We hope that each of you will attend to it without delay; for delays are dangerous. And as S. S. Griswold has been appointed by the Society, to collect its funds where he may travel, it is NECESSARY and EXPECTED, that those who are indebted to the Society, will be punctual and efficient in settling up the same.

WANTED,

Any amount of wood, hay, grain, pork, butter, lard, tallow, lumber, apples, &c., at this office, in payment of unsettled newspaper accounts.

DIED.

The 10th of January, 1842, on Green Briar Run, near New Salem, Va., after a protracted illness which she bore with christian fortitude, SALLY, consort of Eld Peter Davis, in her 56th year. Sister Davis has been a member of the New Salem church nearly 41 years. She has left a large circle of relations, children, &c., and a kind husband to mourn their loss; society has lost a worthy member, acquaintance a kind friend, and children a tender mother, but we doubt not her reward in heaven is great.

Near the same place the first of March, 1842, after a short illness, MARY JOSEPHINE, wife of Ziba Davis. This Sister, (removed by death in early life,) professed to love the Savior and joined the church here when quite young. She has left four small children, a bereaved husband, and a large circle of family connexions to mourn their unexpected, untimely loss, and we trust their loss is her gain. She expressed a willingness to depart and be with Jesus.

WM. TRUMAN, departed this life on Thursday the 18th Dec., at his residence in Amity, aged 38 years, 1 month, and 20 days, after a painful illness of 4 months, during which time he was deprived of his reason, excepting at intervals of short duration, during which he manifested a complete resignation to the will of heaven. He was a member of the Seventh-Day Baptist church in Friendship, and by his life and conversation, manifested the power of grace in subduing the power of sin. He has left a wife and family together with numerous relatives and friends to mourn his loss. His remains were committed to the grave last Sabbath, an appropriate discourse delivered by Eld. Campbell on the occasion.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and traveling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, trouble and expense. The principal advantage to be derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inksand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents — Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

THE Natural, Intellectual and Moral Sciences, are taught by the different Instructors, as best suits the circumstances according the formation of classes, except those mentioned above, which are always taught by the same Teacher.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen, and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the students; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable as profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1842, followed also by a vacation of four weeks.

POETRY.

IS THERE AN UNBELIEVER?

BY THOS. H. BAILEY.

Is there an unbeliever?
  One man who walks the earth,
And madly doubts that Providence
  Watched o'er him at his birth?
He robs mankind for ever
  Of hope beyond the tomb;
What gives he as a recompense!
  The brute's unhallowed doom!

In manhood's loftiest hour,
  In health, and strength, and pride,
O! lead his steps through valleys green,
  Where rills 'mid cowslips glide;
Climb nature's granite tower,
  Where man hath rarely trod;
And will he then, in such a scene,
  Deny there is a God!

Yes!—the proud heart will ever
  Prompt the false tongue's reply!
An omnipresent Providence
  Still madly he'll deny;
But see the unbeliever
  Sinking in death's decay;
And hear the cry of penitence!
  He never learned to pray.

MARRIAGE CUSTOMS.

It is a laudable, and not wholly a useless curiosity, that loves to trace existing social customs to their source. Most civilized nations observe certain rites and ceremonies in marriage, the history of which would be at least amusing. The customs of ancient oriental nations, in this particular, are important to be known, in order to the elucidating of many passages of Scripture; and every intelligent reader of the Bible must know of these customs.

As Christianity was carried forth among the nations first by the Jews, it was natural that Christians, for the first generation, should adopt the marriage customs of the Jews. But after Christianity was adopted by many nations it should mingle with, and modify the Jewish customs. The nations, under the Roman rule, would be influenced by Roman laws and customs. Before this, one of the Roman marriage rites was that called confarreatio, in which a sacrifice was offered, and a cake used, made of corn. This required the presence of ten witnesses. Another Roman marriage rite was called coemptio. This was was a farce, in which the parties married pretended to purchase each other with a piece of coin. Though Christians rejected the Roman customs, so far as they embodied the rites of pagan worship, yet it might not be difficult to find remnants of these customs in some existing usages; say, for instance, the use of the cake and the ring.

In the early Greek Church, there were two principal forms of celebrating marriage; one by presenting the ring, and the other by coronation of the married pair.—The first was on this wise: The persons to be married stood at the door of the chapel. Two rings, one of gold and one of silver, were placed on the table. The priest made the sign of the cross three times on the head of both, and gave them lighted wax candles in imitation of the nuptial torches of pagans; and then led them into the chapel, where incense was burnt, and a prayer chanted by the choir. Then the deacon uttered a short prayer for the bridegroom and bride, that God would give them children, and peace, and harmony, and all prosperity; the people responding to every petition, Kurie, eleeson—Lord, have mercy. Then the priest took the ring and gave the golden one to the bridegroom, the silver one to the bride, and said, "This servant of God, by this token, espouses this handmaid of God; in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, now and forever, Amen." Then turning to the woman, he said, "This handmaid of God," &c. Next repeating the sign of the cross upon their heads, he placed the rings on the fingers of their right hands. Then he closed with a prayer, which consists of several perversions of Scripture, to make it give a warrant for such a use of the ring. And after the benediction, the parties were dismissed, unless in case where the ceremony of crowning was added to this.

The early Russians being of the Greek Church, had rites somewhat similar, but in some respects different. The bride was presented to the bridegroom at the altar, by the priest. Upon which she prostrated herself, touching her head to his shoe, in token of obedience; and he responded by his skirt over her, in token of protection. And to the other ceremonies they added that of breaking bread, as a sort of ratification of the covenant. In the midst of songs and dances the priest was wont to approach the bridegroom, and chant one of the Psalms of David, and then take hold of his hair, and thus address him:—"Tell the, bridegroom, can you be husband to this tender woman? Will you not sometimes chastise her with rods? Will you never forsake her when sick or decrepid?" He then solemnly pledges himself to perform the offices of a good husband. Then the priest turns and interroagates the bride—"Whether she will take good care of her husband's family, and even if he should be blind, or crooked, or decrepid?" As soon as she assents, the priest places upon the head of both a wreath of flowers; and around the circumference of the crown are inserted the words, "INCREASE AND MULTIPLY." At this instant, each of the guests lights a wax candle, and the foaming goblet is presented to the priest; he drinks to the new married pair, and they empty it and return it to him. Then dancing commences, and the ceremony is finished.

The Abysinians, in ther marriages, were wont to practice ceremonies peculiar to themselves; but which, as signs of mutual contract, supply the place of other ceremonies used by Hebrews. The bride and bridegroom were wont to sit on a couch, at the door of the church, when the priest came up, attended with two clerks, or assistants. He held a cross in his left hand, and a censor in his right, and perfumed the couch with incense three times, while his clerks sung a psalm. Next he cut off a part of the hair of the bridegroom, and then off the bride, and dipped it in wine sweetened with honey. Then he took the bridegroom's hair and placed it on the head of the bride; and that of the bride, and put it on the head of the bridegroom, in the place where the lock was cut. Then, having brought water and consecrated it he placed his hands upon the head of each, admonishing them that they should observe, that God in the Gospel had made them one flesh, no more to be separated. After this the eucharist was celebrated, and the ceremony finished.

The reason for the use of the ring is thus given by Isodorus:—"The giving of a ring by the bridegroom to the bride, may be either a sign of mutual love, or rather that the hearts of both were joined by the same pledge. Whence the ring is placed on the fourth finger. Because it is said, a certain vein in that finger reaches even to the heart." Though the modern anatomist would smile at such a reason, it is doubtless as good as can be given. And Appio, an ancient author, speaking of Egyptian observations upon anatomy, says, that the Egyptians "found a very slender nerve, extending from the fourth finger to the heart." And he gives this reason why the ancient Greeks and Romans wore rings upon that finger, and bestowed upon it such honor, to wit, because it contained a connexion with the heart. Thus the use of the ring, and the wearing of it on a particular finger, and the use of it in marriage, originated with pagans. But the practice was early admitted among Christians, as may be shown both from Clement of Alexandria, and from Tertullian. And the use of a ring, as a symbol of contracts, became common in other matters, such as the manumission of slaves the making of a will, &c.

In the ancient laws of the Visigoths, a ring given and received in pledge, with a statement of the contract before witnesses, was equal to a writing, as giving validity to a contract. And some of the ancient liturgies contain this form of nuptial benediction;—"Bless, O Lord, this ring, and this crown; that as the ring surrounds the finger of a man, and the crown the head, so the grace of the Holy Spirit may surround the bridegroom and bride, that they may see sons and daughters, even to the third and fourth generation."—N. E. Puritan.

MARRIAGES IN PERSIA.—Marriages in Persia are contracted by the parents, and the betrothment takes place at a very early age. The bridegroom is consequently spared the wooing and the winning, since this is all done for him by parental kindness. The courtship is performed by proxy; so also is the marriage ceremony. I was curious to learn how the contract was entered into, since the groom is never permitted to see his bride until three days after marriage.—She is reported to him by some female negotiator to be "more blooming than the rose, more odoriferous than the violet, better formed than Hebe," at which description "his heart becomes a coal, and his liver is dried up." He then contracts with her parents for the dower which he is to bestow on his wife. The contract being settled, a moolah signs it, and the ceremony soon after takes place, each party being within hearing at the time, but not visible. The service is short and simple. "I, N., the authorized proxy for you, M., do take L., to be his perpetual wife, for such dower as you have agreed upon." The other replies, "I, M., the authorized proxy for you, L., do take him for her perpetual husband, upon condition of the dower agreed upon by both parties." Some prayers are then read by the moolah, and he inquires of each of the invisible persons whether they agree to the contract. They answer in the affirmative, and he then declares them to be lawful man and wife. When the ceremony is at an end, the veil is thrown over the bride which is brought for her by the groom; she is furnished with some aromatic seeds, which she must eat on arrival at the house of her husband, in order to have a sweet breath in his presence; a little samphor of rose water is given her. The bride sets out on horseback for her new residence, accompanied by all her relatious, who carry with them presents of sweetmeats. She then begins her poetic invocation:

"Holy Prophet, grant, I pray,
On this happy nuptial day,
That my husband and his mother,
Cousin, sister, uncle, brother,
Sanction, without stint or measure,
Everything that gives me pleasure."

The feasting then begins, and continues for three days. With some great men it continues thirty or forty days, but with the poorest person never less than three days. The grade of society is much known by the time of keeping up this festival. Some extravagant and reckless persons have spent their all on this festive occasion. The occasional disappointment in this blindfolded bargain reminds one of Rachel and Leah. No Persian would marry a woman who had been subjected to the gaze of other men. I knew an instance of a khan that offered as much as a thousand tomauns to her father, to be allowed to see his bride elect, which was refused. It is deemed absolute pollution. But under this veiled mystification, mistakes have sometimes occurred of marrying the wrong woman.—Three Years in Persia.

THE BLUE YARN STOCKINGS.—When Dr. Franklin was received at the French court as American minister, he felt some scruples of conscience in complying with their fashions as to dress. "He hoped," he said to the minister, "that as he was himself a very plain man, and represented a plain republican people, the king would indulge his desire to appear at court in his usual dress. Independent of this, the season of the year he said, rendered the change from yarn stockings to fine silk, somewhat dangerous.

The French minister made him a bow, but said, that THE FASHION was too sacred a thing for him to meddle with, but he would do himself the honor to mention it to his MAJESTY.

The king smiled, and returned word that Dr. Franklin was welcome to appear at court in any dress he pleased. In spite of that delicate respect for strangers, for which the French are so remarkable, the courtiers could not help staring at first, at Dr. Franklin's quaker-like dress, and especially at his "BLUE YARN STOCKINGS. But it soon appeared that he had been introduced upon this splendid theatre only to demonstrate that great genius, like true beauty, "needs not the aid of foreign ornament." The court were so dazzled with the brilliancy of his mind that they never looked at his stockings. And while many other ministers who figured in the gaudy fashions of the day are now forgotten, the name of Dr. Franklin is still mentioned in Paris with all the ardor of the most affectionate enthusiasm.—Weems.

"HE PAYS ME WELL FOR MY TROUBLE," said a man the other day, in giving a good character to some one he called a gentleman. This is the secret of a vast deal of the civility of this world.

"He pays us well for our trouble," say the crowd, and they throw up their caps and hats and halloo for the great man.

"He pays me well for my trouble," says the man in the distillery, who works day and night to prepare the juice of Circes' cup, which transforms into beasts.

"She pays me well for my trouble," says the milliner, when fitting the rack to the bust of some beauty, which is to torture her to an untimely grave.

"They pay me well for my trouble," says the soldier, and hacks away from the right to left upon young and old.—no matter, if he but cuts down flesh and blood.

"He paid me well for my trouble," says the watchman, looking at the X by the next lamp, which some "gentlemanly" rogue gave him to "keep dark."

"He paid me well for my trouble," said the rogue in horses, who sold a spavined, broken-winded, lame and exhausted creature to a poor foolish youth, and took him in execution the next day.

"He pays me well for my trouble," says the rumseller, who takes, cent by cent, the drundard's all, little thinking of the "trouble," prepared for him on "the other side," when he finds that for all the fire of the still he has disposed of here, he has obtained an interest, gill by gill, in the fire that never quenches there.

"He pays me well for my trouble," says the lawyer, when he labors day and night to free some wealthy rogue—and that "pay" has been omnipotent from the time when the Scythian said that "laws were like cobwebs, catching the little rogues while the great ones break through," to now.

"He pays me well for my trouble," says the murderer, and plunges his knife alike into the bosom of hoary age or childish innocence.

And finally, "He pays me well for my trouble," says the heartless slanderer, when he labors day and night to blast some rich man's enemy—"He pays me well for my trouble," and deep goes the iron down into the soul of his quivering victim—"He pays me well for my trouble," and the hope and happiness of the innocent are blasted forever. Well, let him see to it, that at last the devil does not feel well paid for his, also!

What sin is there, which grace cannot pardon? What heart is there, which grace cannot soften? What soul is there, which grace cannot save.

We should act with as much energy as those who expect every thing for themselves; and we should pray with as much earnestness as those who expect every thing from God.—Colton.

WHOLESOME ADVICE ELOQUENTLY URGED.—After all, perhaps the greatest lesson, which the lives of literary men teach us, is told in a single word; Wait!—Every man must patiently bide his time. He must wait. More particularly in lands, like my native land, where the pulse of life beats with such feverish and impatient throbs, is the lesson needful. Our national character wants the dignity of repose.—We seem to live in the midst of a battle—there is such a din—such a hurrying to and fro. In the streets of a crowded city it is difficult to walk slowly. You feel the rushing of the crowd, and rush with it onward. In the press of our life it is difficult to be calm. In this stress of wind and tide, all professions seem to drag their anchors, and are swept out into the main. The voices of the present say, come!—But the voices of the past say, wait!—With calm and solemn footsteps the rising tide bears against the rushing torrent up stream, and pushes back the hurrying waters. With no less calm and solemn footsteps, nor less certainly, does a great mind bear up against public opinion, and push back its hurrying stream. Therefore should every man wait; should bide his time. Not in listless idlenes—not in useless pastime—not in querilous dejection; but in constant, steady, cheerful endeavors, always willing and fulfilling, and accomplishing his task, that when the occasion comes, he may be equal to the occasion.—And if it never comes, what matters it? What matters it to the world, whether I, or you, or another man did such a deed, or wrote such a book, sobeit the deed and book were well done? It is the part of an indiscreet and troublesome ambition, to care too much about fame—about what the world says about us. To be always looking into the face of others for approval—to be always anxious for the effect of what we do say; to be always shouting to hear the echo of our own voices! If you look about you, you will see men, who are wearing life away in feverish anxiety of fame, and the last we shall ever hear of them will be the funeral bell, that tolls them to an early grave! Unhappy men, and unsuccessful! because their purpose is, not to accomplish well their task, but to clutch the 'trick and fantasy of fame;' and they go to their graves with purposes unaccomplished and wishes unfilled. Better for them, and for the world in their example, had they known how to wait! Believe me, the talent of success is nothing more than doing what you can do well; and doing well whatever you do—without a thought of fame. If it come at all, it will come because it is deserved, not because is sought after. And, moreover, there will be no misgivings—no disappointment—no hasty, feverish, exhausting excitement.

THE FLIES AND THE SPIDER.

Heedlessness or minding Good Advice.

An old fly meeting a young one, on a fine morning in autumn, warned him against going into any garden or field, as the spiders had worked webs among the trees to catch their prey, and would, without doubt, be killed and eaten by them.

The young fly heard the advice of the old one, but did not take it; for he ventured to the nearest garden, where he thought he could buzz delightfully about the arbor but in his way thither, he dashed into a large web, where he was caught. The old spider watched him slyly from the centre of his web, and delighted himself in hearing his cries and distress. At length he dashed down upon him, struck in his fangs and drew his blood.

"Alas!" said the poor fly, as he was fast dying, "an old friend told me of my danger, but I did not mind his advice."—"that was thy fault, not mine," said the spider, and he swallowed him up.

Children, kindly warned of danger, often run into it like this silly fly. They are not caught in the spider's web, for this is to catch flies, and not children; but they are often scalded, burnt, drowned, run over, or break their necks by some terrible falls; when, had they only minded what was said to them, they would have escaped.

Sin is more venomous and savage than the spider, and it is kind indeed, of those who warn us against running into its jaws; but, in spite of every warning, we still venture, and lie, swear, steal, break the Sabbath, and do other wicked things, we shall find, too late, that "the end of these things is death."—Cobbin's Fables.

THE PORTRAITS.—Did you ever hear the story of the two portraits? Come! I will tell it to you; for it is a striking one.

A painter who wanted a picture of innocence, drew the likeness of a child at prayer. The little suppliant was kneeling by the side of his mother, who regarded him with tenderness. The palms of his lifted hands were reverently pressed together; his rosy cheeks spoke of health, and his mild blue eye was upturned with an expression of devotion and peace.—This portrait of young Rupert was highly prized by the painter; for he had bestowed on it great pains; he hung it up in his study, and called it innocence.

Years rolled along, and the painter became an aged man; but the picture of innocence still adorned his study walls. Often had he thought of painting a contrast to his favorite portrait; but opportunity had not served. He had sought for a striking model of guilt, but had failed to find one. At last, he effected his purpose by paying a visit to a neighboring jail.

On the damp floor of his dungeon, lay a wretched culprit, named Randal, heavily ironed. Wasted was his body, worn was his cheek, and anguish unutterable was seen in his hollow eye; but this was not all; vice was visible in his face, guilt was branded, as with a hot iron on his brow, and horrid imprecations burst from his blasphemous tongue. The painter executed the task to the life, and bore away the successful effort of his pencil. The portrait of young Rupert and old Randal were hung, side by side, in his study; the one representing Innocence and the other Guilt.

But who was young Rupert who kneeled in prayer by the side of his mother in meek devotion? And who was old Randal, who lay manacled on the dungeon floor, cursing and blaspheming? Alas! the two were one! Young Rupert and old Randal were the same. Led by bad companions into the paths of sin, no wonder that young Rupert found bitterness and sorrow. The brow which in childhood was bright with peace and joy, in years became darkened by guilt and shame; and that heart which was once the abode of happiness, afterwards became the habitation of anguish. Fathers tell the tale to your children! Mothers, whisper it in the ears of your lisping little ones, that they may know betimes the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and the exceeding deceitfulness of the human heart. Well may youth and age walk humbly before God, putting up the prayer, "Keep me as the apple of the eye, hide me under the shadow of thy wings," Psa. xvi. 3.—Thoughts for the Thoughtful.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

VOL. III.—NO. 44.] JAMES BAILEY, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR. [WHOLE NO. 148.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,——The SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.—COMMANDMENT.——If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments.—JESUS CHRIST.

TWO DOLLARS IN ADVANCE.] DE RUYTER, N. Y., FOURTH-DAY, DECEMBER 28, 1842. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Sabbath Department.

Extracts From Carlow.

The law to alter the seventh day to the first, you may see before in the collections out of the Centuries was by the Bishops of Rome, who though they pretend to dispense with the laws of the Church, yet they ought not to alter the law of God in any point by any authority, but that which is equal to that which enacted it, no Pope or any man on Earth ought to pretend to an authority equal to the authority of God; so as if there be no divine precept for any other than the seventh day, then it is certain that no decrees of Popes, or councils, or any tradition can be of any force to alter that law God hath declared to be his law, and that disputes against it are intolerable, and that it is a controlling of the divine wisdom of God to make an alteration in his precepts. Charnock's Attributes, p. 400—404.

That no man ought to alter God's laws, I think has been agreed by all the great Protestant writers, and the reason is evident, the laws of God are above them all. (Prov. x. 8.) The wise in heart will receive the commandments, but a prating fool shall fall. It may be Mr. Ward may secretly wish that this fourth command for keeping holy the seventh day were not so plain, or that he could somewhere find it altered in the scriptures, because so plain a command not repealed nor altered there, and so confirmed by Christ and his Apostles, faces his conscience, answers all the objections, and throws down all the batteries raised against it; fain he would find some colorable objection to shelter himself in a continual violation of it; but still the law rises up, and over-throws all his opposition; and indeed it seems to me marvelous, that the observation of the weekly seventh day Sabbath should be so long laid aside here in a land of light, notwithstanding so direct and plain a command, and that the first day should so far obtain, for which they have so little to say; some at first by subtility have put all their wits and strength to defend it, an opinion blown up to a wonderful height, which God by his word can easily take down.

For the present some have altered, and in part abrogated this old command, and set up a contrary one in its stead, and so do become in this not only God's subjects, but his law givers; as if they could make a more holy righteous law than the law of God; and they have so far forsaken God's law, and walked after the imagination of their own hearts, (Jer. ix. 13.) in this taxing his wisdom, as if he did not understand. (Job 24, 22.) How unreasonable is this to impose any law upon God, and force him if they could to revoke his own: and now this law for the first day, being an universal law, and endeavored to be imposed on the universal church, can be excused from an high usurpation of the Divine Authority, and from accusing God as if he had not sufficiently done his work, I know not; and whatsoever some men write for obedience to their inventions, I cannot imagine they think any shall be condemned or blamed by the Lord at last, for not doing what he hath required in his word; or that they would have us live by the rules of tradition, when they know and acknowledge we must be judged by another rule, viz. by the word, and that the word of God which we have is the rule by which all worship, doctrines, conversation, discipline, and all mankind are to be tried in this world, and shall be finally judged at last, I take to be the great christian principle as to this, and that, which, as far as I can recollect is generally allowed by all the sound Protestants that I have read or known in the world, but some men under the colors of tradition usurp the Divine Authority against the commands of God; and if such write and plead for what, I think, I can shew is forbidden in the second command, and if they break in upon all the commands, for all which men may easily plead tradition in all ages, more or less, having brought forth some transgressors of all the commands, which to such arguers are historical evidences for such practices.

But follow no man farther than he follow Christ, and there is no principle more evident and universally confessed by all the reformed christians than that whatever God commands us in his worship, or otherwise that we are to do, be the things great or small; and when men can bind God's promises of assistance to their inventions, whether they be days or any thing else in his worship, or other duties of men, then and not before they may appoint a new day of rest; and that there is no law nor any word to be found in the scriptures which do most certainly contain the whole and perfect duty of man, which requires the keeping holy the first day of the week for the Sabbath; and that there is not one word of promise made to the observers of it, nor any promise of acceptance from the Lord for any person in that observation, and that there is not one word of threatning or displeasure there against those who do not observe it, not one word there which constitutes the first day for a Sabbath, and how can it be proved by Mr. Ward or any man to be of God, when the word of God does not tell us of it, nor one word that repeals or alters the fourth commandment in any jot or title, nor any power there given to any that are or ever shall be in the world, to make any alteration therein. And who can tell us the persons authorized from God to do this, which therefore as long as Heaven and Earth abides, seems to me unalterable, and shews that the seventh day is the true weekly christian Sabbath, and ought to be observed as long as the world endures, Luke 16, 17. Exod. 20, 10. Matt. 5. 17, 18.

As for tradition, so far as I can gather from my small stock of books, about the seventh day Sabbath, when the observation thereof ended, and about the first day when the observation thereof began amongst any christians, I have given some small account, hoping the world may hereafter have a more exact account thereof, if need be, from some one or other who have better abilities, a better library, and more youthful strength and leisure, whom I pray God to raise up in my stead.

Mr. Ward considers in his exposition the names of our days, Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, which being now the known names of the days, he thinks we need no more scruple the use of these names than to talk of Pope Pious Clement. To which I reply from one of his texts in Exod. 23, 13. Make no mention of the name of other Gods, neither let it be heard out of your mouth. Which refers to the idol names of the days of the week, which also proves the antiquity of Sunday from the Heathens worshiping the Sun as their God, the Sun was King and the Moon was Queen. Now causeless scruples I confess are a weakness, but a true consvientious tenderness of mind not to offend God in any thing, wherein his will in his word is made known to us, is as I think one of the most excellent things in man; and if Mr. Ward, under this notion of scruple, thinks to reflect upon conscientious obedience to the word of God, or any part thereof, which I hope he does not, if he does he will be much to blame; and God having so expressly forbidden the mention of the names of idols, as these were by which the days of the week are called, Sunsday, Moonsday, Tuiscosday, Wodensday, Thorsday, Frizasday, Saturnsday, and the Lord having also expressly given us in his word the proper true names, of the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth and Seventh day, which seventh day is called the Sabbath throughout the scriptures, however that may seem to Mr. Ward, I make no scruple to call the days of the week by the same names as the Lord called them, and if he will retain the old idol names without any scruple notwithstanding his own acknowledgment whence they are, and notwithstanding the plain word of God against them, I cannot help it; and it seems to me the most subtile of those who are fond of holding fast the idol names of days, do doubt the consequence of laying them aside, as if it might by degrees introduce both true names and Sabbath.

SUBLIMITY OF THE SACRED WRITINGS.

BY WM. G. HOWARD.

In respect of thought, the Bible is infinitely superior to any human productions. It opens with a pertinent example of sublimity. "And God said, let there be light, and there was light!" How brief, yet how comprehensive! No aim at beautiful diction, at a rounded period, at an exterior garb to charm by a pompous display. It is thought, deep thought, all thought. And how grand! A word, a command, and this majestic world arose at once into being; in all respects admirably suited for the residence of man. In the first chapter of the second book of Samuel is contained the remarkable elegy pronounced by the "Monarch Minstrel" of Israel on the death of Saul and Jonathan. "And David lamented with this lamentation over Saul, and over Jonathan, his son: The beauty of Israel is slain upon thy high places: how are the mighty fallen! Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph," etc. There is certainly an imitable pathos in this affecting elegy, written, as it was, in a country where literature never comparatively flourished. Judea never enjoyed so much as her sister states the lights of science and the arts, and yet we may challenge the world for an equal to this charming production of her gifted son.

The book of Job is one uninterrupted strain of fine writing throughout. No one can read it without being thrilled with delight, or awed with wonder. We can merely allude to a few of the more prominent passages. In the eleventh chapter, Zophar, the Naamathite, most eloquently inquires: "Canst thou by searching find out God, canst thou find out the Almighty to perfection? It is high as heaven; what canst thou do? deeper than hell; what canst thou know? The measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea." What majestic thought in the compass of a single sentence! How forcibly are the power and awful mystery which attach to Jehovah, depicted in the twenty-sixth chapter of the same book. The thirty-eighth and ninth, also embrace conceptions as great and imposing—conceptions deserving the deepest study and the most profound meditation. No one can enter into the spirit of fine writing, who is unacquainted with the sublimity of the Bible. And will any one suppose that such noble and brilliant ideas, pouring upon us incessantly like a mighty flood, are the offspring of the weak and groveling intellect of man? We wot not.

The Psalms of David are replete with passages supremely powerful. Turn over the leaves of these delightful poems, and see what surprising displays of genius—of inspired genius, are impressed on every page! Especially regard Psalm 18th and 19th. Here are specimens of graphic paintings unequaled in the history of intellectual achievement. But we cannot refer even to other equally magnificent specimens of the true sublime, which are scattered over almost every page of the writings of the "Sweet Singer." And we can only remark, in bidding adieu to the Old Testament, that Isaiah, and Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, as well as some of the minor Prophets, from all of which illustrations would be introduced, did space admit, have left on record specimens of composition, which are unequaled in beauty and grandeur.

It may be interesting now to pass, for a moment, to the New Testament, and ascertain whether it possesses in any degree the characteristics under consideration. A careful examination of the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, will satisfy any one that it exhibits examples of the true sublime not exceeded by the most striking and impressive passages to which we have alluded. Did there appear nothing else, that was marked and peculiar in the sacred volume, any rational mind would be at once convinced that no mere mortal pen ever wrote that brilliant description of the resurrection. What a glowing representation! how infinitely superior to any mortal conception! The revelations of St. John are of a piece with the foregoing, and evince most clearly their heavenly origin.—An elegant French writer, in his comments upon the French Revolution, has forcibly and happily introduced one of the sublimest of these metaphors. "I beheld France, like the burning mountain in the Apocalyptic vision, cast into the midst of the sea, and the waters thereof became blood." It would be pleasurable, indeed, to descant more at length upon this interesting topic, inasmuch as instances of real sublimity are thronged upon the mind from every page of the inspired volume, but our limits compel us to desist.

"SEEN OF ANGELS."

It is impossible to conceive what must have been the emotions with which the angelic host looked on, while the dreadful work proceeded from the moment of our Lord's agony in the garden, to that of his being taken down from the cross. We can hardly read those words, "Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than ten legions of angels?" without fancying every flaming sword among the listening myriads starting from its sheath, and every countenance blazing with ardor, to receive the command. They had witnessed the detestable act of the mercenary traitor; they had seen Satan enter into him and lead him to the guilty chief priests, and animate him to grasp with avaricious delight the wretched bribe, a goodly prize that they valued Him at, whose is the silver, and whose is the gold, and whose is the round world and all it contains! and now they beheld the wretched man conducting his midnight band to the garden, the scene of that terrible agony, and that beauteous submission to the Father's will; they beheld him approach, and salute his Divine victim; they saw the inconstant Peter, now fully roused from sleep, fighting for him with whom he would not watch; they saw the bands, the cords and fetters, the preparation for such horrors, as surely they could not expect to have beheld their heavenly King subjected to; and they heard those words of conscious power and majesty, in which he named them—them, his own loyal, loving angels, as ready to appear to the rescue.—Oh, what a blaze would have burst upon that night of black darkness, had not Omnipotence restrained the glowing legions. "But how then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?" added the meek Savior, and the thought of deliverance was past. Gabriel could not forget his own message to Daniel; the seventy weeks were accomplished, and Messiah must be cut off. Their intimate acquaintance with all that God has revealed, and the sure confidence they have, that whatever he hath spoken shall come to pass, even as he has said it, are to the angels instead of a foreknowledge that no creature may attain to: and if we gave the like heed to what God has declared, and with the same simple faith and plain understanding received it, we should find ourselves far better forewarned than now we are for the changes of this worldly scene, and armed with a more perfect submission to what betides us.

The sad events of that evening in Gethsemane were followed, as we all know, by others more terrible far; and equally in the Jewish sanhedrim, in Pilate's house, and Herod's judgment-hall, in the streets of Jerusalem, and on Calvary, was the Lord Jesus "seen of angels." They heard the false witness borne, the infamous sentence given; they saw the scourging, the crowning with a diadem of thorns, the reed placed in that hand, which in its protecting shadow had so long hidden the house of Israel from their foes! They heard the scoffing homage tendered by rude idolatrous heathen soldiers to Him, whose regal glories filled all heaven with splendor; they saw the heavy cross laid on that shoulder where God has laid the government of all created things; and they were constrained to witness the payment of the world's ransom in the trickling drops that oozed from those pierced hands and feet. The rocks were rent, but those awestruck angels could not if they would, have burst bonds of obedience to the voice that bade them be still: the sun hid himself, but through the darkness of that unnatural night, the bleeding Lamb of God was still "seen of angels."—Charlotte Elizabeth.

GIVEN FOR THEE.

What was given for me? When I can comprehend infinite holiness—when I can realize all the natural shrinkings of such purity from every shade of sin; when I can understand infinite happiness relinquished for me—when I can measure the distance between divinity and humanity, and thus estimate the humiliation of 'God manifest in the flesh;' when I can feel the force of infinite wrath; then, but not till then, I shall know what was 'given for me.'

Eternity is too limited for that lesson.—As a God only could devise, a God only execute, so a God only can comprehend it!

And this was given to thee! O, dull soul, dost thou realize the gift! Dost thou appreciate it! Dost thou feel that it was given for thee? That the sacrifice was as entirely for thee as if every other created intelligence had remained in sinless obedience, and thine hadst been the only forfeited soul. The body was broken, the blood was poured out for thee.

When was it given for thee? Was it after thine earnest entreaties, made because thou hadst contemplated the fearful abyss on which thou wert standing; when thou hadst "beheld, and lo, there was no man!" and in the perfect impotence of thy nothingness, thou hadst turned to the Almighty! No! an unasked boon, it was given when you were slumbering in the womb of futurity with the things that were yet to be? Like the unformed wave, moving forward slowly with the mass of waters until in its turn it raises its crested head, beats against the shore, then with a reluctant murmur mingles with its fellows.

Given for thee! Wondrous gift! O, receive it daily; and hourly renew thine acceptance of it! Thy sins are ever new; and though that sacrifice atones for all the past, it is still entire and perfect for the remotest sin that shall darken thy coming days! O, wondrous love! Surely, my soul, if thine eyes be permitted to behold that Lamb before the throne "as it had been slain," when others shout "Blessing and honor, glory and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb forever!" thou wilt only whisper, "Given for me!"—Episcopal Recorder.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

In the consideration of this prayer we may remark, that as to its character,

It is divine. How excellent must be the petition which the king himself has drawn up! It must certainly meet with acceptance from its author.

It is comprehensive. There cannot be mentioned a petition necessary for man, not included in these.—Thy kingdom come,—Thy will be done,—Give us this day our daily break,—Forgive us our trespasses,—Lead us not into temptation,—Deliver us from evil.

It is sublime. This character of grandeur appears, 1, in its design. What is more ennobling than prayer? The loftiest place on earth is the footstool of Jehovah. The grandest posture prostration before his throne.

2. In its language. The simple grandeur which struck Longinus in, "Let there be light, and there was light," breathes in every sentence of this prayer. Here are no swelling words of man's wisdom; here is nothing redundant; nothing deficient.—It is the language of sublime devotion, chastened by filial awe.

3. In its conceptions. In vain look we for sublimity, where these are poor. But what vastness have we here! God—the kingdom of God—angelic obedience,—earth,—the will of God, the only law of its one thousand millions of living men;—evil, implying all that man can suffer, or dread; deliverance from evil;—the power, the glory, the eternity of God! Was ever so much comprehended before, or since, in so few words?

Secondly, consider the spirit of the Lord's Prayer.

It breathes a filial spirit,—"Father."

A catholic spirit,—"Our Father."

A reverential spirit,—"Hallowed be Thy Name."

A missionary spirit,—"Thy Kingdom come."

An obedient spirit,—"Thy will be on Earth."

A dependant spirit,—"Give us this day our bread."

A forgiving spirit,—"And forgive our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us."

A cautious spirit,—"Lead us not into temptation but deliver us from evil."

A confidential and adoring spirit,—"For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen."

W.

THE FIRST STEP.—In promoting revivals of religion, the first step is a thorough examination and discipline of our hearts. We are to inquire whether we are individually prepared to devote ourselves to the use of those means with which God has connected his most precious promises.—This preparation depends very much on the fact, whether we have a deep and vivid sense of the infinite weight of eternal things. It becomes, therefore, a serious question whether we ourselves are alive to our spiritual necessities, and are properly affected in view of the idea of spiritual necessity at all. Pecuniary necessities we feel, understand fully, and know in all their bearings; but do we equally realize the necessities of the soul! Far from it, we fear. Shall we remain far from it?—When shall we awake and call upon our God?—N. Y. Evan.

HOW NEAR IS HEAVEN.—Christians sometimes look far away to the blissful seats of their destined rest. But it is not far. The clouds are thin that hide the shining world of delights. One dark hour may hang upon him; but the morning comes, and no shade behind it. Day, bright, peaceful and eternal succeeds. A pang may wound for a moment, and then it flies forever away. A conflict sharp and painful may continue for a night, but victory, eternal victory ensues. How soon, O how soon the Christian's cares are o'er, his struggling soul at rest, his eyes suffused no more with tears. Near at hand is the land of his pursuit. Hope cheers. How glorious the object which that hope embraces; how holy is its spirit? Who can contemplate the home that our heavenly Father is fitting up for his children, and not feel his soul athirst for its enjoyments and employment? Well, these delights, that happy clime, those ever verdant plains are not far distant.

CHRISTIAN SINCERITY.—It is now high time that the sincerity of a profession of Christianity should be tried by the test of dollars. That man who refuses to come forward with his wealth, when it is proved to be requisite for the purposes alluded to, ought not to assume the name of a christian. He has never felt the influence of that divine maxim of our Saviour, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." He virtually declares, that "Laying up treasures on earth," providing fortunes for his family, keeping up a certain [illegible] of society, and living in luxurious [illegible] matters of far greater [illegible] approach of the Mill[illegible] eration of the wo[illegible] with respect to the [illegible] principle in his [illegible] test than this, by [illegible] ty of his Christ[illegible] ling, at the cal[illegible] tion of his poss[illegible] even "to forsa[illegible] follower of Ch[illegible]

MOTION.

When we look upon motion in a philosophical sense, and consider how generally it is diffused throughout the material, and perhaps immaterial part of the universe, we can not but regard it with deep emotions of sublimity, and grandeur. There is not probably, a particle of matter in the immensity of space, that is in a perfect state of quiescence! all are reciprocally acting, and being acted upon, by each other; not by an inherent property of their own, but by an inscrutable impulse, which originates in the source of all power.

The apparent, without the invisible physical changes, that are constantly taking place upon earth, are sufficient of themselves to confound man, and excite his admiration, whilst they inform him that all around him is in a continuous motion, and that even his corporeal existence can not literally be identified, at any two instants. The body that lies upon the ground, apparently inert, is as truly in motion, as the body falling through the air; both urge towards the terraqueous centre, with a velocity inversely as the resistance to be overcome; the square of the distance.—The waters of the mighty deep are in a state of continual agitation; moving horizontally, in currents alternately from the equator to the poles, and changing vertically, particle by particle, from the surface to the bottom, and vice versa, as physical causes may operate; whilst its surface is thrown into commotion by violent winds, or its aqueous elements repulsed by caloric into the air, whence it is distributed, in the form of rain, to different climes, and again returned in crystal flow to the grand reservoir.

The physical condition of the earth is undergoing incessant mutations: numberleess vegetables, and animals deriving sustenance from earth, air, and water, are continually springing into existence, and decaying, strewing its surface with their mouldering remains; hills and mountains, by virtue of frost, air, water and chemical action, are perpetually hurling their cumbrous masses into the contiguous valleys, whence they are gradually transported, by gurgling brooks and majestic rivers, into the mighty main, whose displaced waters in return encroach upon the land, whilst volcanic fires that shake earth to the centre, are daily ejecting internal materials, and forming islands and mountains. The body of man, though possessing the sameness of configuration, is unceasingly changing in its materials: receiving, and throwing off, in constant succession, fleeting particles of matter. Water and other terrestrial materials, are continually undergoing decomposition, and yielding up their elementary principles, to enter into a new arrangement and combination with other bodies. The majestic king of day, without intermission is sending forth his luminous emanations, exciting undulations on the earth's surface, giving variety and continuity of motion to the air, whilst perchance its modified caloric, flows inwardly from the equator, and passing out at the magnetic poles, returns again in the upper regions of the air, giving rise to that sublime phenomenon, aurora borealis.—Changes are perpetually taking place in the molecular arrangement of bodies, which appear to the human eye in a state of perfect quiescence. The sensible motion which undoubtedly the magnet effects in the ultimate particles of iron, would be forever unsuspected by the most acute philosopher, were it not for the perceptible motion that it communicates to the whole mass. It has recently been suggested by a philosopher, that all the transparent space that we behold, may be but a mighty pore, in an inconceivably extended solid, and that an atom of matter is to a world, what a world is to the grand whole; all are in continual motion, revolving about each other according to certain immutably established laws. The ingenious theory of Herschel, is not without its plausibility; and it is highly probable that the sun, with all his appendages and kindred worlds, revolve around some grand centre, at an almost infinite distance; and that the earth, since the moment that it was first ushered into existence, has never passed twice through the same part of space, though moving with a velocity of millions of miles per hour. It is not absurd, nor revolting to reason, to suppose that a medium of extreme tenuity, extends throughout endless space, the molecules of which, are moving with an incomprehensible velocity; and that the planetary and stellary systems, are constantly interchanging materials with each other, and, like the animal frame, incessantly receiving, assimilating, and throwing off particles of matter, though still pre[illegible]ng the identity of organization and [illegible]ration.

[illegible] philosophical mind, on viewing the [illegible] of motion that exists within it, and [illegible]here around, must naturally be led [illegible] that there is somewhere an in[illegible]ble source of impulse, which im[illegible] can alone originate, at the ubiquitary [illegible] the Omnipotent God; forasmuch [illegible] is no property of matter, nor is it [illegible] to matter: its atoms are abso[illegible] inert, and can neither communicate [illegible] but by impulse—nor continue in motion longer than they are impelled—the clarion has a capacity of sounding, when sounded, the dulcimer of producing harmony, but not till acted upon; so likewise matter has the capacity of being moved, and being acted upon, but it has no motive faculty whatever within itself;—all the operations of nature, so far as we can trace them, are carried on mechanically, and by an extraneous impulse—the sun acts upon the fruits of the earth, by the mediation of light—the clouds water the earth, by the mediation of air—the chemist produces changes, by the mediation of fire; and, in short, wherever distant bodies affect each other, there is always something to mediate. Even the motion in the animal kingdom, is an effect, as truly as life itself; for no animal motion can be conceivable, without life, and no animal can continue to live, without the constant operation of those causes which support life.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, December 22, 1842.

Search the Scriptures.

There are many reasons why every created intelligence, in the whole universe of God, should "search the scriptures."—They are not only more ancient than any other writings; but, if attentively perused, with an ardent desire up-reaching to their great Author, they will be found to possess excellencies which no other writings can possess. "Whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our instruction." Who does not linger with delight around things that are ancient? The early history of our own country is read with a feeling bordering on enthusiasm; and the scenes that transpired in the great struggle for freedom from the galling yoke of oppression, are rivetted upon our minds with no weak or fragile charm. The monuments erected to the memory of departed worth are hallowed in our bosoms, for they remind us anew of ancient scenes, and long-past struggles, in which virtue has triumphed and oppression has been vanquished.

If, then, the early history of our own country is fraught with so much interest, with what deep veneration should we search the scriptures, containing as they do the only authentic history of the creation of this vast universe? As the scriptures are the most ancient, so they are the most worthy of our regard. They are a light to our feet, and a lamp to our pathway, while sojourning in this vain and inconstant world.

The Savior has instructed us to "search the scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me." And in the prophecy of Isaiah we are very forcibly reminded of our duty to "search the scriptures." "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Not only is it enjoined upon us as a duty to "search the scriptures," but it is for our interest to search them, to "see if these things are so." If heaven is worth possessing, and the smiles of God's reconciled countenance are worth winning, then it becomes a matter of no secondary importance with us that we take heed to what is taught us in the scriptures of truth. They are capable of building up the christian in the most holy faith. They present to the mind a concise view of our condition as mortals, constantly exposed to the snares of a wily adversary, and instruct us to lean on an arm for support which is able to save to the uttermost all who will diligently "search the scriptures," and regard them in their intercourse with the world as worthy of all acceptation.

Christ says, "In the volume of the book it is written of me; lo! I come to do thy will, O God; thy law is within my heart;" and in fact HE is the alpha and omega of the scriptures. From the first promise declared to Adam, Gen. iii. 15, the atonement of the great Redeemer is traced in lines of blood, throughout all the types and shadows of the Mosaic ritual, up to his cross, the substance and glory of them all. Let us, then, "behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world," by studiously searching the scriptures, and comparing scripture with scripture. All the previous parts of scripture, in one continuous chain, point to the stupendous fact—THE GREAT ATONING SACRIFICE OF IMMANUEL. Truly, then, it is for our interest to "search the scriptures," since, in the language of the Redeemer, "these are they which testify of me."

There is also a peculiar adaptation of the scriptures to every character and situation in life, which ought to induce every individual to search them. If the wordly minded, even, seek out of the Book of books, and read Ecclesiastes, they will trace therein the vanity of the world in glowing colors.—The man who depends on his own merits, may search the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians, to know the true way of acceptance with God. The moralist will admire the scriptures for their historical character, while, also, he may learn true morality by reading the book of Proverbs and Christ's sermon on the mount. Even the heart-hardened John C. Colt, who has passed from this world to the world of spirits with the double crime of murder resting on his guilty soul, could but admire the sermon on the mount for its glowing pathos and beautiful diction. The man observant of Providence, will find instruction in the book of Esther, in which, though the name of God is not found, the hand of God is so clearly seen. The devotional christian will linger with pleasure upon the Psalms of David; and perhaps there is not a book in the scriptures so admirably calculated to purify the mind, and heighten devotional feeling, as are the Psalms. The beautiful similes—the chaste and glowing style—the rich poetical effusions breathed through the whole, all conspire to raise the soul heavenward.—The very debut, if so we may speak, is a sufficient guarantee of the excellency of the whole to any one to search them through, and see if there is aught but is calculated, in most an eminent degree, to instruct the mind, and improve the heart: "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful; but his delight is in the law of the Lord; and in his law doth he meditate day and night. And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper."

Indeed, there is no class who may not, by searching the scriptures, find in some portion of them a peculiar adaptation to the various circumstances in which they may be placed. It is of paramount importance that the christian should "search the scriptures" with a prayerful and expanding desire for knowledge. What avails, if, in searching the scriptures, we treasure not up their divine precepts? Who, that will "search the scriptures" for himself, would supplant the reasonable commands of God by the ipsi dixit of mortal man? Who will add to the "law and to the testimony," the vain trappings of some self-constituted umpire, and teach for doctrines the commandments of men? Who will barter solemn realities for the unsubstantial reasonings of those who "speak not according to this word," because "there is no light in them"?

Capital Punishment.

We publish this week a communication from a "Friend," touching, among other things, upon capital punishment. We do not at present indorse the sentiments advanced by the writer as our own; nor would we on this occasion enter into a labored argument to disprove his position.—The subject of abolishing capital punishment was discussed at great length before our State Legislature at its last session, and a very able Report was submitted by Mr. O'Sullivan, in favor of abolishing the act which now requires punishment by death. But from all the light which emanated from that protracted discussion and able Report, we have not seen as yet any good reason for abolishing the act. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed."

Our "Friend," if we understand him, thinks that part of the decalogue which says, "Thou shalt not kill," very indefinite. We understand it to be tolerably definite; so much so, that were men disposed to obey the injunction, capital punishment would be among the things that were, but are not.

The commandment which says, "Thou shalt not kill," is no more indefinite than the one which says, "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image," &c., "thou shalt not bow down thyself to them nor serve them"; and yet we see them both violated—the one by the inhuman fiend who takes the life of his fellow, and the other by the whole Romish Church. Nor are either more definite than the command which says, "The seventh-day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God;" yet to what an alarming extent is this command of God violated by those who have less deference to Divine laws than to human, without even a pretext for an excuse emanating from any responsible source? So that our friend will discover, perhaps, that the commands of God are not arbitrary. Every law is as reasonable as it is divine; having as much regard to the happiness and well-being of man, as to the honor and glory of God. But, in the reason and nature of things, to every law there is attached a penalty for its transgression, and he who rushes madly on and breaks one of the least of the commands of God, not only sins against the great Lawgiver, but wrongs his own soul. Thus it will be seen, perhaps, without any degree of ambiguity, that all the commands of God, while they are not of an arbitrary character, are very definite, and the strictest observance of the whole is as much our interest as our duty.

The Mutiny.

We publish in another column an account of the most astounding mutiny that ever reached our ears. It is rendered doubly distressing from the fact that those were actors and leaders in the affair whose names are familiar to us; we refer more particularly to the instigator and leader, Spencer.—His father's name is familiar to every schoolboy, having long filled offices of public trust both in this State and the Union. And perhaps, to this very fact, may be attributed the recklessness of the son—the want of opportunity for strict parental watch-care and moral culture. The annals of our Navy never presented so deliberate and determined recklessness of purpose as was exhibited by the mutineers on this occasion. We wait with anxiety to receive the official account from Washington.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We have several lengthy communications on hand that shall be attended to as fast as practicable.

THE LORD'S DAY.—The Rev. T. Wakefield, pastor of the Baptist Church, in Killingly, Conn., has published an Essay on the obligations of the Lord's Day. He aims to prove, 1. That the Lord's Day is a consecrated and holy day. 2. That the Lord's Day is the first day of the week.—His arguments, as necessarily they must be when detached from scripture evidence, are of a merely supposititious character. But, notwithstanding all days are the Lord's days, this does not prove that any week day may take the place of the seventh as the Christian Sabbath, without a "THUS SAITH THE LORD."

THE NEW GENESEE FARMER.—This valuable paper, published at Rochester, N. Y., has passed into the hands of C. F. Crossman and E. Shepard, both of whom are intelligent gentlemen of that city; Mr. Colman, however, remaining editor. Mr. Colman proposes making a tour through Europe the coming year, for the purpose of familiarizing himself with the prospects of Agricultural Science in the old world. The terms of the New Genesee Farmer are $1 per year, or six copies for $5.

☞Br. Griswold informs us that there is a powerful work of grace in progress in Petersburg.

For the Register.

My wife was busy ironing her clothes as was common on that evening of the week, our children sitting quietly about the cheerful fire, and nothing in particular to obstruct, I gave myself up to reflection and meditation on the progress and reformation of governmental proceedings, the most impressive of which, and that which rested the heaviest on my feelings, was that of Capital Punishment. I rose from my chair in a kind of absent mindedness as regarded the domestic comforts around me, provided myself with suitable materials, and wrote a few notes which I might refer to at some future time, when I might feel better qualified to arrange them in the order of sentences and prepared for insertion in the Register.

I placed them aside without speaking to my family; about this time my wife had finished her task, she removed her cloth and table, took up the last number of your paper, and read to me the proceedings of the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire relative to Capital Punishment; and, indeed, what a gladdening confirmation of the propriety of the manner in which my mind had been exercised. It was to me as a fountain of pure water by the way side to the thirsty traveler in time of drought. When I considered the binding injunction, and watchword that heads your paper, 'If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments'; and when I consider how indefinite that portion of the decalogue is, which says, Thou shalt not kill; when I consider how repugnant the taking of a fellow creatures life is, to every feeling of humanity; when I consider that professing as we do Christianity, and that such proceedings are carrying out in practice the very character of Anti-Christ; I truly groan in spirit that such a practice should stain the character of a people willing to be called a free and enlightened republic. I therefore earnestly desire that we may be up and doing, suitably and seasonably to petition our Legislative bodies to abolish the practice, that the price of the blood of these unfortunate victims may not be required at our hands, and that such assemblies may wisely take into consideration the responsibility that devolves upon them in this all-absorbing and most important part of Legislative duty, is the sincere desire of a FRIEND.

Congressional News.

Correspondence of the Jour. of Com.

WASHINGTON, Wednesday, Dec. 14.

The estimates for the expenditures of the coming year have not yet been laid before the House, but I learn that they are reduced to the very economical scale of twenty millions. If Congress do not exceed this sum in appropriations for ordinary expenses of the year, we shall probably be able to get along to the next regular session, without a loan or another issue of treasury notes.

It is stated, to-day, that the President, who has been severely indisposed of late, has recovered his health.

In the Senate, this morning, Mr. Linn introduced a bill indemnifying Andrew Jackson for a loss sustained in the public service—i. e. remitting the thousand dollars fine. The bill was made the special order for Tuesday next.

Drawbacks.—Mr. Fulton introduced a bill allowing drawbacks of duty on goods exported in whole packages to Santa Fe, &c., in Mexico.

Mr. King thought this would lead to mischievous consequences, and that it would be very injurious to the revenue.

Mr. Huntington said the bill now introduced was reported unanimously by the Committee on commerce last year.

Mr. Woodbury did not intend to embarrass the question, but wished to suggest the necessity of adopting a system that would cover the whole frontier of the United States. The propriety of the system was proved by experience and by indisputable facts. The House Committee came to the conclusion that the law should be made general. As to smuggling, that could be guarded against by land as well as sea. The law was very necessary in relation to the Canadian frontier. The bill was referred to the Committee on commerce.

Bankrupt Law.—Mr. Benton's bill to repeal the bankrupt act came up, in order, and Mr. Berrien moved its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. Benton opposed the reference. Its only object was to delay a repeal of this odious law. The question was whether the law was to be repealed, and on what terms. Mr. Benton went on to oppose the bankrupt act, as unconstitutional. He said the limitations which he had introduced in the repeal bill were intended to bring the act back to the act of 1800. Under the law all the creditors were made partners for the purpose of saving their debts. That law did not interfere with the insolvent laws of the States, and it applied only to traders. The act of 1800 acknowledged the lines of the different States. He asked that these principles should be incorporated into the act, so long as it had any operation.

We shall thus declare, said Mr. Benton, that the law, as it was passed here, was unconstitutional. Though we can not tell the Judges to annul the law, we can do our own duty, and this will be a guide for the courts. In England the certificate of bankruptcy was worth nothing unless the majority of the creditors signed it. There was no use in referring this bill. All that was necessary was to fix a time for its consideration. He asked the yeas and nays on the reference.

Mr. Tallmadge said the motion of evidence did not go to the vital question of repeal. But he rather judged from indications he had seen in the Senate that the act would be repealed. The only question was whether it should be repealed in a regular manner. We had not now information on which to act.

Mr. Berrien said it was true that the question furnished was whether the act should be repealed, and what should be the terms of the repeal. But Mr. Berrien asked that an inquiry be first made whether the act could not be so amended as to meet the views of a majority of the Senate, as the effect of the reference would be to allow the friends of the act to examine the subject and see whether it could be modified. The reference of the bill did not commit any one against the repeal.

Mr. Benton said in that view of the matter he would withdraw the bill for the yeas and nays.

The bill was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

In the House of Representatives,

Mr. Fillmore, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the half calendar year ending the 30th of June, 1843. And it was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. Tiffany, of the Episcopal church, was elected chaplain. One hundred and ninety votes were cast, of which the reverend gentleman received one hundred.

Retained Bills.—A message was received from the President of the United States, informing the House that he had not time, on the last day of the past session, even to repeal the 20 per cent. proviso of the distribution act, and the bill relating to the taking of testimony in cases of contested elections. The bills were laid before him three-quarters of an hour before the adjournment, sine die, took place. He says that he holds himself free to act on these subjects, as he may think proper, should they again be presented to his consideration.

The message was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Seamen.—A communication was received from the State department, stating the aggregate number of seamen enrolled on the several ports of entry at 7,898, of which number 160 are foreign seamen. Also, a communication from the navy department, enclosing a letter from Commodore Morgan, commanding the United States forces in the Mediterranean, stating that the information formerly given by him to that department relative to the adjustment of our difficulties with Morocco was not in all respects correct, although he certainly had good reason to believe it to be so; and showing the actual state of our relations with that power.

Temperance.—Mr. Briggs asked leave to introduce a resolution to amend the joint rule of the two Houses, which says that "no spirituous liquors shall be offered for sale, or exhibited, within the capitol, or on the public grounds adjacent thereto," by striking out the word "spirituous" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "intoxicating."

Mr. Weller objected, unless other gentlemen were permitted to offer resolutions.

Mr. Briggs moved a suspension of the rules: and the motion prevailed—yeas one hundred and twenty-five, nays fifty-two.

Mr. Aycrigg offered an amendment—to add to the resolution, "and that the refectories be forthwith removed from the capitol."

This was agreed to; and the resolution was passed almost unanimously.

Warehousing.—Mr. McKean asked the general consent of the House to enable him to move the reference to the Committee on Commerce of his bill to authorize merchandise to be deposited in public warehouses.

Mr. McKennan objected, because the subject had already been referred to that Committee, in the reference of the various topics of the message.

Mr. McKean moved a suspension of the rules, but the motion did not prevail.

A resolution was adopted, calling on the President of the United States to report to the House, if not incompatible with the public interests, the communications to and from our minister at Berlin and Vienna, subsequent to the last communication sent to this House, on the subject of the trade and commerce between these countries and the United States.

International Copy-Right.—On motion of Mr. O. Kennedy, the position of Washington Irving and others, praying for an international copy-right law, (presented at the last session,) was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. Cushing, the Committee was instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending generally the laws relating to copy-right.

After the transaction of other business of no public importance, the House adjourned.

News of the Day.

From the N. Y. American.

MUTINY—EXTRAORDINARY DEVELOPEMENTS!

The town was agitated yesterday by a rumor that a mutiny had occurred on board of the United States brig Somers, Commander Slidell Mackenzie, which arrived here on Thursday morning, in the remarkable short run of 8 days from St. Thomas.

The facts, as far as they can be come at, and we have taken pains to ascertain, are these:

The Somers sailed from this port about three months ago for the coast of Africa, having on board 80 apprentices and 8 seamen, and no marines. Her Commander, Slidell Mackenzie, her only Lieutenant, Mr. Gansevort, of Albany, and five or six midshipmen, of whom Philip Spencer, son of the Secretary of War, was the oldest, two sons of Commodore Perry, are among the midshipmen.

It is believed the plan of mutiny was arranged soon after leaving this port, but not matured, until on her return from the coast of Africa, the Brig was about going into St. Thomas for water and provisions. When within 700 miles of the island, one of the crew gave notice to Commodore Mackenzie that a mutiny was in progress, and soon after a paper was discovered in which the whole plan of it was detailed.

Midshipman Spencer was found to be the instigator of the mutiny, aided by the Quarter Master and Boatswain, one of whom, named Cromwell or Cromwello, had been a pirate. It seemed, too that more than half the crew were implicated in the revolt; and the few officers, ignorant how far the contagion had extended, and aware, moreover, that by taking off the leaders, the revolt would most readily be quelled, determined upon their immediate execution; and they were seized, and their guilt being ascertained, they were forthwith hanged at the yardarm, their associates in crime running them up, while the officers armed stood by to witness the execution. A large number of the guilty were then put in irons.

The brig then touched at St. Thomas, victualled, and made the rapid passage of 8 days to this port—when 14 or 15 of the mutineers in irons were transferred to the North Carolina, where they are strictly guarded and prevented from having communication with any one.

Midshipman Spencer was over twenty years of age, and had, as we learn, been sent home from the Brazil squadron by Commodore Morris, with the express understanding that he should resign his warrant on arrival, as the condition of his not being brought to a Court Martial. Instead of resigning, he was, it seems, attached to the Somers.

The scheme of the mutineers, as said to be detailed in the paper found, was to murder all the officers but the surgeon, seize the vessels, and cruize off Sandy Hook to interrupt and rob the packets, and other inward bound ships.

The necessity of the immediate execution of the ring-leaders, arose, we presume, from the fact that without the aid of Mr. Spencer, who was to navigate, and the boatswain and quarter-master, who were to sail the vessel, the conspiracy would be hopeless. If confined and put in irons without the safeguard of marines, the temptation to rescue would have been great; and in total ignorance as the officers were of the extent of the mutiny, this would have been a fearful hazard.

We must add that this statement, though substantially correct, as we believe, does not probably present the mutiny in so aggravated a form as the facts, when made public, will warrant.

Midshipman Perry was despatched yesterday morning to Washington with the official report; and meantime, the Somers lies off the Navy Yard, and no one is permitted to communicate with her.

From the Madisonian.

THE TRAGEDY ON BOARD THE SOMERS.

We are authorized to say that a full account of the circumstances of this distressing case, has not yet been received at the Navy Department. The Secretary of the Navy has expressed no opinion upon the subject, and has taken no official action in regard to it. He is waiting for further accounts, which he expects to receive by the next mail. An official statement will be given as soon as the necessary materials for forming it shall be furnished.

The following communication appears in the Madisonian:—

The friends of young Spencer, who was executed, together with two seamen, on the 1st inst., would have been content to abide the investigation which the laws of the country require in such cases, and would have trusted to that justice which our tribunals award to all entitled to the protection of the Constitution and laws of the country. Various publications have however appeared in the New York papers, and copied into a paper of extensive circulation at the Seat of Government, giving versions of the transaction, the materials for which, if not the versions themselves, were obviously furnished by some officers who had a hand in the bloody deed.

This is evident from their containing some facts which could be known only to those officers; but so perverted, so exaggerated and interspersed with so much surmise, and so much downright falsehood as to evince the deep anxiety felt to make sure of the first impressions on the public mind. An awful responsibility rests on those officers and above all on their commander.—Without the least desire to render that responsibility more hazardous than it now is, it is still deemed an act of simple and bare justice to the memory of the slain to say that an examination of the papers transmitted by Commander Mackenzie shows these facts:

1st. That Acting Midshipman Spencer, was put in double irons on the 25th of November, and the Boatswain's mate, Samuel Cromwell, and seaman Elisha Small on the day following, on a charge of intended mutiny.

2d. That no disorder of a mutinous character appeared among the crew for the four succeeding days; that the vessel was going with good breezes and in good weather towards the island of St Thomas, where she actually arrived and took in supplies on some day between the 1st and 5th of December.

3d. That, on the 30th of November, the opinion of the officers was required by Commander Mackenzie as to the disposition of the prisoners; that they appeared to have examined thirteen seamen as witnesses to prove the alleged mutiny, (and who are therefore supposed innocent of any participation in it,) which examination was had so far as the papers show, in the absence of the prisoners, and without giving them any opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses, or to make any explanations or defense, or to procure any testimony in their own behalf. These officers without even the form of a court without even the form of a court, without the obligation of an oath, and upon this exparte secret information, united in the opinion that the safety of the vessel required that the prisoners should be put to death! How far this recommendation was influenced by the acts or the fears of Mr. Mackenzie, does not appear.

4th. That on the 1st of December, when every thing and person on board the vessel were perfectly quiet after four days of entire security, the three persons were, by the order of Mr. Mackenzie, hung at the yard-arm at mid-day.

The allegation in some of the papers, that it was proved to have been the intention of the mutineers to execute their project on arriving at St. Thomas, is wholly destitute of any evidence. And had it been their design, it was effectually justified so far as these prisoners were concerned, by their confinement. At St. Thomas, any of the crew might have been left, and the power of the officers of the vessel strengthened to any extent that was necessary.

The statement in the Intelligencer, copied apparently from the N. Y. American, that Spencer violated an engagement formerly made to resign, seems to have been deemed necessary to prejudice the public mind against him, that those who slew him might have a more favorable hearing. It is untrue, he did resign, and the Secretary of the Navy, on the recommendation of his commanding officer, considering the nature and circumstance of the offense (inebriation,) restored his warrant, with a strong admonition; and this was done without the solicitation of any of his friends. His age is represented in the same paper to have been over 20. Had he lived he would have been nineteen the 28th of January next.

As to the probability that such a mere boy—utterly unacquainted with navigation—brought up in the interior, would seriously endeavor to seduce to mutiny an old seaman who had arrived at the rank of boatswain's mate, and who is represented to have been employed heretofore on board a slaver, or to have been a pirate—an impartial tribunal before which both sides will be heard, will determine.

The idea of the mutineers cruizing off Sandy Hook to intercept the packets, seems to have been thrown in for the special benefit of the merchants of New York. The papers, such as they are, contain no such information.

The only account we have, given by Spencer himself, is, that it was all a joke. If it shall appear to have been the mere romance of a heedless boy, amusing himself, it is true, in a dangerous manner, but still devoid of such murderous designs as are imputed, and if the execution of him and two seamen (against one of whom, at least, there is not yet a particle of evidence) should prove to have been the result of unmanly fear, or of a despotic temper, and wholly unnecessary at the time to repress or prevent a mutiny—if all this can appear, it cannot be doubted that the laws will be vindicated. The laws of Congress prescribing the Navy regulations, forbid the taking of human life, even by the sentence of a court martial, before which all parties are heard, without the sanction of the President of the United States, or, if without the United States, of the commander of the fleet or squadron. This is believed to be the first instance in our history in which the law has been violated—the first in which prisoners—not of the enemy, but of our own citizens, have been put to death in cold blood.

These remarks are made, not to excite prejudice, but to repel the attempt to create it, and to enable the American People to see what mighty principles are involved in this unheard of proceeding. Let justice be done; let it not be denied, because one of the victims was connected with a high functionary of government, nor because another is unknown and has not a friend or relative on the face of the earth. And let not wanton opprobrium be heaped upon the memory of the dead to justify the bloody deeds of the living. S.

NINETEEN DAYS LATER FROM CHINA.

By the ship Cincinnatti, of Baltimore, which arrived here yesterday morning we have China papers to the 13th of August, and verbal information to the 16th.

The U. S. ships Constellation and Boston were at Heing Keing at the last mentioned date—all well.

There was a report in Canton that the British forces had gone up into the Pi-ho, which was the most direct route by water to Pekin, and that their object was to march on the Capital. This report was not credited by the Hong merchants, who usually have the best information and the latest.

The first Protestant house of worship in China, was dedicated on the 17th of July, at Hong Kong.

Capt. Turner, of the Am. schooner Anglona, was knocked overboard by the boom on the 14th of July, on her passage from Macao to Whampoa, and was drowned.—"Thus perished Capt. Turner of Anglona," (says the Canton Register,) "which vessel he had brought round Cape Horn with 4 men, and after a short residence in this country, he is lost to the regret of all who knew him."

It is stated on report, that the Imperial city, Pekin, has been already deserted by Tartars for two years, and would fall an easy prey to the English forces. Overtures of peace had been also presented by the High Commissioners, but upon such a basis as to be rejected by the British Plenipotentiary.

The Hong merchants had heard that the British had anchored near Canton, and a truce of thirty days had been agreed to—But it was very doubtful whether they would listen to any proposals for a truce, until Canton was in their possession.

The Emperor has been roused to indignation by so many losses, and attributes it all to the cowardice of his high officers; he has ordered all who fled before the barbarians to be put to death.—N. Y. Evan.

The Post Office Department, is determined to put a stop to the practice of avoiding letter postage, by writing on the margin of newspapers. A gentleman in Kentucky has been made to pay letter postage, for sending a paper statedly to his son, which the father received from the publisher through the office, without first erasing the original address to himself. The Post Master General was appealed to, but decided in favor of the charge. Mr. Wickliff states the following case:

The many ingenious devices to evade the law, may be inferred from the facts in a single case which was brought to my notice. A man had been in the habit of writing on the margin of an old paper to his father, to save letter postage. When arrested by the application of the provisions of the act of 1825, he adopted a species of hieroglyphics. His object was to let him know his family were well, and would be up in a few days—so he sent a newspaper with nothing but his name written on it. He had penciled on the margin a fac simile of a saddler's awl, pointing towards a representation of a well with a sweep and bucket going up. Thus distinctively conveying the message to his father that "all his family were well, and were coming up to see him."

If A writes his name on the margin of a paper, and sends that to a friend by mail, he conveys to him several distinct ideas and facts: 1st. that he is still alive; 2d. that he is well enough to write; 3d. that he remembers him though distant; 4th. that he has sent him by mail the very newspaper upon which he has written his name, or caused it to be done; and 5th, he tells his friend where he is.

The North-West Coast.—Some apprehension exists that a settled design is entertained by Great Britain of disputing our claim to the territory beyond the Rocky Mountains and the whole Pacific coast in that quarter. A letter to the editor of the Globe from an officer of the United States ship DALE, belonging to the Pacific Squadron, dated "Bay of Panama, Sept. 23, 1842," contains the following paragraph:

We sailed from Callao 7th inst., in company with the frigate United States, (Commodore Jone's flag-ship,) and sloop-of-war Cyane; but we separated from them, and bore up for this port on the seventh day out. Just previously to our departure, two British ships-of-war,) sailed thence on secret service! Of course, this mysterious movement of admiral Thomas elicited a thousand conjectures as to his destination; the most probable of which seemed to be, that he was bound for the northwest coast of Mexico, where it is surmised, a British station is to be located, in accordance with a secret convention between the Mexican and English Governments! And it is among the on dits in the squadron, that the frigate, the Cyane and the Dale, are to rendezvous as soon as practicable at Monterey, to keep an eye upon John Bull's movements in that quarter.

Simplicity.—Mr. Kendall, of the New Orleans Picayune, chronicles his election to the captaincy of a militia company, and then sets about wondering why this honor was thrust upon him. He observes that the Florida war is tolerably well ended—that our relations with Mexico are reasonably amicable—that there is no prospect of a turn-up with England—in short that there is no apparent military exigency; and that therefore he cannot imagine why he has been called into the field.

The simple man! Why, this pacific aspect of the times is the very reason. If there was any fighting to be done—any danger to be encountered—the choice never would have fallen upon him. And besides, he could not be spared from the peaceful fields of daily literature.—Com. Adv.

The experiments made yesterday with what is called the "Man Overboard" Boat, succeeded beyond expectation. She was first hoisted endwise to the yard arm of the ship Panama, 35 feet from the water, then suddenly cut loose—she plunged but 2 feet, keeping right side up, and the water running out of the scuttles in the bottom. She was next hoisted to the great height of 52 feet, where she hung ready for a dive that would have completely destroyed a boat of any other construction; the signal "man overboard" given, she plunged from her aerial elevation, dipping her bow 2 feet 6 inches in the water, and bounding to the surface in an instant.

She was next thrown over the bulwarks of the ship (21 feet from the water,) as if some one had really fallen overboard. A man then stood on her side long enough to swamp three ordinary boats, and endeavored to press it under the water, but in vain. During these experiments, her bottom was open, having had two holes cut in it, each ten inches square. She is built on the plan of Francis' Life Boats, and it is impossible for any boat not possessing their improvements and perfections, to perform such feats. In the event of a man's falling overboard, they may be thrown over the side of a ship and seated safely on the water in a few seconds.

Justice Slow, but Sure.—The Wilmington Chronicle relates a remarkable affair that occurred a few days ago in Wayne county, North Carolina. About four months ago there came into that county a young man of the name of Grimsley, who formerly lived there, but who had been absent for many years. Shortly after his return, he engaged himself to a Miss Martin, and their marriage was to have taken place on the 24th of last month. Four or five days previous to the appointed time, Miss M. was making up her wedding bonnet, and, requiring some paper for the lining, whilst in search of it she found a newspaper published two years ago in Mississippi. In cutting up this paper, her eye lit upon an advertisement by the Governor of Mississippi, offering a large reward for two men charged with a murder in that State, one of them named Grimsley, and agreeing precisely in description with the man to whom she was about to be married.

She immediately called her brother's attention to it, who at once called for an explanation. Grimsley denied knowing any thing about it, and said he could prove that he was not in Mississippi at the time of the murder by persons at Snow Hill, Greene county. The brother accompanied him to Snow Hill, but on their arriving there not a soul knew him. He then said he could establish his innocence by persons living in another little village in the same county. There they also repaired, and with the like success, no one knowing of him. They then returned to Waynesborough, where a warrant was issued against Grimsley, and he is now in jail at that place, awaiting the demand of the Governor of Mississippi. Since his confinement he has acknowledged that he was present when the murder was committed with which he is charged in the advertisement as a participant, but denies that he was engaged in it.

Stirring News from Campeachy.—By the last southern mail we have further interesting news to the 25th ult., from Campeachy, received by arrivals at New Orleans and Charleston.

The land and naval Mexican force made a combined attack upon the heights surrounding Campeachy, on the 24th of November, and after a desperate struggle, during which both parties displayed the greatest bravery, the Mexicans have thus secured great advantages, but their adversaries appear to be in nowise discouraged in consequence.

Great dissatisfaction seems to prevail in the Mexican ranks, but the officers in command continue to prevent an outbreak by a rigid system of discipline.—Sun.

Later from Mexico.—By the way of Havanna and New Orleans, we have intelligence from Mexico later than that brought by the Missouri.

As late as the 23d of November the Mexican Congress was discussing the new project for a Constitution, the former one having been rejected on account of not being sufficiently federal. It is thought the present project will pass after undergoing some slight modification.

Santa Anna was still at Manga de Clavo on the 26th of November, and does not speak of returning to the city of Mexico at present. In the meantime nothing was done at the capital without first consulting him.—Sun.

Report of the Special Committee of the Common Council, towhom was referred the communication of the Sheriff, accompanying the $100 bribe, &c. The Committee state, that with all their perseverance and industry, they have been unable to make any discovery as to from whence the bribe came; and they had nothing to communicate to the Common Council on the subject beyond what was already before them. As to the disposition that should be made of the $1000, they did not regard it as coming within the purview of their duty, and they asked to be discharged from the farther consideration of the subject.

The Madrid journals of the 18th inst. state that the Government in order to get rid of the brigands who infest the provinces, have given unlimited powers to the commanders of the troops who have been sent in pursuit of them.

Judge Grier, of Pittsburgh, in his charge to the jury in the case of Craig vs Parkin, in a libel suit, notices as among the cardinal vices of the age, that of not paying the printer.

How many persons have lately learned from experience, that one advertisement, which costs but a few dollars, is of more real value than a splendid sign which would cost ten times as much.—D. Adv.

Woodworth the Poet and Printer.—The N. Y. correspondent of the National Intelligencer in alluding to the decease of this popular poet, says:—

"Woodworth was one of the numerous family of Franklin, for he was a printer, and his genius expanded over the compositor's case; and this is the early history of two thirds of the eminent men in this country, editors, politicians, authors and poets. It would be curious to inquire, indeed, how far the destinies of this great republic are now influenced and wielded by master-spirits who have been 'printers' devils' in their time. Woodworth followed his trade till he was considerably advance; and though he suffered much from poverty, he has gone to his grave without a blot on his name; an exemplary man in all the relations of life. Requirscat in pace."

Secretary Upsher on Dueling.—The Secretary of the Navy, in reply to a letter in relation to the recent duel at Burlington, says: "I look with as much abhorrence as any one upon the practice of dueling, and shall be pleased to know that the civil power has acted on the offenders in question. As a military offense, it has engaged my serious attention, and I trust that it may be ultimately suppressed in the navy."

A Murderer's Confession.—We have seldom heard of a murder with which alcohol had not something to do. Nor do we remember ever to have heard a candid confession of a life of guilt, in which alcohol was not charged with inducing the first steps. A few moments before the execution of Douglass at Lockport—more particularly alluded to elsewhere—he asked for a drink of water. After drinking a little he said to his attendant:

"George, if I had never drank anything stronger than this, I should never have come to the gallows.

Thousands and tens of thousands have been brought to an untimely end by strong drink. George take warning from me.—Now while you are young employ the means of grace."

This confession of the now dead culprit should have its influence upon the living. 'Let he who thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.'

PRIMARY SCHOOL.

The Trustees of De Ruyter Institute would respectfully announce to the patrons of this School, that the Primary Department will be taught the next term by Mrs. LURANA A. CURTIS. To those who are acquainted with her teaching, nothing need be said. We invite others to give the school a fair trial.

JOHN R. BUTTS, Agent.
De Ruyter, Dec. 26th, 1842.

WANTED,

Any amount of wood, hay, grain, pork, butter, lard, tallow, lumber, apples, &c., at this office, in payment of unsettled newspaper accounts.

DIED.

In Alfred, Nov. 24th EZRA G., son of Samuel N. and Cloe Stillman, aged 2 years and 3 months.

Dec. 4th THOMAS WAYLAND, son of Asa A. and Emma Langworthy, aged about 5 months.

On the same evening, HANNAH, daughter of Oliver Coon, aged 19 years.

In Petersburg, Nov. 13th, JANE, wife of Hamilton Clark, in the 33d year of her age.

Although thus early called from her labors in the church militant; yet she was ready. In the morning of her life she gave her heart to her Savior, and connected herself with the people of God, at the organization of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in that place, ever afterwards adorning that profession, by walking in the commandments of the Lord, and by manifesting a deep interest in the welfare of Zion. In all the departments of life, she was in the faithful discharge of duty. As a wife, she was affectionate; as a mother, she realized her responsibility; as a christian, she was full of the spirit of her divine Master. In her last sickness, which was of short duration, she was soon reminded that it was unto death; and while the king of terrors was approaching with rapid strides, she felt the solemnity of standing before her Judge; and for a while a cloud of darkness brooded over her mind. But after a violent conflict with the powers of darkness, and a fervent prayer for deliverance, she suddenly broke out in strains of glory, glory, glory, and the beatific vision of the celestial city, and her acceptance in the Beloved, burst upon her soul, and this, she exclaimed, is a foretaste of heaven. She was willing to depart, and the love of her Savior ravished her heart. With [illegible] perfect serenity, she gave directions concerning her habiliments for the grave; told her now motherless child she was going to heaven, asking it to follow her; took a calm farewell of her beloved parents and friends; grasped with affection the hand of her loved husband, reminding him of a meeting where parting is unknown; closed her eyes in death, while her spirit was conveyed by angels to the bosom of her Savior and her God.

Dearest sister, thou hast left us;
We thy loss do deeply feel;
But 'tis God that hast bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal.

But again we hope to meet thee
When the storm of life is fled;
Then again we hope to greet thee,
Where no farewell tear is shed.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

BY VIRTUE of one writ of Fieri Facias, issued out of the Supreme Court of the People of the State of New York, and to me directed and delivered, against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of Adin Burdick, I have levied on, seized, and taken all the right, title, claim and interest, of the said Burdick, of and to the following described pieces of land, on the 24th day of December, 1840 or at any time since, all that certain piece or parcel of land situate in the 18th township, town of Brookfield, county of Madison, being part of lot No. 60 & 69, and bounded as follows: Beginning at the south east corner of lot No 69, thence west to the south east corner of J. H. Burch's land, thence northerly along said Burch's line and up the creek to Benjamin Burdick's land, thence easterly along said Benjamin's line to S. P. Burdick's land, thence south to the south west corner of said S. P. Burdick's land, thence east to the centre of the highway, thence along said highway to the south east corner of a piece of land on lot No. 69, owned and occupied by Benjamin Burdick, thence east to Jacob Langworthy's land, thence south about 20 rods to the place of beginning, containing about 60 acres of land, be the same more or less. Also, one other piece or parcel of land in the town and county aforesaid, bounded as follows: Beginning at a stake near the corner of the mill dam, near the potash, thence north 70 degrees, east 14 rods to the road, thence on the road easterly six rods to a stake, thence south 68 degrees, west 19 rods to the bridge, thence north 78 degrees, west 16 rods to the corner of the said lot, thence north 15 degrees, east six rods and 5 links between the barn and shed to a stake, thence north 79 degrees west, 3 1-2 rods, thence north 7 degrees, east 13 rods to a stake at the pond, thence around the pond on the westerly side until it comes to the lands of Oliver Brown, at a stake, thence across the creek easterly to a stake on the east bank of said creek, thence down the pond on the easterly bank till it comes to the first mentioned bound, containing 8 acres of land more or less, together with the mills and water privileges thereon and the appurtenances thereto belonging. Also, one other piece or parcel of land, situate in the town and county aforesaid, on which the store stands, bounded, south by the highway, west by Truman Miller's house lot, north by land owned by Roswell P. Dowse, and easterly by the above described piece, supposed to contain one half of an acre of land be the same more or less, together with the buildings thereon, which I shall expose to sale at public vendue, at the inn now kept by Isaac P. Miner, in the village of Leonardsville, town of Brookfield, on the 9th day of January, 1843, at 10 o'clock, A. M.—Dated, Morrisville, Nov. the 29th 1842.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and traveling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, trouble and expense. The principal advantage to be derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inkstand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents—Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

Cost of preparing the work, $5000. This beautiful and important work contains upwards of 500 pages royal octavo, is printed from new stereotype plates, handsomely bound in gilt, and lettered, and retails readily at the low price of $2 50 per volume. The following extract is from a lengthy Review written by the Rev. W. C. Brownlee, D. D. and is only one out of several hundred recommendations from the clergy and the press, that the work has already received.

New-York, August 6, 1842

"This is, beyond question, one of the most elegant books ever presented to our fellow citizens in this Republic. It ought to be in every Christian family for its intrinsic value; and in every patriotic family as a splendid specimen of our progress in domestic manufactures, and the advancement of our artists and manufacturers in their rivalship with those of Europe. W. C. BROWNLEE."

[illegible]!—One Hundred Dollars will be given by the Publisher to every Agent who will undertake and sell One Hundred Copies of the above Work. He believes that there is scarcely a town or village in the Union, but that numbers may easily be disposed of.

☞ Persons enclosing money, will be careful to pay the whole postage; and in ordering books will state, explicitly, how the books shall be sent to them.

Also, in press, another important, valuable, and cheap work, in the course of publication, and will be ready for delivery early in October, 1842, complete in one volume royal octavo, containing about 600 pages of letter-press, and more than five hundred Engravings, elegantly bound in gilt; price only $2 50 per copy.

POETRY.

The Neglected Child.

I never was a favorite—
My mother never smiled
On me, with half the tenderness
That blessed her fairer child ;
I've seen her kiss my sister's cheek,
While fondled on her knee ;
Iv'e turned away to hide my tears ;
There was no kiss for me !

And yet I strove to please with all
My little store of sense ;
I strove to please—and infancy
Can rarely give offence ;
But when my artless efforts met
A cold, ungentle check,
I did not dare to throw myself
In tears upon her neck !

How blessed are the beautiful !
Love watches o'er their birth ;
Oh, beauty ! in my nursery
I learned to know thy worth;
For even there I often felt
Forsaken and forlorn ;
And wished—for others wished it t oo ;
I never had been born !

I'm sure I was affectionate ;
But in my sister's face
There was a look of love, that claimed
A smile or an embrace ;
But when I raised my lip to meet
The pressure children prize,
None knew the feelings of my heart ;
They spoke not in my eyes.

But, oh ! that heart too keenly felt
The anguish of neglect ;
I saw my sister's lovely form
With gems and roses decked ;
I did not covet them ; but oft,
When wantonly reproved,
I envied her the privilege
Of being so beloved.

But soon a time of triumph came ;
A time of sorrow too ;
For sickness o'er my sister's form
Her venomed mantle threw ;
The features once so beautiful
Now wore the hue of death ;
And former friends shrank fearfully
From her infectious breath.

'Twas then, unwearied, day and night,
I watched beside her bed ;
And fearlessly upon my breast
I pillowed her poor head.
She lived !—and loved me for my care—
My grief was at an end ;
I was a lonely being once,
But now I have a friend.

THE LOST FOUND.

We had frequently observed a heart-broken looking lad pass by with a gallon oil can in his hand. His tattered garments and his melancholy face, were well calculated to excite observation and pity. It was but too evident that the vessel which he carried had been diverted from its legitimate use, and that it was now used, not as an oil can, but as a whiskey-jug. Having seen him pass twice in one day with his ever-present can, we had the curiosity to accost him, and did so by inquiring his residence.

"I live," said he, "five miles from the city, on the———road."

"You have been to the city once before to-day, have you not ?"

"Yes, Sir, I came down in the morning ; but I couldn't get what I was sent for, and I had to come again."

"What was you sent for, my lad ? It must be something very important to make it necessary for you to walk twenty miles in this storm."

"Why, Sir, it was whiskey that I was sent for. Father had no money, and he sent me to Mr.——'s to get trusted ; but he wouldn't trust any more, so I had to go home without the whiskey ; but father sent me back again."

"How do you expect to get it now, when you couldn't get it in the morning ?"

"Why, Sir, I have brought a pair of shoes which sister sent mother. Mr.—— will give whiskey for them. He has got two or three pair mother's shoes now."

"Do you like to carry whiskey home, my boy ?"

"Oh no ! Sir, for it makes me so unhappy ; but I can't help it."

We took the responsibility of advising the boy not to fulfill his errand, and returned home with him. The family we found consisted of husband, wife, and four children—the oldest (the boy) was not more than ten years of age, while the youngest was an infant of a few months. It was a cold blustering day. The north wind blew harshly, and came, roughly, and unbidden through the numberless crevices of the poor man's hovel. A few black embers occupied the fire place, around which were huddled the half naked children, and the woe-stricken mother and wife. Her face was haggard—her eyes sunken—her hair dishevelled—her clothes tattered and unclean. She was seated upon an old broken chair, and was mechanically swinging to and fro, as if endeavoring to quiet her infant, which moaned pittifully in its mother's arms. It had been sick from its birth, and it was now seemingly struggling to free itself from the harsh world into which it had, but a few months previously, been ushered. There was no tear in the eye of the mother, as she gazed upon the expiring babe. The fountain had been, long before, dried up by the internal fires, which alcohol had kindled and fed. Yet she was the picture of despair ; and we could not but fancy, as she sat thus, that her mind was wandering back to the happy past—the days of her own infancy and girlhood, and her early home. Poor thing ! She had given her affections and her hand to a man who had taken the first steps in intemperance. She had left her home, full of buoyant hopes—hopes never to be realized—to spend a life of misery with a sot. Broken-hearted—cast out from society of her former friends—frowned upon by the society of the humane—spoken of as the miseradle wife of a miserable drunkard—with no hand to help, no heart to pity—she very soon became a tippler and a drunkard herself.

By the side of this woe-smitten mother, kneeled a little girl down whose sallow cheeks tears were coursing ; and who ever and anon exclaimed, "Poor little Willie, must you die ?" "Oh ! mother, must Willie die ?" and then kissing the clammy sweat from little Willie's brow, covered her face with her tattered apron and wept.

In the opposite corner of the chimney, and among the ashes which covered the hearth, sat a boy of about seven years, dragging from the half-dead embers a potatoe, which he broke open with the remark, "Mother, give this to little Willie. May be he's hungry. I'm hungry, too, and so is sister ; but Willie's sick. Give him this potatoe, mother."

"No, poor boy," said the mother. "Willie will never be hungry again. He will soon be dead."

This remark drew all the children around the mother and dying child. The father was sitting upon what was intended for a beadstead, without hat, shoes or coat, with his hands thrust into his pockets, apparently indifferent to all that was passing around him. His head was resting upon the floor, as if he was afraid to look up at the sorrowing group who were watching the countenance of the dying infant.

There was a moment of silence. Not a sound was heard. Even the sobs of the little girl had ceased. Death was crossing the hovel's threshhold. The very respiration of the household seemed suspended ; when a slight shivering of the limbs of the infant and a shriek from the half-conscious mother, told all that the vital spark had fled.

For the first time the father moved.—Slowly advancing to where his wife was seated, with quivering lips, he whispered, "is Willie dead ?"

"Yes, James, the poor babe is dead !" was the choking reply of the mother, who still sat, as at first, gazing upon the face of her little one.

Without uttering another word, the long brutalized, husband left the house, muttering as he left, "My God, how long ?"

At this moment, a kind-hearted lady came in, who had heard, but a few moments before, of the dangerous illness of the child. She had brought with her some medicine ; but her angel visit was too late. The gentle spirit of the babe had fled, and there remained for her but to comfort the living. This she did, while we followed the father. We related to him the circumstances which had led us to his house, and briefly spoke of the misery which inevitably followed in the wake of intemperance.

"I know it, Sir, said he. "I have long known it. I have not always been what you see me. Alcohol and my appetite have brought me to this depth of degredation."

"Why not master that appetite ? You have the power. Thousands have proved it."

"Sir, I believe it. I have seen others as far reduced, as myself, restored and made happy ; but you are the first who has ever spoken to me upon the subject, and I had too strong a passion for liquor to think of a reformation myself."

"Well, will you now make the effort ?"

"I will. It has occupied my thoughts during the whole morning ; and now, in the presence of almighty God, I swear never to touch the accursed thing which has ruined me and made beggars of my family."

Happy enough to hear this manly resolution, we returned to the house with him—in due time we made the fact known to his wife—and producing a pledge, the whole family signed it upon the table which held the body of the dead child !

The scene was an affecting one. * *

Two years had passed, when the incident was recalled to our mind by a shake of the hand from a gentlemen who was returning west with a stock of dry-goods which he had just purchased in New York. It was the man who signed the temperance pledge by the body of his dead child.

HASTY BURIALS.

BY MRS. CHILD.

The yellow fever raged fearfully in Boston, the last part of the eighteenth century. The panic was so universal, that wives forsook their dying husbands, in some cases, and mothers their children, to escape the contagious atmosphere of the city. Funeral rites were generally omitted. The "death-carts," sent into every part of the town, were so arranged as to pass through each street every half hour. At each house known to contain a victim of the fever, they rang a bell, and called, "Bring out your dead." When the lifeless forms were bro't out, they were wrapped in tarred sheets, put into the cart, and carried to the burial-place, unaccompanied by relatives. In most instances, in fact, relatives had fled before the first approach of the fatal disease.

One of my father's brothers, residing in Boston at that time, became a victim to the pestilence. When the first symptoms appeared, his wife sent the children into the country, and herself remained to attend upon him. Her friends warned her against such rashness. They told her it would be death to her, and no benefit to him ; for he would soon be too ill to know who attended upon him. These arguments made no impression on her affectionate heart. She felt that it would be a life-long satisfaction to her to know who attended upon him, if he did not. She accordingly staid and watched him with unremitting care. This, however, did not avail to save him. He grew worse and worse, and finally died. Those who went around with the death-carts, had visited the chamber, and seen that the end was near. They now came to take the body. His wife refused to let it go. She told me that she never knew how to account for it, but tho' he was perfectly cold and rigid, and to every appearance quite dead, there was a powerful impression on her mind that life was not extinct. The men were overborne by the strength of her conviction, though their own reason was opposed to it. The half hour again came round, and again was heard the solemn words, "Bring out your dead."

The wife again resisted their importunities ; but this time the men were more resolute. They said the duty assigned them was a painful one ; but the health of the city required punctual obedience to the order they received ; if they ever expected the pestilence to abate, it must be by a prompt removal of the dead, and immediate fumigation of the infected apartments. She pleaded and pleaded, and even knelt to them in an agony of tears ; continually saying, "I am sure he is not dead." The men represented the utter absurdity of such an idea ; but finally, overcome by her tears, again departed. With trembling haste she renewed her efforts to restore life. She raised his head, rolled his limbs in hot flannel, and placed hot onions on his feet. The dreaded half hour again came round, and found him as cold and rigid as ever. She renewed her entreaties so desperately, that the messengers began to think a little gentle force would be necessary. They accordingly attempted to remove the body against her will ; but she threw herself upon it, and clung to it with such frantic strength, that they could not easily loosen her grasp. Impressed by the remarkable strength of her will, they relaxed their efforts. To all their remonstrances, she answered, "If you bury him, you shall bury me with him."—At last, by dint of reasoning on the necessity of the case, they obtained from her a promise that if he showed no signs of life before they again came round, she would make no further opposition to the removal.

Having gained this respite, she hung the watch up on the bedpost, and renewed her efforts with redoubled zeal. She placed kegs of hot water about him, forced brandy between his teeth, breathed into his nostrils, and held hartshorn to his nose ; but still the body lay motionless and cold. She looked anxiously at the watch ; in five minutes the promised half hour would expire, and those dreadful voices would be heard, passing through the street. Hopelessness came over her ; she dropped the head she had been sustaining ; her hand trembled violently ; and the hartshorn she had been holding was spilled on the pallid face. Accidentally, the position of the head had become slightly tipped backward, and the powerful liquid flowed into his nostrils. Instantly there was a short, quick gasp—a struggle—his eyes opened ; and when the death-men again came, they found him sitting up in the bed. He is still alive, and has enjoyed unusually good health.

I should be sorry to awaken any fears, or excite unpleasant impressions, by the recital of this story ; but I have ever thought that funerals were too much hurried in this country ; particularly in the newly settled parts of it. It seems to me there ought to be as much delay as possible ; especially in cases of sudden death. I believe no nation buries with such haste as Americans. The ancients took many precautions. They washed and anointed the body many successive times before it was carried to the burial. The Romans cut off a joint of the finger, to make sure that life was extinct, before they lighted the funeral pile. Doubtless it is very unusual for the body to remain apparently lifeless for several hours, unless it be really dead ; but the mere possibility of such cases should make friends careful to observe undoubted symptoms of dissolution before interment.

THE NEWSPAPER.—At Carlisle, a juror recently plead in abatement of a fine for non-attendance at Court he took no newspaper and was not aware of the time ! This excuse the Judge held to be only an aggravation to the offense. The judge was most correct in his decision, and it should become a precedent to all future time. Ignorance of the law excuseth no one, notwithstanding the difficulties which often stand in the way of knowing what the law may be ; but ignorance of the newspapers, which are in every one's path—which are cried aloud in the streets, lanes and alleys—which may be made to come to us in advance of the sun, and as a pioneer to the earliest breakfast, is justly ruled to be an 'aggravation.' The man who takes no newspaper—who deliberately shuts out light, and gives no other nurture to his mind than the petty incident and unsubstantial prattle occurring in the contracted circle of his daily routine, is voluntarily a being of imperfect civilization, deficient of his own accord, in that every day practical knowledge which fits him for intercourse with his fellow beings. In contact with such a one, conversation becomes a toil—the most trivial allusion requires to be explained—ignorant of circumstances the merry jest falls pointless on his ear, & the comment of the times demands a whole history to make it intelligible. To talk with those that read no newspapers, is to sweat upon a tread mill—mighty labor, but no advance. You must illuminate the mind of your hearer with the knowledge that should have been there before, or your idea is an incomprehensibility—he must be carried to conclusion step by step, like a helpless Priam on another's shoulders, and friendly intercourse thus becomes the work of a porter instead of being a light and pleasant recreation.—It has never, we believe, been set down in the statutes, in addition to that degree of legal information necessary to govern his ordinary conduct, there are things which a man has no right not to know—the privilege of ignorance in certain matters is denied to him. It is an offense against society, not punishable indeed, but very reprehensible, to be deficient in general impressions about its multifarious concerns, and it is an onerous tax upon one's friends that they cannot state a general result without being compelled to recapitulate all the items forming the account. As a consequence, they who have no patience to be a bulletin or a universal gazette, are guarded in their words and choice in their intercourse—when bro't in contact with him who reads not the newspapers, they confine themselves to the wealth or to his concerns, that he may not be drawn beyond his depth, and require aid for his extrication. Who then would be without the newspaper ; an humble client to more intelligent neighbors ; in the dark till enlightened by an other's candle, dependent on accident for the brightened ray ? To go without a hat is a matter of taste, and he who fancies it may dispense with his other garments by dwelling with the Aborigines : but to reject the newspaper and to be in the world of change, action and improvement—in the world of incident, turmoil and progression—remaining blind and deaf to every thing but daily labor, and the consumption of the requisite quantity of beef and potatoes, this is indeed to be more automaton, not half so perfect as the instruments constructed in the machine shop. Therefore read the newspapers, one and all—men and women, girls and boys. Learn something every day, and be conversable, enlightened intelligent beings. Keep up with the current of events, and remain not idle struck upon some arid bank far behind the onward wave.—Pennsylvanian.

AGED ELMS.—As we passed the residence of Amos Chase, Esq., of Saco, (Me.) not long since, we were particularly struck with the size of six or seven elms, in front of his dwelling. One of them is nearly as large as the 'great elm' on the Boston Common. We learn that these trees were planted by the grandfather of the present owner of the estate, Deacon Amos Chase, in 1736, when he was about 17 or 18 years of age : consequently, they have been flourishing for more than a century. The Deacon lived till he was upwards of a hundred years old, and died full of faith, in 1818. If there were nothing else to remind one of the good patriarch, surely these aged elms will keep his memory alive so long as a single green leaf flutters on their extended arms. It is worth a trip to Saco to view these relics of another generation. May the lightnings of heaven spare their trunks, and the vandal axe never dare to molest these aged time-worn patriarchs of the woods. But while the children of him who planted them remain on our soil, they will continue to flourish, till even another and another generation has passed away.

We love an aged tree : we linger beneath and around it. As by enchantment it draws our affections ; it carries us back to the days when our fathers were few and feeble, yet strong and mighty in integrity, in faith, in freedom—when for our weal they planted this soil, reared our churches, and established our faith. God has called them hence—and shall we not love and cherish the remembrance of the holy men ? And what can better remind us of their deeds, than the aged trees, lingering here and there, 'few and far between,' to be sure, planted by their own hands ? Let him who would dare destroy any of these noble relics of the past, be visited by plague, pestilence and death !—Portland Tribune.

PRETTY GOOD.—The celebrated Mrs. Robinson had written a poem entiled "Sappho and Phaon."—Anxious as all literary ladies are, to have their charming effusions put favorably before the world, Mrs. R. wrote a confidential note to a leading newspaper in London, in which she said :

"Dear Sir : Do let me have a few puffs for Sappho and Phaon. Yours, M. R."

The note was despatched to the office in the Strand by the servant. Now, it happened that there lived in the Strand close by the printers, a popular pastry cook named Boaden, to whom seeing the name over the door, Mrs. R's man took the note ; to which she received this answer :

"J. Boaden's respects to Mrs. Robinson, having sent so late, all the puffs are gone ; but he forwards a dozen gooseberry tarts, which he hopes will do for the young ladies as well."

"A MAN'S A MAN, FOR A' THAT !"—Robert Burns paid little respect to the artificial distinctions of society.

On his way to Leith one morning, he met a country farmer ; he shook him earnestly by the hand, and stopped to converse. A young Edinburgh blood took the poet to task for his defect of taste. "Why, you fantastic gomeril !" said Burns, "it was not the great coat, the scone bonnet, and the saundaer boot hose I spoke to, but the man that was in them ; and the man, sir, for true worth, would weigh down you and me, and ten more such, any day."

Joel Hotchkiss, of Guilford, Conn., was fined $100 and imprisoned six months for whipping his wife. Certainly not very severe for the offence. It is due to Connecticut gallantry, however, to say that Hotchkiss was indicted simply for an assault, without intent to kill.

The Heraldo, of Madrid, 14th instant, says :—"A soldier was this day shot for having recently murdered a traveler. On his trial, when asked what had induced him to commit this crime, he replied, 'Because I had been a long time without killing any body.'"

Mrs. Gutzlaff, wife of the distinguished German Missionary in China, and four Chinese children, arrived at New York in the ship Panama, from Canton.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To Families and Invalids.

THE following indispensable family remedies may be found at the village drug stores, and soon at every country store in the state. Remember and never get them unless they have the fac simile signature of Comstock & Co. on the wrappers, as all others by the same names are base impositions and counterfeits. If the merchant nearest you has them not, urge him to procure them at 71 Maiden-lane, the next time he visits New York, or to write for them. No family should be a week without these remedies

BALDNESS.

For the Register.

HONG KONG, CHINA, 1st Aug. 1842.

It gives me pleasure to be able to communicate with you from these ends of the earth. This has been, thus far, a year of unusual mercy and interest to me, and my missionary operations having received a fresh impulse, I have been enabled to rejoice in God, take courage, and go forward.

In January last, I had the happiness of baptizing Capt. Rogers, of Philadelphia, a gentleman of superior intelligence and piety. Capt. R. had been a Presbyterian for fourteen years, but had never fully examined the subject of baptism until his present visit to China. Without any attempt upon my part to proselyte, he sought my counsel, and advice, and books, with all of which I readily endeavored to supply him. After three weeks of anxious and prayerful study of the scriptures, and reading, and without once again communicating with me, he came to the full conclusion that the Bible taught that the immersion of the believer into the name of the Trinity was the only Christian Baptism. At his own request, therefore, I had, on the 5th of January, the high privilege of burying him with Christ in baptism, in the immense long-boat as she floated, full of water, along side of his fine ship, on one of the loveliest and calmest days I have ever witnessed in Macao Roads. The scene was as interesting as it was novel. Capt. Roger's interests, family, connexions, and prejudices were all Presbyterian, but he nobly made every sacrifice for the sake of the truth, and after his baptism literally went on his way rejoicing. He has recently returned to his native land bearing certificates as a member in full fellowship with the Baptist Denomination.

Soon after the above events, the Providential openings around me seemed to call loudly for exertion more decided and more efficient than any I had hitherto been able to put forth. The establisament, by the English, of a civil Government on the Island of Hong Kong, and the great influx of the Chinese to the settlement, and the fact that all missionary operations could be carried on there beyond the influence of Catholics and Mandarins led me to decide, after much prayer, to leave my restricted sphere at Macao, and, with my family, to take up my residence at Hong Kong, on the 19th March.

Being almost entirely without funds for missionary purposes, and being determined to allow no longer, if possible, my hands to remain tied, I drew up, and had printed, a statement, which I laid before the foreign community in China, soliciting their pecuniary aid towards the erection of Chapels and School-rooms on this Island. Mr. Robert's name was also inserted in the printed statement. Upon application to Sir Henry Pottinger, Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary and Governor of the Island, His Excellency most generously made me a free grant of ground, and subscribed fifty dollars towards the completion of the Queen's Road Chapel. My appeal to the community was met in a most gentlemanly and liberal manner by them, there being subscribed in a very short time, for the objects set forth, upwards of seventeen hundred dollars.

On the 15th May I had the happiness of constituting a regular Baptist Church here, which now numbers nine members, with good prospects of increase. This number does not include Mr. and Mrs. Dean, and one convert at Macao, nor Mr. Roberts and one convert at Chek Chu, on the other side of the Island. We have visited the baptismal waters once since the formation of the Church, and on the 5th of June I yielded to the unanimous call of the church and became their Pastor. The Church admits members from all nations and languages. In the latter part of April we had the happiness of welcoming to our extensive field of labor, Mr. and Mrs. Dean, who were driven from their station at Bangkok by ill health. They brought with them a native Chinese Assistant who has joined me at Hong Kong. The health of our friends has much improved, and Mr. Dean is now on a visit to spy out the land in the more northern portions of the empire. A free passage in the American Ship Lowell was generously tendered to him by Capt. Peirce and his kind brother, W. P. Peirce, Esq., of Salem, U. S. A.

On the third Lord's day in June, the Bazaar Chapel being completed, it was opened for public divine service. It is built entirely of brick and situated in an eligible position in the thickly popular Upper Bazaar. The length is 35 feet, and breadth 16 feet, two stories high, neatly finished and painted throughout. The Chapel room is up stairs, with front venitians, and an open terrace in the rear, and containing the necessary tables, chairs, and seats.—The lower story is occupied by my Chinese teacher and block cutter, both professors of christianity. The doors are opened during the whole of every day, and every applicant readily supplied with books and instruction. There is below an open 5 feet verandah in front, immediately upon the street, and also cook rooms, &c. in the rear. We find it a great convenience to have this lower room, which answers a great many valuable purposes, for teacher, books, paper, printing blocks, types, and now contains about thirty thousand christian tracts and books belonging to the different missionaries in China.

The Queen's Road Chapel having also been completed, was formally dedicated to the worship of the Master on the 19th July, in the presence of a respectable and attentive congregation. I was assisted in the services by Mr. Dean and Dr. Bridgman.—Subject of the Sermon, The Divine Revelation. This chapel is situated immediately on the great Queen's Road, fronting, and overlooking the magnificent harbor, and midway between the two great Chinese Bazaars, and well located also for the foreign community. Its walls are built of substantial stucco, and plastered and white-washed both inside and out. The building is upwards of seventy feet long, and more than twenty-seven feet wide, with a large vestibule, two neat vestry rooms, cupola, London made bell, camphor wood pulpit, rattan bottomed seats, and chairs. It is floored and sealed and painted throughout, the floor marble color and the ceiling blue. To make the building as cool as possible, all the windows are made the usual size of doors, and reach to the floor, each having double ventian shutters on the outside painted green, and doubled panel doors painted white, with glass, inside.—The large front doors are secured by iron bolts and good English brass knob locks. A printed card which was circulated, stated the services of the chapel to be as follows: Every Lord's day at seven o'clock in the morning, Chinese Worship—Eleven o'clock, A. M., English Preaching—Two o'clock, P. M., Chinese Preaching—Half-past six in the evening, English Bible Class. Every Thursday, half-past six in the evening, English Lecture. Every Friday, half-past seven in the evening, Chinese Lecture—other services as occasions require. The Chapel, however, is open every day, a table, with Chinese tracts, and chairs are arranged in the vestibule, which is delightfully cool and pleasant, and the native Assistant, who lives in one of the vestry rooms, is always ready to converse, to preach, to give away tracts, and to refer special cases to me. When the extreme hot season is over, we hope to do much more teaching publicly and from house to house than we are at present possibly able to do. I hold a social conference with the members of the Church every Tuesday evening.

The above Chapels were the first Protestant houses of worship that have ever been erected in China, and the Queen's Road Baptist Church, is the first Christian church constituted in this great land of heathenism. For these humble beginnings, proceeded with under much anxiety, to God alone must be all the glory.

The Mission House is in a good state of advancement. It is substantially built of stucco, plastered and white-washed inside and out, with venetians and glass painted throughout. It contains six good sized rooms, with a wide covered, and tiled verandah hall around, and a kitchen and out-houses attached. The whole will not cost more than about one thousand dollars, and the property will be entirely invested in the Baptist Board. Rents in China are enormously high, and in two or three years generally amount to a larger sum than a substantial and convenient dwelling house can be built for. The Mission House is erected on a portion of the free grant of ground kindly made by H. E. Sir Henry Pottinger. There is still room enough left for another dwelling. It ought to be mentioned that as the Bazaar Chapel is erected upon a bazaar lot, the ground is not a grant from the Government, but is taken at a small annual quit rent as the other lots in the Bazaar are.

Rev. Messrs. Bridgman, and Ball, and Mr. Williams, of the American Board, are also erecting a large Dwelling House and Printing Office, a few lots distant from the Baptist Mission House. Mr. Brown, too, of the Morrison Education Society, has commenced building on a hill which was granted by the Government, and will move his school and family over in the course of two months. The Medical Missionary Society also, has received a hill from the Government, but they have not yet commenced building. The Roman Catholics have a fine building which is nearly completed. Many foreigners are rapidly building ware-houses and private dwellings, and a very large number of substantial and neat brick Chinese houses, and stores, and shops have been erected, and large numbers are still in course of erection.

The Government House is a commodious building to which other wings are still to be attached. The "Magistracy House," is a very fine building in a commanding position, with the jails, clerk's offices, and guard rooms in the same inclosure. There are large and substantial Barracks at three different positions. A Government Hospital of commodious extent is nearly completed, not far from the Government Ware-houses. The Queen's Road is sixty feet wide, and affords a pleasant and convenient public thoroughfare. Granite bridges are thrown over the different streams, and carriages have already began to run. The Public Market covers a large space, is well arranged, and is felt to be a very great public convenience. There is a well organised police corps, both foreign and native, and four distinct police stations. Robberies in the town, however, and piracies in the neighborhood are by no means unfrequent. The harbor of Hong Kong, which is the finest in the world, and at all seasons of the year contains a large amount of shipping, is defended by one fort and two heavy batteries. The population of the island at present is probably twenty-five thousand, and consists of all classes of tradesmen and artificers, many of whom occupy long lines of neatly built and well filled shops. Provisions are plentiful and cheap. The number of British troops stationed here is about twelve hundred. The following are the present public functionaries of Hong Kong, viz: A. R. Johnstone, Esq., Governor; Charles E. Stewart, Secretary and Treasurer; Major W. Caine, Chief Magistrate; W. Tennant, Chief Clerk; C. Fearon, Clerk to the Chief Magistrate and Coroner; Lieut. Pedder, Harbor Master and Marine Magistrate; A. Lena, Assistant Harbor Master; G. Reynolds, Lands and Roads Inspector. Lieut. Col. Taylor, commander of the troops.—Medical duty is performed by the Military Surgeons. Rear Admiral Sir Thomas Cochrane commands the naval force here, the Blenhiem (74) being his flag ship. At Chek Chu, on the other side of the island, where Mr. Roberts is stationed, there are about four hundred troops in Barracks.—We have money in hand for the erection of the Chek Chu Chapel, but the building has not yet been commenced as no suitable lot can, at present, be procured. Chek Chu is a quiet little trading town, containing about eight hundred inhabitants, among whom Mr. Roberts finds an encouraging and appropriate field of labor. He has purchased a small house which he has opened for a school-room, although very few scholars can be prevailed on to attend. Mrs. Shuck has only a few children who live in the family and who make considerable progress.

Rev. Mr. Milne, of the London Missionary Society, proceeded to Chusan in February, where he has been since remaining, but the unsettled state of affairs there much contracts his missionary exertions.—In June, five missionaries from Macao took up their residences at Amoy, viz: Rev. Mr. Abeel, of the American Board; Rev. Mr. Boone and Wife, of the American Episcopal Board; Rev. Mr. McBride and Wife, of the American Presbyterian Board; and Dr. Cummings of Georgia, not connected with any Society. Dr. Lockhart of the London Society will likely soon join Mr. Milne at Chusan. Dr. Hobson of the same society, is still engaged in Medical practice and christian teaching at Macao. Miss Aldersy, an intelligent English Missionary Lady, who supports herself, has recently arrived at Macao from Java, and is anxious to proceed to some station northward. Rev. Mr. Lowrie, who visited China in the latter part of May, proceeded immediately to Singapore, but with the expectation of returning to China.

Concluded next week.

Faithfully yours,

J. LEWIS SHUCK.

'Son,' said Abraham in reply, 'Son, remember that thou in thy life time receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted and thou art tormented; and besides all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed; so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot, neither can they pass to us that would come from thence." Such was Abraham's answer. The picture of the rich man in torment praying for water, was unspeakably awful before, but this incalculably increases the awfulness—he prays, but he prays in vain. He seeks a slight alleviation only of his sufferings: but, by the refusal of his request, and the faithful representation to him of the impossibility of Abraham's being able, even if he felt disposed, to send Lazarus to his relief, in consequence of the great gulf which was fixed between them, his sufferings are aggravated instead of being relieved. The dreadful truth is more solemnly and fearfully impressed upon his mind that any intermission of his pain and torment is entirely and altogether hopeless. Again, his sufferings are aggravated in being called upon to remember what blessings he had received in his life time; for conscience that never dying worm, would tell how shamefully he had abused the precious gifts of a kind and bountiful Providence. 'Son, remember that thou in thy life time receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented."

What accumulated horror must there have been in that one word 'remember!'—What scenes of wickedness, debauchery, and sin must it have brought to his recollection! What days of riot! What nights of lust! What time misspent and wasted! What talents lost and misapplied: 'Remember'—O, he does remember; hell would be divested of its greatest terrors if he could forget. But memory haunts him with affrighting visions of the past, and conscience rests not day and night, but incessantly upbraids him with his ungodly deeds. Rests not day and night—alas, what day is there in hell? In heaven, we are told, 'there is no night;' for 'the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.' In hell there is no day, but one dark, black, interminable, eternal night—the blackness of darkness for ever and ever.

The drunkard on earth may drown his cares and troubles in the intoxicating cup, the worldling forget his sorrows and afflictions in the gaities and pleasures of the world, the miser banish from his mind the past in counting over his hoarded gold and devising plans for grasping more and more; but what can beguile the time in hell?—What can obliterate from the mind the memory of past events! What, for a brief season only, enable the soul in torment to forget those sinful actions and those unhallowed deeds that were the means of bringing the wretched sufferer to the gates of everlasting death? Alas! we are constrained to answer—'Nothing!' In that place of endless woe there is no intoxicating cup, no revelry and mirth, no worldly treasures, no hoards of countless gold to amuse the restless mind or steep the senses in forgetfulness! But O! if there were, could lost souls forget, while enduring the torments of their justly inflicted punishment, those numerous sins of which they had been guilty here—those sins which were the direful cause of all their eternal suffering, pain, and woe?

In the midst of even temporal sufferings on earth—those sufferings, at least, which are the bitter fruits of folly and indiscretion—can the deluded sinner forget the cause of all his anguish? Can he forget that the pain he feels in every joint is the consequence of his indulgence in certain pleasures and enjoyment which the law of both man and God forbids? How different in his sight appear those pleasures and enjoyments now, the momentary gratification having passed away, and he is laid upon a bed of sickness, racked with pain, and enfeebled with disease! He wonders how he could have ever been so infatuated as to commit such sins in opposition to the solemn warnings and exhortations that he had received, and how he could have been so reckless of those fatal consequences which would assuredly, sooner or later, overwhelm him with misery and deep disgrace. For the pain he now endures he knows that he has none but himself to blame, and that, had he lived a sober, temperate, and virtuous life, he would still, in all human probability, have continued in the enjoyment of that greatest temporal blessing—health. These humble reflections and unpalatable truths, we must admit, would not in any sense tend to assuage, but, on the contrary, greatly to increase his pain, and cause him to spend his days and sleepless nights in unavailing sorrow and remorse.

Can we, then, for a moment doubt that ruined souls in hell, whose sufferings are infinitely more acute and agonizing—whose condition is, beyond all comparison and calculation, more hopeless and remediless, and who have brought all these amazing and never-ending torments upon themselves by their wickedness, impenitence, and unbelief—can we doubt that ruined souls in hell will well remember the deeds that they did in the flesh, and that the memory of these things will add most bitterly to their pain and torment? O, memory will be their greatest bane and curse: memory will inflict that punishment in mind which the fierce and unquenchable flames of hell will inflict upon the body. They may try to forget; but the more they try the more shall they remember. Their mental sufferings may be increased, but they cannot be diminished; they may cry aloud for water to cool their burning tongues, but they shall not have one single drop to mitigate the dire intensity of their endless torment; their bodily sufferings may be increased, but, like their mental, they cannot be diminished. To every prayer and supplication for relief—yea, for the slightest mitigation of the everlasting sentence—the same reply shall be repeated—'Son, remember that thou in thy life time receivedst thy good things.'

Can imagination itself portray aught more dreadful and terrific than this most dreadful and terrific reality? In this fleeting, transitory world, in our severest sufferings and anguish—and our severest sufferings and anguish here are ease and comfort compared with what ruined souls will endure hereafter—in our severest sufferings and anguish, hope sustains and cheers us, and is as a precious balm to soothe our pain and heal our wounded hearts. But in that dread and fearful place of torment in the world to come, hope—that sweet tranquilizer of our troubled breasts—never, never comes; but darkness only, and black despair. If hope were suffered to enter there, she might in part assuage the mental anguish of the lost. But that must not, cannot be. Hope shall no more be sent to soothe the tortured mind than a drop of cold water be given, to cool the burning tongue.

And this is that hell from whose devouring jaws the blessed Jesus came to save a lost and ruined world. This is that hell from whose tremendous torments Christ is both willing and ready to save to the uttermost all who, in this day of grace, will come to him and lay hold by faith on everlasting life. This is that hell, through whose dark and dismal gates they who enter in are never suffered to return; and from which dread place I most earnestly and solemnly beseech every one of you, my brethren, to flee in that only way which the gospel of salvation points out to corrupt and fallen man.

ON PIETY.

Piety consists in a knowledge of God, a veneration of his character, a belief in all he has said, and that ardent love to him which induces obedience to all he has commanded. Happy, truly happy are they who have felt its influence. Though it begins in godly sorrow, it issues in joy which is unspeakable and full of glory.

A sense of sin distresses us; a conviction that in the sight of God we are guilty creatures, fills the soul with the most poignant distress; but, as after a storm comes a calm, so, when a glimpse of hope dawns on the mind, when the influence of a Savior's blood is felt, and when pardoning mercy, as freely proclaimed in the gospel, arrests the sinners attention, then the cloud is removed, and light breaks in upon his view.

Perhaps you, my friends, may be possessed of many advantages; but if you are destitute of real piety, other things will be of little avail; on this must rest your hope for eternal happiness. You may have had the advantages of a religious education; you may even have a knowledge of the principles of religion, but if they do not reach your hearts, if they do not lead you to live to God, in holy conversation and godliness, they will profit you nothing.

The value of piety, one would be willing to think, no reasonable creature could doubt; and yet, alas! how many are there who appear ignorant of the very feelings it excites. No sooner does it possess the mind, than its effects are visible.

The bible will no longer be a neglected book, or read merely from habit. It will be loved; it will be daily the object of your study; you will read, that you may know what the will of God is; what is the path of duty there pointed out; what are the sentiments it contains; in short, your conduct will be regulated by it.

You will no longer be a stranger to the throne of grace; you will pray, and pray earnestly, for that grace you feel you need. A sense of your dependence will keep you constantly looking up to God; and a conviction that it is the blessing of the Lord which maketh rich, will lead you never to cease praying for it. A Christian can no more live without prayer than without food.

Solitude will no longer be dreary. In holy communion with God, and your own soul, you will enjoy peace and satisfaction. Those will be some of your happiest hours, when secluded from the world, and when no eye but the eye of your God is over you, you can pour out your whole soul before him as your Father and your Friend.

The Sabbath will no longer be a long and tiresome day; now, instead of saying, what a weariness is it! you will hail its approach as a day devoted to the services of your God.

Your greatest anxiety will be to have every intruding thought banished, that the day may be wholly devoted to the Lord.—It will be your delight to worship in his temple.

Religious conversation, and the society of the people of God, will no longer be avoided. You will seek the company of those who love God; there will be no conversation so interesting as that which has God for its object. Your former companions will no longer have that hold on your heart which they once had. It is with those whose feelings are congenial with your own that you will now unite.—You will love them because they bear the image of that Savior who has gained the affection of your heart.

You will no longer be insensible to the mercies of God's providence. You will receive and enjoy them with gratitude.—Your thanksgivings will now, morning and evening, ascend to heaven, from whence your blessings come.

Death will no longer be an object of dread; it will be contemplated with pleasure, as the road which leads to happiness. To you it will be disarmed of its terrors, and with the Psalmist you will say,—"Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil."

Perhaps you may ask, 'is this a true picture?' Yes, my friends, it is a true picture. The effects of piety will thus be manifest, and though in some they may appear more vivid, yet in all a change of heart will take place; and that change of heart will produce a corresponding change in the disposition and conduct.

This important blessing God has promised to bestow on those who ask it of him; and He has graciously been pleased to say, for the encouragement of the young in particular, "I love them that love me, and they that seek me early shall find me."

THEY'LL LAUGH AT ME.—And what if they do? Is that a reason why you should be laughed out of your principles, and thus deserve to be laughed at for your folly?

Who will laugh at you for obeying the dictates of your own conscience? None who regards the dictates of his own. No one whose opinion should have the least weight with you.

What will they laugh at? At your singularity in adhering to unfashionable virtue? At your vulgarity in refusing to be modelled by the selections of refined and modish vice? Let them laugh. 'Wo unto them that laugh now, for they shall mourn and lament.'

'They'll laugh at me,' said the timid Jane. She had ventured to disobey the mandates of fashion, in declining to wear a dress she knew to be immodest and unbecoming. But her companions derided her. 'They'll laugh at me,' said Jane—and she could not bear to be laughed at. So resumed the dress, and mingled in the gay circle. The fascinations of her unseemly attire seduced and emboldened the young man who became her enemy. Jane is a ruined female now, because she said, 'They'll laugh at me!'

'They'll laugh at me;' said ten thousand promising young men and lovely young maidens, when first enticed to wander from the sober paths of virtuous living. They half recoiled from the temptation. It had no particular fascinations for them. The gay assembly—the deceptive theatre—the maddening game—the flowing bowl—it was not these that lured them at the outset. 'They'll laugh at me!' This it was that turned them aside, and sealed their unhappy destiny. O, my daughters, never let me hear you say, 'They'll laugh at me!'

A BOY'S REASON FOR READING THE BIBLE.—A boy by the name of Joseph Thornton, in a provincial town in England—says a little English tract—who was often observed diligently engaged with his Bible, was one day asked why he took such pains in reading the Scriptures, when most of his age paid so little attention to them.—'Because,' said he, 'the Bible tells me so much of the greatness and goodness of God. I have been reading where it says, God made the world in six days. Now the world is many times bigger than this town, and there is no man that could build one house in that time. What a great Being must he then be, to make a whole world in six days! And this God was so good, another scripture says, as to give his only Son to die for poor sinners. Now I know that I have done many things that are wrong. I have told lies, and been angry with my little brothers and sisters. I am therefore a great sinner. What a good God must he be, to give his Son to die for such a poor sinner as I am!'

The reason which led this child to read the Bible, should induce all, young and old, diligently and daily to search the scriptures. They do indeed, "tell us much of the greatness and goodness of God."

PRAYER FOR THE MINISTRY.—Were people much in this duty, pastors would find it; and so people themselves receive back their prayers with much gain into their own bosom. They would have the return benefit of it, as the vapors that go up from below fall down upon the earth again in sweet showers, and make it fruitful. Thus, if there went up many prayers for pastors, their doctrine would distil as the dew, and the sweet influence of it would make as fruitful vallies the humble hearts receiving it.

It is an inestimable blessing to have the saving light of the gospel shining clear in the faithful and powerful ministry of it.—They thought so who said of their worthy teacher—"Satis solem non lucere, quam Chrysostom non docere"—"Better that the sun should not shine, than that Chrysostom should not teach.—Leighton.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, January 4, 1843.

Mr. JOHN M. CARPENTER will lecture in this village on the evening of the 13th inst. Mr. C. has no superior as a Temperance Lecturer, and his impassiened eloquence never fails to enlist the feelings of his hearers. Come out and hear him.

SECOND ADVENT.—We have not felt called upon to enter largely upon a discussion of this subject. Our opinion is that it is not in the power of Mr. Miller or any other man to find out the time of the Second Advent. If we mistake not, there remains yet much to be done before that time shall come, and more by far than can be accomplished by human agency in the short space Miller has fixed for the Millenium to commence. We admit two articles to-day upon the subject of the Second Advent without deciding upon their correctness, leaving it to our readers to examine and adopt or reject at their pleasure.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—The sympathies of human nature are adverse to the infliction of Capital Punishment. But these sympathies are not always governed by right. Man, if left to make laws to meet the sympathies of his nature, would be more liable to do wrong than right. The language of God to Noah, Gen. ix. 6, we think settles this question, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed." A better code of laws can not be enacted than those enacted by God.

Attention to the Sabbath.

BR. BETHUEL CHURCH informs us that there is much excitement upon the subject of the Sabbath in his vicinity, (Tallmadge, Mich.) One has already embraced it; another says, the Bible requires the seventh-day to be kept as the Sabbath, but he does not think God requires so great a sacrifice as to keep it. What logic is this for a Christian! God requires it, but does not care whether He is obeyed or not! The man must be exceedingly ignorant and presumptuous.

BR. J. L. SCOTT.—The church in Preston are anxious to have Br. Scott labor with them a few weeks in a protracted meeting, &c. And as they know not his whereabouts, they take this method of communicating with him. He may address Eld. Varnum Hull, at Oxford, Chenango Co. N. Y.

☞ A very provoking mistake passed the proof three weeks since in our Hymenial notices. It should read as follows:

Married, in Waterford, Nov. 22, by Eld. Lester T. Rogers, Mr. THOMAS S. GREENMAN, of Mystic, and Miss CHARLOTTE ROGERS. Also, at the same time and place, by the same, Mr. BENEDICT W. ROGERS, of Brooklyn, L. I., and Miss ANN M. ROGERS, daughters of David Rogers, Esq., of Waterford.

We have done what we can to make amends for any interruption we may have caused of the connubial felicity of the very fortunate wights and their no less fortunate "better halves."

LETTER FROM CHINA.—We publish on our first page a part of a letter from J. Lewis Shuck, Baptist Missionary in China.—It contains much matter that is interesting with regard to Missionary operations and British affairs. Our foreign news from China represent matters as settled between England and China. Missionary operations can now be carried on successfully.

A little girl of 3 years has repeated to us several times the following stanzas, with a request that we would print them. They contain very excellent sentiments such as we wish all our young readers to possess. We expect they will commit them to memory, and hope they will follow the instructions they contain. It is a dialogue between a little child and a Bee, and is as follows:—

"'Pretty Bee, pray tell me why
Thus from flower to flower you fly,
Culling sweets the live-long day,
Never leaving off to play?—
Little child, I tell you why
Thus from flow'r to flow'r I fly,
Let the cause thy thoughts engage
From thy youth to riper age.

'Summer flowers will soon be o'er,
Winter comes, they bloom no more;
Finest days will soon be past,
Brightest suns will set at last:
Little child, now learn of me,
Let thy youth thy seed-time be;
And when wintry age shall come,
Richly bear thy harvest home.'"

☞Our subscribers who intend paying WOOD for the Register, are once more reminded that any quantity of the article would be very acceptable about these days. Also, those who have promised Lumber, are requested to prepare the same for delivery soon; and especially those Shingles will be wanted while the snow lasts.

We have an article from a "Friend" on the subject of Capital Punishment, which we omit for want of room.

The Second Advent Nigh!

BY BENJAMIN CLARK.

In three Chapters.

1. Showing the certainty of Christ's second personal coming.

2. Concerning some things which he will do at his appearing and his kingdom.

3. An inquiry concerning the time spoken of by Daniel the Prophet.

"We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed."

As there are now many in different parts of the world, who believe the second coming of Christ to be near at hand, it is thought best to examine this subject. And more particular, as it is a subject of the utmost importance to every individual of the human family. For it is said—"Every eye shall see him." And again—"Every one of us shall give account of himself to God." If, therefore, any one should see that the view here given is not according to that which "is noted in the scripture of truth;" such an one is earnestly requested to correct the writer, and give a more correct view of this important subject.

CHAPTER I.

That Christ will personally come again, I argue—

1. "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven." 1 Thes. iv. 16. "And he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you; whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution," &c. Acts iii. 20. "For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father; and then shall he reward every man according to his works." Mat. xvi. 27. In the communion it is said—"Ye do show the Lord's death till he come." See also Heb. x. 37, Rev. xx. 7, 12, 20. Mat xxiv. 3, 27, 37, 39. 1 Cor. i. 7, and xv. 23. 1 Thes. ii. 10, and iii. 13, and many other scriptures of like import.

2. It is said, "that the testimony of two men is true." John viii. 17. This testimony we have, for when Jesus ascended, or "was taken up," Acts i. 9, 10, 11, "Two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, ye men of Galilee why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as you have seen him go into heaven." The testimony of these two men must then be received as truth. And if he went in "a cloud," he will so come in like manner in a cloud.—See Dan. vii. 13. Mat. xxiv. 30, and xxvi 64. Rev. i. 7. 1 Thes. iv. 17.

To what place will he come? Answer, "His feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east—and the Lord shall be King over all the earth: in that day there shall be one Lord, and his name one." Zech. xiv. 4 to 9. "And I looked, and, lo, a Lamb stood on the Mount Sion, and with him a hundred and forty and four thousand." Rev. xiv. 1. "And at that time shall Michael stand up," &c. Dan. xii. 1. "The mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains," &c. "For out of Zion shall go forth the Law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." Isa. ii. 2, 3. "The first dominion; the kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem," Micah iv. 8.

And in view of the certainty of his second personal coming, ought we not to "watch"—to be "waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ"—to be "looking for, and hasting unto the coming of the day of God,"—"Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Savior Jesus Christ."—With oil in our vessels with our lamps? For behold the bridesgroom cometh, go ye out to meet him!

CHAPTER II.

"The trump of God" will sound. 1 Thes. iv. 16. Mat. xxiv. 31. 1 Cor. xv. 52. Isa. xxvii. 13.

He will gather together his elect, "from the utmost part of the earth to the utmost part of heaven." His elect are those who are set apart. "The Lord hath set apart him that is godly for himself"—"Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence; a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him. He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth (that he may judge his people.)—Psalm l. 3 to 5. He shall "gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are in earth, even in him." Eph. i. 10.

"The dead in Christ shall rise first," and the living saints will be changed, and will "be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air." 1 Thes. iv. 14 to 17. See also 1 Cor. xv. 23. Phil. iii. 11. Rev. xx. 5, 6.

The dead in Christ will be raised incorruptible; "neither can they die any more." Luke xx. 36.

The righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father; and shall be made like unto the glorious Son of God. 1 John iii. 4. Mat. xiii. 43.

Christ will show who is the only Potentate; the only lawful king. 1 Tim. vi. 15. Zech. xiv. 7.

He will put down all other rule, and all authority and power. 1 Cor. xv. 24. Dan. ii. 34. 35, and vii. 9, 14. Hag. ii. 22.

He will give the kingdom dominion and government under the whole heaven to the people of the saints of the Most High, and they "shall judge the world." Dan. vii. 18, 22, 27, 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3, 4. The twelve Apostles shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Mat. xix. 28.—And the saints shall reign on the earth" with Christ "one thousand years." Rev. v, 10, and ii. 26, and iii. 21. Also "for ever and ever." Rev. xxii. 5. They shall eat and drink with Christ in his kingdom.—Luke xxii. 30. Rev. vii. 17.

And when the Son of Man shall "sit upon the throne of his glory; before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another; "Then shall the King say to them on his right hand, come, ye blessed of my Father,"—but to those "on his left hand, depart from me ye cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

This earth appears to be the place of punishment for the wicked—"kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." 2 Pet. iii. 7. "The earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up," verse 10, "For a fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and shall set on fire the foundations of the mountains." Deut. xxxii. 22. "For behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch—and they shall be ashes under the soles of "the feet" of such as fear God."—Mal. iv. 1, 3. "Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence, a fire shall devour before him." "And to you that are troubled rest with us when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, with his mighty angels in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel." "Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest: this shall be the portion of their cup." This, then, is to be the punishment of the wicked. Sodom and Gomorrah and the cities about them, are "an example unto those that after should live ungodly." That fire was called "eternal fire." That fire was "unquenchable fire:" and was an "example" of fire and brimstone to be acted over again. But as the Lord "delivered just Lot," so he "knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust to the day of judgment to be punished;" that is, when he shall again "rain snares, fire and brimstone," according to Deut. xxix. 23, Psalm xi. 6, Job xviii. 15, Ezek. xxxviii. 22, Luke xvii. 29, 30, Rev. xiv. 10, and Isa. xxxiv. 9. "And it shall come to pass, that every soul which will not hear that Prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people." Then will it be said, "The inhabitants of the earth are burned, and few men left." Isa. xxiv. 6. "For behold the Lord will come with fire. For by fire and by his sword will the Lord plead with all flesh; and the slain of the Lord shall be many." Isa. lxvi. 15.

If the above scriptures are not sufficient to show every person that the wicked will be destroyed, and the earth purified by fire, and "the sanctuary cleansed" and succeeded by a new heavens and a new earth, at the coming of the Lord: I will quote two or three more scriptures as evidence of this truth. First, "As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear." Mat. xiii. 10.

Second. See also to the same effect verse 49 and 50. The parable of the "net."—And Third, See 2 Pet. iii. 10 to 14, showing the same, to be succeeded by the "new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Therefore, fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment will soon come; and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters.

Congressional News.

Correspondence of the Jour. of Com.

WASHINGTON, Wednesday, Dec. 14.

Since yesterday a great change of opinion has occurred here in regard to the mutiny affair. The communication which appeared in the Madisonian of this morning, signed S, has induced many to review and recall their first hasty impressions.—The general sentiment is still that Capt. Mackenzie could not have acted improperly in the matter; but there is a strong desire to see the papers, to examine the testimony, upon which he acted.

All agree that the only principle which could justify the proceeding, to wit, necessity—the same necessity which justifies homicide in self-defense. That Capt. Mackenzie will show that this necessity existed there can scarcely be a doubt, notwithstanding the suggestions of the very able writer of the communication referred to.

Quintuple Treaty.—In the Senate, to-day the principle subject of interest was the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Benton, which was taken up and read as follows, to wit:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether the Quintuple Treaty for the suppression of the slave-trade has been communicated to the Government of the United States in any form, whatever, and, if so, by whom? for what purpose? and what answer may have been returned to such communication. Also, to communicate to the Senate all the information which may have been received by the Government of the United States, going to show that the "course which this Government might take in relation to said treaty has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe." Also, to inform the Senate how far the animadversions, and "The great political excitement" which this treaty has caused in Europe, have any application or reference to these United States. Also, to inform the Senate what danger there was of leaving "the laws and the obligations" of the United States in relation to the suppression of the slave-trade to be "executed by others," if we did not "remove their pretext and motive for violating our flag and executing our laws," by entering into the stipulations for the African squadron, and the remonstrating sentences which are contained in the 6th and 9th articles of the late British treaty.

Mr. Benton commented with more severity on the terms of the message and insisted upon the propriety of developing, by this call, the recent intrigue by which we had been compelled to pay tribute to Great Britain, under the pretext of suppressing the slave-trade.

Mr. Archer said the statements of the message were true. The Government of France had renounced any participation in the quintuple treaty, and this was of itself, a sufficient proof that the subject "had excited much attention and discussion in Europe," as the president had alleged. Did the Senator suppose that we were to ask others to execute our own laws; was that his doctrine? Were we to execute our own laws or were we to rely on others to do it? There is nothing to support the Senator's inference that this Government had acted under any menace as regarded the treaty with Great Britain, we had already had a full history of the negotiation before us. The President could give us nothing more; and he thought it improper that such a call should be sent to the President.

I put it, said Mr. Archer, to the Senator, that his object is not to get information. If his object be merely to denounce the President, it is already attained by the introduction of the resolution. Mr. A. was about to move to lay it on the table, when

Mr. King requested a postponement to afford him time to examine it.

Mr. Benton, in reply to Mr. Archer, asked for the reading of the resolution.—He then contended that there must be many communications in the State Department, from different Governments on this subject. He would undertake to say that very full communication had been made to the State Department. He had an object in calling for this information. It had reference to the appropriations which we were called upon to make to support the African squadron. We are, said Mr. Benton, to keep a thousand men in the African seas; we are to expend money and life there, and all this we are to do under a threat of Great Britain and of the holy alliance, that if we do not this, they will execute our laws for us. In fact, if we do not this, they are to seize and search our vessels. We purchase from them the freedom of navigation by paying tribute of money and ships. I wish to see the facts on which this Government has come to this conclusion.

The subject was then postponed, and the resolution ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON, DEC. 21.

Senate.—Mr. Berrien presented a petition from a number of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt act, and setting forth the reasons for their prayer. Referred to the Committe on the Judiciary.

Mr. Benton presented a memorial from Washington county, Vermont, asking for a repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. Benton said a few words upon the subject, referring to his former remarks, and relating to the operation of the law in England. The present law was alluded to also, and Mr. Benton remarked that he would not vote for the repeal of the law.

Mr. Benton having closed his remarks, the memorial presented by him was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Resolutions.—Mr. Allen of Ohio presented a resolution, in the terms of one heretofore presented by him, to the effect that all business now considered with closed doors, except such as may relate to treaties, shall be considered with open doors. The resolution lies over under the rule.

State Debts.—Mr. Benton offered a resolution, which also lies over under the rule calling upon the President to communicate to the Senate any correspondence which took place pending the recent negotiations between the United States and Great Britain, upon the subject of the State debts.

Oregon.—Mr. Linn offered a resolution calling the President to communicate the informal communications between the Secretary of State and Lord Ashburton upon Oregon Territory, and to inform the Senate whether any communications, formal or otherwise, were made referring to reasons for not including the Oregon Territory in the recent treaty. Objections being made, the resolution was not considered.

Mr. Linn offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling upon the Secretary of war to communicate the report of Lieut. Tremont giving the result of the exploring expedition to the Rocky mountains.

Mr. Linn from the Select Committee, reported a bill for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon territory.

The Senate at an early hour, on motion of Mr. Barrow, adjourned.

In the House, the Committees were called for reports, when

Mr. Cowen from the Committee on Claims, reported a resolution, that the House will meet on Friday and Saturday next, the 23d and 24th inst., at 10 o'clock, for the purpose of disposing of private claims upon the calendar.

The resolution was adopted.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the Albany Eve. Journal.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA.

Highly Important from the East—Complete success of the British in India—Treaty of Peace between China and Great Britain.

By the cars from Boston, we received last evening the important intelligence brought by the steamer Britannia. The Britannia arrived at Boston at half past 4 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, making her passage in 17 days, notwithstanding a good deal of rough weather.

The news received prior to her departure, by the overland mail from India, is of the highest interest. It will be seen by the extracts subjoined, which we take from the Boston Atlas, that the war is at an end both in India and China. The British arms have triumphed alike over the Affghans and Tartars. A formal treaty of peace has been concluded with China, by which the celestials consent to pay twenty-one millions of dollars and to cede Hong-Kong unconditionally to the British.

The intelligence from England, France and Portugal is of no moment.

CHINA.

The overland mail reached London on the 22d ult, with the most important information that a treaty of peace had been concluded with China.

The intelligence was brought to Malta on the 13th inst. from Alexandria, and forwarded to Marseilles by the Locust steamer. From China it bears date Nankin, the 31st of August, and Hong Kong, the 10th of Dec., and is even more gratifying and important than the French telegraph led us to suppose. The last advices recorded, it will be remembered, the capture of Woosung and Shanghae, in the Yang-tze-Keang; the destruction of numerous batteries and defenses on the banks of the Woosung river; and the departure of the fleet for Nankin, for the purpose of commencing operations against that city. On the 20th of July, the expedition anchored abreast of the city of Chinkeang-foo, a very strongly fortified town, commanding the entrance of the Grand Canal; and the next morning the troops were disembarked, and whilst one brigade attacked the Chinese camp, another was posted to cut off the retreat of the Chinese from the city; and a third was ordered to escalade the walls.

The Chinese fled, after a few vollies, from the camp, but the city itself was manfully defended by the Tartar soldiers, who, after a prolonged contest of several hours' duration, were at length overpowered. The garrison is supposed to have consisted of 3,000 men, one third of whom, along with forty mandarins, are said to have been killed or wounded. The Tartar general, finding that all was lost, retired to his house, and having ordered his servants to fire it, sat in his chair until he was burned to death. The British casualities on this occasion were unusually heavy. Among the officers killed we regret to have to record the death of Major Unjacke, of the Royal Marines; as also Colonel Driver, of the 6th Madras N. I.; Capt. Collinson of the 89th Royal Irish; Lieut. Gibbons of the 49th; whilst 154 men of both services were killed or wounded. Leaving, as we have already stated it to have been Sir Hugh Gough's intention, a strong garrison behind, the expedition proceeded up the river Yang-tze, and having anchored off Nankin, made preparations for bombarding that part of the city near the river. A large division of the army, under the command of Lord Saltoun, landed to the west of the city, and took up a position on a hill about half a mile distant from the walls.

The inhabitants are stated to have declared their unwillingness to allow their houses and property to be destroyed. The garrison, consisting of about 14,000 Tartar and Chinese troops, became terrified.—A flag of truce was sent out to the British plenipotentiary, praying for a cessation of hostilities, which was granted, as the commissioners having full power from the Emperor were declared to be on their road in order to treat for peace. The assault on Nankin, which was designed for the 13th, was, therefore, postponed.

On the 15th the High Imperial Commissioners arrived. There were three. They speedily communicated to the British Plenipotentiary their powers, which were found to be in due order. Visits of ceremony then took place, and after various conferences, the conditions of a treaty of peace were signed in the presence of the Admiral and General, and many other British officers. Copies of these conditions were immediately transmitted to Pekin, and their return was expected in ten days. When the treaty was signed a Royal salute was fired, and all restrictions removed on the intercourse between the expedition and the natives.

The treaty of peace has given great satisfaction to the British in India and China. It is said that the Emperor had at first some doubts as to the propriety of opening a foreign trade at Foo-chow-foo, which is the capital of Fokien, and the nearest port to the country where the Bohea tea grows, but that he afterwards yielded that point.

The Commissioners are described as anxious to get rid of the British from the Yang-tze-Keang and the embouchure of the Grand Canal; they offered pay down four millions instantly, but the British Plenipotentiary insisted on the full instalment being paid and the ratification of the treaty before he would withdraw.

The payment of the opium claims will, it is stated, be adjusted according to the amount fixed some months ago by the British government. It was said that the Imperial Commissioners had pressed the consideration of the opium trade on the British Plenipotentiary, but he declined to discuss it, stating, if the Chinese government were desirous of producing a stoppage to it, that it ought to be effected by their own internal regulations, and by imposing restrictions on their own subjects.

The steamers were the objects of great curiosity to the Chinese, who called those vessels the "Devil's ships."

At the time the Sesostris left Nankin the six million dollars were in course of collection.

The following vessels were still off Nankin, and would not move from their position till the first instalment should have been paid:—

Her Majesty's ship Cornwallis, Vice-Admiral Sir W. Parker; Blonde, Childers, Clio, Algerine.

H. M. steamers Vixen and Driver.

Off the Grand Canal:—

Her Majesty's ships Endymion, Calliope and Dido.

East India Company's steamer Proserpine.

The Auckland steamer was to leave Nankin, with Major Malcolm, on the 10th of the month, to convey the Emperor's ratification of the treaty to England. The Auckland would go direct from Singapore to Suez.

The Tenasserim steamer left Nankin with the Sesostris, to convey the tidings of peace to Calcutta, and touched at Amoy; she was to leave Hong Kong on the 11th.

The Nemesis steamer was to proceed to Formosa to rescue the crews of the Anne and Nerbudda.

Considerable sickness had prevailed among the forces in the Yang-tze-Keang. The Sesostris had nearly her whole crew in the sick list. The 98th Regiment had lost upwards of a hundred men by sickness.

The payment of the money due by the Chinese is, it is stated, to be effected in the following manner:—Immediate payment, 6,000,000; in 1843, 6,000,000; in 1844, 5,000,000; in 1845, 4,000,000.—Thus we have not only gained every object for which war was made on three hundred millions of people, but have also concluded an honorable peace, and opened up an intercourse with the most fertile provinces of the empire. In place of one port for carrying on trade, British ships are to be allowed free access to five, namely—Canton, Amoy, Foo-chow-foo, Ningpo and Chinghæ. The position and advantages of Canton are well known. Ningpo and Chinghæ are equally advantageous, and will afford a short communication with the great tea district in that quarter, and also secure intercourse with Nankin and other large cities along the Grand Canal, and the noble river Yang-tze-keang, where a British fleet, many miles up the country, now for the first time in the history of the world, has safely at anchor. Foo-chow-foo is to the west of these places, and is situated on a fine river called Min, which takes rise in the black tea district, and flows past Chaou, Yen-ping, and other cities of great importance.

OFFICIAL DESPATCHES.

CIRCULAR.

To Her Britannic Majesty's Subjects in China.

Her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary, &c., in China, has extreme gratification in announcing to her Majesty's subjects in China, that he has this day concluded and signed with the Chinese high commissioners, deputed to negociate with him, a treaty, of which the following are the most important provisions:—

1.—Lasting peace and friendship between the two empires.

2.—China to pap twenty-one millions of dollars in the course of the present and three succeeding years.

3.—The ports of Canton, Amoy, Foo-chow-foo, Ningpoo, and Shanghai, to be thrown upon to British merchants, consular officers to be appointed to reside at them, and regular and just tariffs of import and export, (as well as inland transit,) duties to be established and published.

4.—The island of Hong-Kong to be ceded in perpetuity to her Britannic Majesty, her heirs and successors,

5.—All subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, (whether natives of Europe or India) who may be confined in any part of the Chinese empire, to be unconditionally released.

6.—An act of full and entire amnesty to be published by the Emperor under his imperial sign manual, and seal to all Chinese subjects, on account of their having held service or intercourse with, or resided under the British government, or its officers.

7.—Correspondence to be conducted on terms of perfect equality amongst the officers of both governments.

8.—On the Emperor's assent being received to this treaty, and the payment of the first $6,000,000 her Britannic Majesty's forces to retire from Nankin and the Grand Canal, the military posts at Chinghae to be also withdrawn, but the islands of Chusan and Kulangsoo are to be held until the money payments and the arrangements for opening the ports be completed.

In promulgating this highly satisfactory intelligence, her Majesty's plenipotentiary, &c., purposely refrains from any detailed expression of his own sentiments as to the surpassing skill, energy, devotion, and valor which have distinguished the various grades, from the highest to the lowest of all arms of her Majesty's combined forces, during the contest that has led to these momentous results. The claims which have been thus established, will be doubtless acknowledged by the highest authorities. In the meantime, her Majesty's plenipotentiary congratulates her Majesty's subjects in China on the occasion of a peace, which he trusts and believes will, in due time, be equally beneficial to the subjects of both England and China. God save the Queen.

Dated on board the steam-frigate Queen, in the Yang-tse-Keang river, off Nankin, this 29th day of August, 1842.

Malta, Nov. 25.

A special steamer has come from Nankin to Suez with the news, that the Emperor of China had accepted the treaty, but will not ratify before the Queen of England for reasons of etiquette.

Half the first instalment of money has been paid.

INDIA.

The detail of the operations of the British forces on the east and west of the English Indian possessions, is highly important. The skill of the generals, the bravery of the troops, and the determination of the British plenipotentiary to obtain full redress, have all been crowned with complete success. The gallant commanders of the two divisions in Affghanistan, Generals Pollok and Nott, left their respective quarters nearly about the same time, marched with well equipped armies on Cabul, and after defeating the enemy in every battle, and clearing every dangerous pass, planted the British standard a second time on the Bala Hissar of Cabul, with their victorious troops, met in the capital of Affghanistan.

Some severe fighting took place on both routes, but the British forces maintained their high character, and defeated the enemy with comparatively little loss in every encounter. A number of the prisoners detained by Akbar Khan, were found in safety at Cacul, and strong hopes existed that Lady Sale and the rest would be speedily set at liberty. Akbar Khan had fled to the mountains.

The following is from the papers and correspondence:—

"The report of General Nott's victory over Shumshooden Khan, in the neighborhood of Ghuznee, which was current at our last advices, has turned out correct.—The engagement took place on the 30th of August, at a place about 38 miles from the city, and was a gallant and well-contested fight.

"Two days previously, a body of the enemy had attacked the rear-guard of our force, but were defeated and dispersed by a detachment of cavalry under Captain Christie, and about fifty of their number cut off.

"Nothing daunted by this trifling reverse Shumshooden moved out with nearly the whole of his army, amounting to not less than 12,000 men, and arrived in the neighborhood of the British camp about three o'clock on the afternoon of the 30th.

"'I moved out,' says General Nott, 'with one half of my force; the enemy advanced in the most bold and gallant manner, each division cheering as they came into position, their left being upon a hill of some elevation, their centre and right along a low ridge until their flank rested on a fort filled with men; they opened a fire of small arms, supported by two six-pounder horse artillery guns, which were admirably served; our columns advanced upon the different points with great regularity and steadiness and after a short and spirited contest, completely defeated the enemy, capturing the guns, tents, ammunition, &c., dispersing them in every direction. One hour's more daylight would have enabled me to destroy the whole of their infantry. Shumshooden fled in the direction of Ghuznee, accompanied by about thirty horsemen.

"'In the above action and the engagement on the preceding day, our total casualties amounted to 104 killed and wounded.

"On the 1st of Sept., Gen. Nott advanced from Gonine (where the battle took place,) and continued his march to Ghuznee. He arrived on the 6th, and invested the city, which was strongly garrisoned, while the hills to the north-eastward swarmed with soldiery. These heights were the first object of the attack, and after considerable opposition they were effectually cleared.—Preparations were then made for an attack on the fortress, but before our batteries could be opened, the enemy abandoned it, and left us once more complete masters of Ghuznee. Our flags were then hoisted in triumph on the Bala Hissar.

"The loss sustained by our troops amounted to no more than three killed and forty-three wounded. Three hundred and twenty-seven Sepoys of the 27th Native Infantry, were found in the city, and released from slavery, to which state they had been reduced by the Affghans.

"Ghuznee is now a desolate heap of ruins. Its splendid citadel and other formidable works and defenses, have been razed to the ground.

"The force was to leave about the 9th or 10th of September, and would join Gen. Pollock at Cabul on the 17th or 18th.

"My last letter informed you of the departure of Gen. Pollock from Gundamuck on his way to Cabul. He reached Soorkah in one march, and left on the 8th of Sept. in progress to Jugdulluck. On reaching the hills which command the road through the pass, the enemy were found strongly posted, and in considerable numbers. They resisted our passage with determined courage, and most manfully maintained their position, although our guns told with deadly effect amongst them. At length the heights were stormed, and, after much arduous exertion, the enemy were dislodged and dispersed. A large body of them, however, fled to the summit of a lofty hill, where they planted their standards, and seemed to set us at defiance. To complete our victory, Gen. Pollock directed Capt. Wilkinson and Broadfoot to take possession of this stronghold, which accordingly was gallantly assaulted, when the Ghilzies gave way and fled from the field.

In this action several of the most influential Affghan chiefs were engaged; and the total amount of the force brought forward to oppose us is estimated by Gen. Pollock at from 4,000 to 5,000. Our loss was rather heavy, Capt. Nugent, the Sub-Assistant Commissary-General being killed, and Maj Gen. Sale slightly wounded, and 62 men killed and wounded.

"Gen. Pollock proceeded onwards, and does not appear to have encountered any further opposition, until his arrival on the 13th of Sept., in the Tezeen valley, where an army of 16,000 men, commanded by Mahomed Akbar Khan in person, was assembled to meet him. A desperate fight ensued; we have no particulars; but the result was that the enemy was completely defeated, and driven from the field with a loss of several hundred killed and wounded. Our loss was 32 killed and 132 wounded. The name of Capt. Lushington, of her Majesty's 9th; Capt. Geils, of the 60th Native Infantry; Lieut. Norton, 35th Light Infantry; and Lieut. Montgomery of the 60th Native Infantry, among the list of the latter. Akhbar Khan fled in the direction of Bameean.

"On the day following this engagement, the Gen. advanced to Boodkak; on the next he encamped on the race course at Cabul; and the 16th witnessed his triumphant entry into the citadel, and the planting of our colors on its walls.

"The city was nigh deserted. The prisoners who had been left there on the removal of their companions to Bameean, were restored to us by the Kuzzibashes.—They consisted of Mrs. Trevor and eight children, Capt. and Mrs. Anderson and three children, Capt. Troup and Dr. Campbell. It would appear that the captives, who were taken to Bameean, are not now in the custody of Mahommed Akhbar, as at the date of our latest accounts, Gen. Pollock appeared to entertain a confident expectation of obtaining their release in eight or ten days; while Capt. Bygrave, who had been carried off by the Sirdar, was not thought likely to be recovered at present. Lieut. Sir Richmond Shakspeare has proceeded in search of them, at the head of 700 Kuzzilbashes.

"The arrival of Gen. Nott was daily looked for; and on the junction of the two armies it is said they would return to India with as little delay as possible. There seems no probability of our re-occupying Cabul. As soon as the prisoners are all recovered, we shall no doubt retire, after completing the work of retribution by the destruction of the city.

"A great deal of discussion has at different times arisen on the subject of the national character of the Affghans; the advocates of retirement heaping praises on the treacherous assassins of Cabul, and vehemently proclaiming their patriotism—their valor—and their kindness to the captives; while other writers repudiated principles so discreditable, painted our enemies in their true colors, and denounced, with honest indignation, their abominable crimes. The correctness of these latter views has been proved on numberless occasions; and we have now a yet stronger and more fearful confirmation of their truth, in the fact that the whole of the sepoys of th 27th Native Infantry, who were released at Ghuznee, had been reduced to slavery by the Affghans! Of this there is no doubt—not even the encomiasts of our enemies—with all their effrontery, can deny it—and there is another tale, more horrible in its nature, which, though not officially noticed, has been repeated in dozens of private letters, and which, if true, and it seems worthy of all belief—will condemn the Affghan character to eternal infamy, and furnish a bitter commentary on the praises of those who have defended it.—It is this, that previous to the action of Jugdulluck, on the advance of our column, a soldier of the 44th was burned alive by the Ghilzies in sight of our troops, on whose approach the throat of the victim was cut to make sure of him! Thus were the patriots fighting 'in defense of their mountain homes'—thus did they exhibit their 'nobleness of spirit'—thus was their 'uniform kindness to the captives' triumphantly demonstrated! If this does not alter the sickly and effeminate tone of some of your home journals in reference to the Affghan war, nothing surely will effect the change."

The British troops have evacuated Quettah, and retired below the Bolan Pass.—The interior of India is tranquil, and all apprehensions of scarcity have been removed by the abundant rains of the monsoon. For minor details we must be content to refer to the despatches, which we have elsewhere published, and the following extracts from letters:—

"Our accounts from Scinde are not of much importance, relating chiefly to the movements of Gen. England's force, now on its return to India, one detachment of which, under Major Reid, left Quettah on the 10th, and Reached Dadur on the 19th of Sep., while the 2d division would proceed through the Bolan Pass on the 21st. The country is described as perfectly tranquil. Cholera prevails to a great extent among the troops at Kurachee.

"Boondelkund is still in rather a disturbed state; but no fresh collision of any importance appeared to have occurred with the rebels."

Lieut. Col. Low has resigned the regency at Lucknow, and Maj. Gen. Nott, the new "hero of Ghuznee," has been appointed by the Governor-general to succeed to this lucrative post.

Major General Pollock, who may as appropriately be designated the "hero of Cabul," has been appointed to the general staff of the army, in succession to the late Major General Penny.

"We have nothing of importance from Madras, beyond the announcement of the arrival of the Marquis of Tweeddale, and his assumption of the government, and the departure of his predecessor.

"Our Bombay local news is unimportant. The burning of the ship Eleanor, on the 29th of Sept., at Alepee, on the Malabar coast, by the Lascars (as it is believed) on board of her, is the chief item. The suspected parties have been lodged in jail. The vessel was bound from Bombay to Calcutta.

"The following piece of intelligence, issued by one of our local journals, appears to be a new version of the affair of the 28th of Aug., in which Capt. Christie commanded, and which is given in Gen. Nott's despatch:

"Letters from Nott's camp, dated Mydana, 15th ultimo, had been received at Loodiahah, stating that the cavalry had suffered sadly on the 28th of Aug., having turned out to release their own grass-cutters, (said to be hemmed in in a fort some miles distant from the camp,) and being inveigled into a kind of basin by parties of Affghans who retired before them skirmishing. All of a sudden the cavalry found themselves beset by about 3,000 matchlock men, who crowned the hills around and opened a heavy fire.

"The cavalry retired in pretty good order until the commanding officer, fancying there was an opportunity of making an example of some of the enemy, ordered a squadron to charge up a tolerably accessible spur, in which two officers and many men were killed. The squadron was repulsed, and its support so roughly handled, that all fell into confusion and our party returned into camp fairly thrashed! The infantry and some guns now turned out, to recover the slain, in which they succeeded. The bodies had been awfully mangled!—Gen. Nott had dropped this affair into the more successful one of the 30th of Aug., which completely broke the enemy's host and power!"

The Pekin Gazette contains a proclamation in which it is said some merchants of Cheakeang have made a donation to the Emperor of three millions of dollars for the defense of the country. This is patriotism in reality.

There has recently been found, says a Belgian journal, among a heap of old books purchased at St. Trond, the sixth known copy of the first Bible printed at Mentz.

The Journal de Frankfort states that there have been recently discovered in the vicinity of Nikolstadt, Silesia, stones so mixed with veins of gold, that one alone yields the value of seven ducats.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

BY VIRTUE of one writ of Fieri Facias, issued out of the Supreme Court of the People of the State of New York, and to me directed and delivered, against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of Adin Burdick, I have levied on, seized, and taken all the right, title, claim and interest, of the said Burdick, of and to the following described pieces of land, on the 24th day of December, 1840 or at any time since, all that certain piece or parcel of land situate in the 18th township, town of Brookfield, county of Madison, being part of lot No. 60 & 69, and bounded as follows: Beginning at the south east corner of lot No. 69, thence west to the south east corner of J. H. Burch's land, thence northerly along said Burch's line and up the creek to Benjamin Burdick's land, thence easterly along said Benjamin's line to S. P. Burdick's land, thence south to the south west corner of said S. P. Burdick's land, thence east to the centre of the highway, thence along said highway to the south east corner of a piece of land on lot No. 69, owned and occupied by Benjamin Burdick, thence east to Jacob Langworthy's land, thence south about 20 rods to the place of beginning, containing about 66 acres of land, be the same more or less. Also, one other piece or parcel of land in the town and county aforesaid, bounded as follows: Beginning at a stake near the corner of the mill dam, near the potash, thence north 70 degrees, east 14 rods to the road, thence on the road easterly six rods to a stake, thence south 68 degrees, west 19 rods to the bridge, thence north 78 degrees, west 19 rods to the corner of the said lot, thence north 15 degrees, east six rods and 5 links between the barn and shed to a stake, thence north 79 degrees west, 3 1-2 rods, thence north 7 degrees, east 13 rods to a stake at the pond, thence around the pond on the westerly side until it comes to the lands of Oliver Brown, at a stake, thence across the creek easterly to a stake on the east bank of said creek, thence down the pond on the easterly bank till it comes to the first mentioned bound, containing 8 acres of land more or less, together with the mills and water privileges thereon and the appurtenances thereto belonging. Also, one other piece or parcel of land, situate in the town and county aforesaid, on which the store stands, bounded, south by the highway, west by Truman Miller's house lot, north by land owned by Roswell P. Dowse, and easterly by the above described piece, supposed to contain one half of an acre of land be the same more or less, together with the buildings thereon, which I shall expose to sale at public vendue, at the inn now kept by Isaac P. Miner, in the village of Leonardsville, town of Brookfield, on the 9th day of January, 1843, at 10 o'clock, A. M.—Dated, Merrisville, Nov. the 23d, 1842.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and traveling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, trouble and expense. The principal advantage to be derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inksand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents—Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

Cost of preparing the work, $5000. This beautiful and important work contains upwards of 500 pages royal octavo, printed from new stereotype plates, handsomely bound in gilt and lettered, and retails readily at the low price of $2 50 per volume. The following extract is from a lengthy Review, written by the Rev. W. C. Brownlee, D. D., and is only one out of several hundred recommendations, from the clergy and the press, that the work has already received.

New-York, August 6, 1842.

"This is, beyond question, one of the most elegant books ever presented to our fellow citizens in this Republic. It ought to be in every Christian family for its intrinsic value; and in every patriotic family as a splendid specimen of our progress in domestic manufactures, and the advancement of our artists and manufacturers in their rivalship with those of Europe. W. C. BROWNLEE."

A very liberal Offer!—One Hundred Dollars will be given by the Publisher to every Agent who will undertake and sell One Hundred Copies of the above Work. He believes that there is scarcely a town or village in the Union, but that numbers may easily be disposed of.

. Persons enclosing money, will be careful to pay the whole postage; and in ordering books will state, explicitly, how the books shall be sent to them.

Also, in press, another important, valuable, and cheap work, in the course of publication, and will be ready for delivery early in October, 1842, complete in one volume royal octavo, containing about 600 pages of letter-press, and more than five hundred Engravings, elegantly bound in gilt: price only $2 50 per copy.

POETRY.

Human Love.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

Oh! if there is one law above the rest,
Written in wisdom—if there is a word
That I would trace as with a pen of fire
Upon the unsunn'd temper of a child—
If there is any thing that keeps the mind
Open to the angel visits, and repels
The ministry of ill—'tis human love!
God hath made nothing worthy of contempt.
The smallest pebble in the well of truth
Has its peculiar meaning, and will stand
When man's best monuments have passed away.
The law of heaven is love, and tho' its name
Has been usurped by passion, and profaned
To its unholy uses through all time,
Still the eternal principle is pure;
And in these deep affections that we feel
Omnipotent within us, we but see
The lavish measure in which love is given;
And in the yearning tenderness of a child
For every bird that sings above his head,
And every creature feeding on the hills,
And every tree and flower and running brook,
We see how every thing was made to love;
And how they err, who in a world like this
Find any thing to hate but human pride.

NEW-ENGLAND GENEROSITY.

BY REV. DR. STOWE.

The Pilgrims and their descendants have always been remarkable for their public spirit, and their generosity in sustaining the institutions and appliances of civilization. I know it is customary to stigmatize them as avaricious, selfish, and mean; but how does this appear? It is seen in the meanness of their dwellings, in the parsimoniousness of their style of living, the niggardliness of their public improvements, the want of regard for that which constitutes the ultimatum, the refinement of society? Show me the part of the United States which excels New-England in any of these respects.

Is this meanness and selfishness seen in any attempts so to control the general government as to promote their own interests, at the expense of the interests of the nation at large? If I read aright the history of American legislation, the enactments of Congress have never promoted New-England interests at the expense of other interests; but the wealth of New-England has been repeatedly and lavishly sacrificed for the pecuniary advantage of other parts of the Union. Embargoes have been put on, and embargoes taken off—tariffs have been imposed, and tariffs have been removed—change after change has been made, by every one of which New-England has suffered; and so soon as she has turned her wealth and industry into the new channel to which the law has forced her, and she begins again to prosper, the general government forces another change, and she again must suffer. This fluctuating legislation has cost New-England millions on millions; reduced her most opulent families to poverty, and filled her streets with distress; and yet, instead of rebelling against the government, at every new change she goes resolutely to work, with all her might, buffeting the waves which are thrown in against her, and adapting herself as speedily as possible to her circumstances. Does she conduct herself like a selfish or mean member in this great confederacy? I should think the selfishness and meanness belonged somewhere else.

Does she show herself avaricious, selfish, and mean in regard to public charities and the support of religious and literary institutions? Not only are her own charitable, literary, and religious institutions known to be more nobly endowed and better maintained, as a whole, than those of any other part of the Union, but she is continually sending into other States vast sums of money for the support of similar institutions there. Scarcely is an educational or religious enterprise started at the South or West, but what New-England is solicited for men and money to sustain it; but when has New-England ever sent South or West, for money or men to sustain her charitable efforts?

To the Theological Seminary at Prince Edward, in Virginia, Boston alone contributed at one time $10,000, and this institution probably received in all not less than $50,000 from the Yankees. For the Theological Seminary in Columbia, S. C., something like $17,000 was subscribed by the same class of people. Towards erecting the first Presbyterian church in New Orleans, they gave $30,000; towards the second, $20,000 and other donations, amounting in all to nearly $80,000 for the support of religion in that one city, and that, too, for a form of religion to which they are not themselves attached, and which has manifested very little of either sympathy or gratitude to them. When has their liberality been exhibited in the other direction? When bishops solicited from the Congregationalists of New-England, donations for the establishment of Episcopal institutions at the West, their requests were liberally responded to—a charity which, perhaps, at some future time, may be reciprocated, though the past has given but few examples of such of such reciprocation.

During the thirty years succeeding the year 1800, there were given in the city of Boston alone, for general religious and charitable objects, and in a way that admitted of accurate estimate, more than $2,000,000. During the same period, the Theological School at Andover was endowed by individuals in other parts of Massachusetts, at an expense probably of $300,000, and the three colleges of the State received during the same period, and from similar sources, at least $600,000. Probably the whole state of Massachusetts, during that period, contributed, at least, $5,000,000, and perhaps $6,000,000, to objects of this kind; and her charities have not diminished since.—Indeed, I doubt whether the world has ever before furnished an instance of such long-continued, open-handed generosity, so entirely free from sectarian and sectional bias, and with such niggardly remuneration, even in the way of thanks. New-England has received hard names and reproaches, in some instances, even from those whom she has benefitted, a few of whom seem to be entirely incapable of comprehending the idea that any class of Christians ever willingly made sacrifices for the promotion of religion without reference to the advancement of their own sect. If no selfish motive can be seen, they think themselves in duty bound to imagine one.

In looking at these proofs of New-England generosity, it should be recollected that money there, at least a great portion of what is expended in religious charity, comes in small sums, and by very hard work. One of the old citizens of Ohio, who is a native of New-England, once said to me:—"When I was a young man, on the south shore of Massachusetts, and hoed my corn four times a year, and worked the earth around, with my fingers, among the plants to make them grow, and after all thought I did well to get twelve, or even eight bushels to the acre, I did not know what it was to live easy." Nor do the New-England people generally, know what it is to live easy. Yet, though it requires double the labor there to obtain half the income that may be obtained in some other portions of the country, their religious charities on the whole are nearly double what they are any where else. And these are the people who are called selfish, mean, stingy! Let those who reproach them do half as much for public interests of any sort, and we can then listen to their taunts with less contempt.

THE ARABIAN HORSE.

A most moving incident, illustrative of the extraordinary strength, as well as attachment of the Arab horses is given by Lamartine, in his beautiful travels in the east:

"An Arab chief, with his tribe, had attacked in the night a caravan of Damascus and plundered it; when loaded with their spoil, however, the robbers were overtaken in their return by some horsemen of the Pacha of Acre, who killed several, and bound the remainder with cords. In this state of bondage they brought one of the prisoners, named Abou el Marck, to Acre, laid him, bound hand and foot, wounded as he was, at the entrance of their tent, as they slept during the night. Kept awake by the pain of his wounds, the Arab heard his horse's neigh at a little distance, and, being desirous to stroke for the last time the companion of his life, dragged himself up, bound as he was to his horse, which was picketed at a short distance. "Poor friend," said he, "what will you do among the Turks? You will be shut up under the roof of a khan, with the horses of a Pacha, or an aga; no longer will the women, and children of the tent bring you barley, camel's milk, or dourra, in the hollow of their hand; no longer will you gallop free as the wind of Egypt in the desert; no longer will you cleave with your bosom, the waters of the Jordan, which cool your sides as pure as the foam of your lips. If I am to be a slave, at least may you go free. Go! return to the tent, which you know so well; tell my wife that Abou el Marck will return no more; but put your head still in the folds of the tent, and lick the hands of my children."

With these words, as his hands were tied, he undid with his teeth the fetters which held the courser bound, and set him at liberty; but the noble animal, on receiving its freedom, instead of bounding away to the desert, bent its head over its master, and seeing him in his fetters and on the ground, took his clothes gently in his teeth, lifted him up, and set off at full speed towards home. Without ever resting, he made straight for the distant, but well-known tent, in the mountains of Arabia.

He arrived there in safety, and laid his master safe down at the feet of his wife and children, and immediately dropped down dead with fatigue. The whole tribe mourned him; the poets celebrated his fidelity; and his name is still constantly in the mouths of the Arabs of Jericho."

This beautiful anecdote paints the manners and the horses of Arabia, better than a thousand volumes. It is unnecessary to say, after it, the Arabs are, and ever will be, the first horsemen, and have the finest race of horses, in the world.

THE GIPSIES.

A short time since, a very remarkable circumstance took place in the New Forest, Hampshire, in the instance of a gipsey of the name of Lee, having been ejected from the fraternity. The spot where the scene took place was at Bolton's Bench, near Lyndhurst. Between three hundred and four hundred gipsies belonging to the different tribes, including the Lees, Stanleys, and Coopers, were assembled upon this unusual occasion. The concourse consisted of a great many females, and so secretly had the meeting been got up, that scarcely a person residing in the neighborhood was aware that a circumstance of the sort was about to take place. The offender, a handsome-looking man, apparently between thirty and forty years of age, was placed in the middle of a ring, composed of the king of the Gipsies and the patriarchs the of different tribes. This ring was followed by a second, made up the of male portion of the assembly, and an exterior circle was formed by the women. The king, who was one of the Lees, a venerable old man, and one who looked as if he had seen upwards of ninety summers, then addressed the culprit for nearly an hour, but in a tongue that was perfectly strange to the by-standers. The address was delivered in a most impressive manner, as might be conceived by the vehemence of the gesticulations which accompanied it. None but the Gipsies themselves had the slightest knowledge of the crime which had been committed by the offender; but it must have been one evidently very obnoxious to the tribe, as an act of expulsion among them is an exceedingly rare occurrence. As soon as the king had finished his speech to the condemned man, he turned and harangued the whole of the gipsies assembled, and expressing himself in English, informed them that Jacob Lee had been expelled from among them, that he was no longer one of the fraternity, and that he do leave the camp of the gipsies for ever. The king then advancing towards him spat upon him, and the circles which enclosed him simultaneously opened to admit of his retreating from among them, whilst they smote him with the branches of trees as he left the ground. The meeting then broke up, and the parties assembled, went their different ways, some of them having come to witness the tribunal from a considerable distance. The whole ceremony, which took place under an aged oak in the forest, was a very imposing one, and being a very unusual, almost an unprecedented, occurrence in these parts, created an intense degree of interest among the by-standers.—London Standard.

From Allison's History of the French Revolution.

WASHINGTON.

Modern history has not so spotless a character to commemorate. Invincible in resolution, firm in conduct, incorruptible in integrity, he brought to the helm of a victorious republic, the simplicity and ~~innocence~~ of rural life; he was forced into greatness by circumstances, rather than led into it by inclination, and prevailed over his enemies rather by the wisdom of his designs, and the perseverance of his character, than any extraordinary genius for the art of war.—A soldier from necessity and patriotism, rather than disposition, he was the first to recommend pacific councils when the independence of his country was secured; and bequeathed to his countrymen an address on leaving the government, to which there is no composition of uninspired wisdom which can bear a comparison.

He was modest without diffidence; sensible to the voice of fame, without vanity;—independent and dignified, without either asperity or pride. He was a friend to liberty, but not licentiousness; not to the dreams of enthusiasts, but to those practical ideas which America inherited from her English descent, and which were opposed to nothing so much as the extravagant love of power in the French Democracy. Accordingly, after having signalized his life by successful resistance to English oppression, he closed it by the warmest advice to cultivate the friendship of Great Britain; and by his casting vote, shortly before his resignation, ratified a treaty of friendly and commercial intercourse, between the mother country and its emancipated offspring. He was a Cromwell, without his ambition; a Sylla, without his crimes; and, after having raised his country by his exertions, to the rank of an independent state, closed his career by a voluntary relinquishment of the power which a grateful people had bestowed. It is the highest glory of England ~~to~~ have given birth, even amidst transatlantic winds, to such a man; and, if she cannot remember him among those who have extended her provinces or augmented her dominions, she may at least feel a legitimate pride in the victories which he achieved, and the great qualities which he exhibited in the contest with herself; and indulge with satisfaction in the reflection, that that vast empire which neither the ambition of Louis XIV., nor the power of Napoleon could dismember, received its first rude shock from the courage which she had communicated to her own offspring; and that amidst the convulsions and revolutions of other States, real liberty has arisen in that country alone, which inherited in its veins the true principles of British freedom.

THE CONTRAST.

1. Do you see that proud overbearing man, riding in his gilded carriage? Look! he stops before a magnificent mansion, and liveried lackeys, obedient to his call, assist him to descend.

Do you see that poor miserable boy, whose tattered clothes scarcely shield him from the inclemency of the weather? Mark! with a beseeching look he solicits the rich man to purchase a pencil or card or pens; and behold how contemptuously he is spurned.

Twenty-five years ago that pompous man was as poor, as friendless, and as wretched as the urchin whom he despises.

2. Twenty-five years have passed since that day. The same parties meet: lo! the contrast.

The once poor boy stands in the pride of manhood, active, intelligent, rich. A lovely woman, his wife, leans upon his arm, and three blooming girls. Grace in every action, benevolence in every expression, affluence smiles in his unostentatious adornments.

An old man approaches. The tottering step, thread-bare garments, and the painful expression that frets in every feature, too plainly denote a man of want and wo.—Better dead, than thus to drag on a miserable existence

This may at the first blush appear to some a very improbable romance. It is a truth.

3. In a country like ours, there is no man, however poor, if aided by industry, economy, and virtue, but may rise from the lowest ranks of society to the highest.—The knowledge of this fact is a blessed excitement to the young, and cheers them on to struggle nobly in the paths which lead to honor and independence, despite the thousand obstacles that oppose their course.

4. There is no man, however affluent, but by extravagance and bad morals may fall from his high estate, and close his days in penury and wo.

5. Let none despise the poor because of their poverty; none need flatter the rich because of their wealth. We may conquer poverty, wealth may conquer us. All men of equal virtues are equals. If one man possesses more intelligence than his fellows, though that of itself may not elevate him in the ranks of the good, yet it brings him additional respect and wins a willing admiration from all men. THE GOOD ALONE ARE GREAT.—Knickerbocker.

THE PITCHER PLANT.—This plant abounds in the stony and arid parts of the Island of Java, from which, were it not for this vegetable wonder, small birds and quadrupeds would be forced to migrate in quest of water. At the foot stalk of each leaf is a small bag, shaped exactly like a pitcher, furnished with a lid, and having a kind of hinge that passes over the handle of the pitcher, and connects it with the leaf. This hinge is a strong fibre, which contracts in showery weather and when the dew falls. Numerous little goblets filled with sweet fresh water are thus held forth, and afford a delicious draft to the tiny animals that climb their branches, and to a great variety of winged visitants. But no sooner has the cloud passed by, and the warm sun shone forth, than the heated fibre begins to expand, and closes the goblet so firmly as to prevent evaporation, precluding a further supply till called for another day. This beautiful and perfect provision of nature would afford a fine theme for a Thompson or a Wadsworth, and would afford an illustration of the designs of Providence, such as Paley would have delighted to press into his service.

WAR AGAINST SMOKE.—A Berlin paper states that the police ordinance, interdicting smoking in the streets or public promenades in that capital, produced on the 8th ult. a scene of great disorder. As the good people of Berlin are great smokers, many have been arrested and punished for violating this injunction; and on the day above mentioned some people who were smoking near the Hamburg gate, were also taken into custody. Upon this the people assembled and rescued them. A reinforcement of the guard was sent for, and these were assailed with stones and other missiles, which was continued until a stronger military force was called in, and cleared the streets.—London Paper.

NAMES OF THE DAYS OF THE WEEK.—The remains of the religion of the ancient people of Great Britain are seen in the names of the days of the week. These people were Scandinavians, who carried into Britain, with their arms, their deities and their religious rites. The Anglo-Saxon superstition came from their progenitors, the Danes and Norwegians, and the northern mythology was once the established religion of Great Britain. The names of the days of the week were called after the deities of this northern worship. Sunday is the day of the sun; Monday, the day of the moon; Tuesday, of Teucer, the god of hunting and archery; Wednesday, the day of Woden, the god of war; Thursday, the day of Thor, the god of Thunder; Friday, the day of Friga, the goddess of love and marriage; Saturday, the day of Satur, the God of fruits.

EARLY RISING.—In the will of Mr. James Serjeant of England, is the following singular clause:

As my nephews are fond of indulging themselves in bed in the morning, and as I wish them to prove, to the satisfaction of my executors, that they have got out of bed in the morning, and either employ themselves in business or taken exercise in the open air, from five till eight o'clock every morning, from the 5th of April to the 10th of October, being three hours each day; and from seven till nine in the morning, from the 10th of October to the 5th of April, being two hours each morning; this is to be done for some years, during the first seven, to the satisfaction of my executors, who may excuse them in case of illness, but the task must be made up when they are well; and if they will not do this they shall not receive any share of my property.

The woman whose mind has been formed on the principles of virtue, and well grounded in useful knowledge, though she may not be gifted with the allurements of high, finished beauty, or surrounded with the splendors of wealth and rank, undoubtedly is better calculated to fulfil her duties in society, and more likely to promote its happiness, than she whose principles are unformed, whose education has been neglected.

That woman deserves not a husband's generous love, who will not greet him with smiles as he returns from the labors of the day; who will not try to chain him to his home by the sweet enchantment of a cheerful heart. There is not one in a thousand that is so unfeeling as to withstand such an influence, and break away from such a home.

If a woman writes a bold, manly hand, it is probable that she has got a masculine mind. There is a greater analogy between the hand-writing and the character of individuals than people are generally aware of.

The best rules to form young men are—To talk little, to hear much, to reflect alone upon what has passed in company, to distrust one's own opinions, and value others that deserve it.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To Families and Invalids.

THE following indispensable family remedies may be found at the village drug stores, and soon at every country store in the state. Remember and never get them unless they have the fac simile signature of Comstock & Co. on the wrappers, as all others by the same names are base impositions and counterfeits. If the merchant nearest you has them not, urge him to procure them at 71 Maiden-lane, the next time he visits New York, or to write for them. No family should be a week without these remedies

BALDNESS.

Balm of Columbia, for the hair, which will stop it from falling out, or restore it on bald places; and on children make it grow rapidly, or on those who have lost their hair from any cause. All vermin that infest the heads of children in schools, are prevented or killed at once. Find the name of Comstock & Co on it, or never try it. Remember this always.

RHEUMATISM AND LAMENESS

Positively cured, and all shrivelled muscles and limbs are restored, in the old or young, by the Indian Vegetable Elixir and Nerve and Bone Liniment, but never without the name of comstock & Co. on it.

PILES &c.

Are wholly prevented, or governed if the attack has come on, if you use the only true Hay's Liniment, from Comstock & Co. All sores and every thing relieved by it that admits of an outward application. It acts like a charm. Use it.

HORSES that have Ring-Bone, Spavin, Wind-Galls, &c., are cured by Roofs' Specific; and Foundered horses entirely cured by Roofs' Founder Ointment. Mark this, all horsemen.

DALLEY'S

MAGICAL PAIN EXTRACTOR SALVE.—The most extraordinary remedy ever invented for all new or old Burns and Scalds and sore Eyes. It has delighted thousands. It will take out all pain in ten minutes, and no failure. It will cure the Piles.

LIN'S SPREAD PLASTERS.

A better and more nice and useful article never was made. All should wear them regularly.

LIN'S TEMPERANCE BITTERS

On the principle of substituting the tonic in place of the stimulant principle, which has reformed so many drunkards. (Concluded.)

HONG KONG, CHINA, 1st Aug. 1842.

We all feel the want of more fellow laborers. Circumstances are such that it seems almost absolutely necessary for me soon to have a colleague on this side of the island, and yet there appears to be but little hope, that the Board will send more Missionaries to China. Should sickness or death call me away, (and nothing is more possible) we should, in all probability, lose, to a great extent, the advantageous position we have now gained through so much toil, anxiety, and expense, merely because there is no one ready to take my place. The state of Mr. Robert's lungs and other circumstances, would render it impossible for him to assume the duties on this side of the Island, while Mr. Dean speaks another dialect. There is labor sufficient on this island at the lowest calculation, and in reasonable view of the claims of other stations, for four Baptist Missionary families. These facts I merely state without designing any appeal whatever for more Missionaries. If the Churches and the Board still continue to neglect this vast and inviting field, after all that has hitherto been said, and written, and developed, the responsibility rests with them, and my concern is to do my duty, and to do it alone, if necessity requires.

Of the conflict now going on between England and China, the two greatest empires in the world, you will naturally expect me to say something, and yet I hardly know what to say to give you a distinct idea of these warlike affairs without wearying you with details. The public papers will have informed you that the first campaign under the Plenipotentiary powers of Capt. Elliot, entirely failed of accomplishing any definite object touching the great question at issue between the two nations. Had Capt. Elliot pushed his demands to extremes, in the first instance, the Emperor would, most likely, have yielded, for the Chinese were literally unprepared for combat, being incredulous as to the coming of a foreign army, until they found it hovering upon their coasts, seizing their vessels, blockading their ports, and capturing their cities. It was a successful stroke of the wily policy of the Imperial Cabinet in being able to entice the British Plenipotentiary away fifteen hundred miles from the vicinity of the capital, and fixing the seat of promised negotiation at Canton, at a season of the year when they knew he could not return with his heavy ships of war until the end of the monsoon, thus allowing them full time to throw Pekin into a state of defense. This they have done to an unprecedented extent. Of the failure of the negotiations in this province, and the capture and ransom of Canton for six millions of dollars, I need not speak. Capt. Elliott having been recalled, Sir Henry Pottinger arrived in China, in August 1841, with full Plenipotentiary powers from the British Government, & immediately proceeded northward. The second campaign began. High hopes were entertained that the war, so calamitous to the Chinese, would soon terminate and peace be established upon a permanent and honorable basis. The bombarding and fall of Amoy, the re-capture of Chusan, the storming and taking of Chinhai, and the military occupation of Ningpo, all followed in quick succession, victory crowning the British arms in every battle. By this time the season became far advanced, and no Commissioners appearing on the part of the Emperor, H. E. Sir Henry Pottinger returned to Hong Kong, for the purpose of putting in order the affairs of the settlement, where he arrived on the 1st of February, 1842.

Galled by the consideration that fortune awarded victory to the English in every engagement in the open field, the Chinese commenced a system of harrassing warfare upon their enemy, by kidnapping and secret assassination. In this way a number of the English were either killed or taken alive, under the very walls of Ningpo. In December, the British troops marched [illegible] Ningpo, and defeated large bodies of the Chinese army. They again rallied in March, and made a vigorous attack upon Ningpo and Chinhai, but were repulsed and pursued with dreadful slaughter. In the beginning of May, Ningpo was evacuated by the British General with the main body of his army, and on the 18th of the same month the third campaign commenced by the storming and capturing of the city of Chapoo. The latest dates left the English army in the valley of the great Yang-tsze-Keang, and flushed with fresh victories were in full march upon the populous and wealthy cities of Nanking, and Hang-chow-foo. Within the space of a very few days they had captured three hundred and seventy-six large cannon, many of them having been newly cast of brass, after foreign models, and mounted upon carriages with revolving centres. In the manufacture of fire arms, building of vessels, and the construction of forts, such has recently been the vast improvements of the Chinese, that rumors have been rife that there must be foreign engineers among them. Such rumors, however, have but little foundation in truth. The guns of the wrecked Transport Kite, the fact that the Hong merchants possess a small locomotive, the continued presence of foreign shipping in the Canton river, and the utter inefficiency of all their fortifications hitherto erected, would, in themselves, be quite sufficient to suggest important improvements to such a people as the Chinese. In and near Canton city powerful forts have been erected upon new principles, a steamer and new fashioned war vessels have been built, and establishments for the manufacture of fire arms after foreign models have been put in operation.

For the prosecution of this the third campaign of the war, the English have now on the Chinese confines an immense naval and land force, the naval being the largest ever before assembled in Asia by any power in the world. There are about sixty well equipped ships of war, with fifteen war steamers, besides nearly one hundred armed Transport ships. As to the land force, there is a formidable army of about fourteen thousand fighting men, with Sappers and Miners, Royal and Madras artillery, and a troop of Horse. The Commander-in-Chief of all the land forces is Lieut. Gen. Sir Hugh Gough; Major General Lord Saltoun is second in command. The naval Commander-in-chief is vice Admiral Sir William Parker, Flag Ship, Cornwallis, 74; second in command, Rear Admiral Sir Thomas Cochrane, Flag Ship Blenhiem, 74. The entire expense of the whole British Expedition now in China is upwards of five hundred thousand dollars per month.

The above force if properly directed, would likely be quite sufficient to seize upon the Chinese empire, and yet every unprejudiced mind which has studied the subject, must decide that it is not, judging from the past, the object of the British Government to subvert the Government of China. Had this been their object, the whole army in the first campaign would have marched directly upon Pekin. Where ever the English force has gone the power of the Mandarins has been broken, and the capture of Pekin will be the last alternative, for when this takes place the power of the Emperor must certainly crumble to the dust, and the rule of the great Tartar Dynasty will be no more, while the English will have upon their hands the mighty task of quieting a population of three hundred and fifty millions, thickly spread over a vast extent of territory, and in a state of anarchy, consternation, and civil war. As to when the present hostile struggle is likely to terminate, it is exceedingly difficult to form any thing like an opinion of even probable correctness. Many lookers on argue that a final settlement is far distant, whilst others confidently predict an honorable conclusion of the whole within two months from the present date. My own opinion is that the end is not yet.—The present demands of the British Government are something like the following: twenty millions of dollars as an indemnity, the expenses of the war, the cession of one or more positions on the coast, free trade and honorable intercourse with the Empire, and a resident at Pekin. It remains to be seen whether the Emperor does not choose rather to lose his throne than yield even his nominal assent to these demands.

I have already taxed your patience too long to enter upon the moral merits or demerits of the origin of the war. On this subject vast ignorance still prevails both in England and America. It is not an "Opium War," and Mr. Adams is right in stating that its origin must be traced to circumstances long prior to the seizure of the opium. This seizure of the opium and the imprisonment of the Queen's officer only afforded, in the eyes of the British Government, a good pretext for commencing those hostile operations against China which they had long contemplated. I refer you with much pleasure to an able lecture on the "War in China," delivered in December last, before the Massachusett's Historical Society, by the Hon. John Quincy Adams. Upon some points Mr. Adams is in error, but being fully aware of the vast amount of ignorance which exists among all classes in the United States and Great Britain on every subject connected with this country, and having made China and the Chinese my sole study for nearly five years past, I have been astonished in perusing the lecture, at the accuracy of the lecturer's information and the justness of most of his views.

As a Christian philanthropist, I watch the various stirring scenes and events around me with intense interest, and verily believe that God in the economy and wisdom of His Providence, designs over-ruling all these present evils of war, and suffering, and bloodshed, for the opening of enlarged doors for the promulgation of the glorious gospel in these extensive dominions. Indeed, most interesting openings have already been made in positions hitherto absolutely sealed, and are now in possession of Protestant Missionaries. The progress of events are developing other openings and facilities: are the churches prepared and willing to occupy till the Master comes? Let us look beyond the cause of the present dreadful and warlike position of affairs in China, and regard the results and consequences as they bear upon the advancement of the kingdom and will of heaven, and let us make unceasing prayer unto God, that the gross darkness and moral death which have for so many ages enveloped this great land, may be dispelled by the glorious rising of the Son of Righteousness, and China become enlightened and christianized, and sanctified, and saved. Believe me, in the Lord Jesus,

Faithfully yours,

J. LEWIS SHUCK.

THE UNPARDONABLE SIN.

Mr. L. had enjoyed the privilege of sitting under an able and successful ministry. His heart had been touched, and during a remarkable period, in which he saw many of his friends embracing the hope of salvation, his own convictions increased. Not long after, his feelings of impatience became sensitive. His attention was subsequently turned from its proper object, to one more nearly connected with our natural selfishness. He ceased to be an inquirer, and became an objector. It is hard to stop here. Opposition succeeded a habit of objecting; and apparent bitterness of prejudice and malevolence of expression, were observable whenever he opened his lips on the subject of religion. Still the past day of conviction was a memorable time to him. Five years afterwards he was again aroused to a sense of his danger; and with the alarm came the frightful recollection of his former conduct. Language which he had uttered—and which appeared nearly allied to blasphemy—returned fresh to his memory. He accused himself of having committed the unpardonable sin. All efforts to persuade him to the contrary, were unavailing. The impression was daily deepening. His mind lost its elasticity, and a moody temperament succeeded. His friends were alarmed—a suspicion was started among them that his conclusion might be just. This he marked, and labored to confirm it. He seemed, I know not how, to take a negative satisfaction in stating the desperation of his case, and in watching the fallen countenance of sympathy.

Many months had transpired, during which he was the subject of religious gossip with some—of a kind of superstitious dread with others—and of fervent prayer with a few of the remainder; when the case was stated to a judicious minister, whom some providence had called into the neighborhood. He waited on Mr. L., who, far from being averse to any conversation relative to his own state, seemed rather to court it. He was fluent in all the details of time and circumstances; and always ended his narrative with the declaration that he had ceased forever to pray. After a preparatory interchange of remarks, he was asked—'You believe yourself guilty of the unpardonable sin?'

'I am sure of it.'

'In what did the crimes consist?'

'I opposed the work of God.'

'So did Saul.'

'I denied Jesus Christ.'

'So did a disciple afterwards honored by his Master.'

'I doubted the power of Jesus Christ, after strong evidences in its favor.'

'So did Thomas.'

'What! are you attempting to prove by such examples that I am a Christian?'

'Not at all; I am only inquiring into the nature of your guilt; and thus far I see no reason for despair.'

'I have hated God'—rejoined the self-condemned—'and openly avowed my enmity in sight of his divine operations.'

'Thus far your case is lamentable indeed; but not hopeless still. Our hearts are naturally at enmity with God. And I do not see why the open avowal of this, drawn out by the sight of the law, into visible form, must necessarily and always constitute the guilt of which you accuse yourself.'

'I feel that I am cut off from salvation.'

'It is difficult to reason against your feelings. But they are no proof on the present subject. Let me inquire whether you desire the pardon of your sins?'

'Assuredly; if it were possible.'

'Do you regret the conduct of which you accuse yourself?'

'Certainly.'

'Do you sincerely desire repentance?'

'I would give the world, if it were mine, to be able to do so.'

'Then it is not possible that you have been guilty to an unpardonable extent; for these are characteristics of a state of mind [illegible], but far from being desperate.—And they come within the design of the gospel invitations.'

There was something simple and touching in this mode of ministering to a mind diseased; and it produced an effect which, probably, no other process could have accomplished. Mr. L. did not long survive this interview. But his living and dying hours were those of a favored Christian.—Dr. Henry.

ON WHAT ARE YOU DEPENDING?

Strange as it may appear, it is a truth, that Christians are often helped by their hindrances, and made richer by their losses; and I may add also, that by their falls they learn to stand on their feet the more steadily.

An hour ago I walked abroad with a youthful companion; the sun had some time set, and the landscape, as the poet says, had 'faded,' and a 'solemn stillness' pervaded the air. Some will have it that youth and age are not fit associates; but often do I find just the reverse of all this to be the truth. Well, we seated ourselves on a rail, overhanging a dry ditch of some depth. 'Have a care,' said I, 'for you know age is cautious and oftentimes distrustful. Have a care,' said I, 'for the rail on which we are seated, is but a crazy one.'

'Crazy!' cried out young confidence—'crazy! why it is as firm as a rock!'

'Aye,' thought I, 'the rocks on which some people depend are as uncertain as the shifting sand.' In five or ten minutes after, (for notwithstanding my sage reflection I had kept my seat,) the rail gave way under us with a crash, and we both fell backward at full length into the ditch. My companion fell lightly, and was not injured; but, as for me, I did not escape without bruises: nevertheless, after slowly gathering myself up again, I walked away much benefitted by my mishap; for it suggested to my mind this very profitable inquiry, 'On what are you depending?' Now there are many, who, though too worldly-wise to trust the weight of their bodies on a crazy rail, are thoughtless and reckless enough to trust the welfare of their souls on a foundation equally precarious. On what, then, are you depending?

It is quite bad enough, when our earthly hopes break down with us; but it is a thousand times when the same thing happens to our heavenly expectations. If you are not content with the beggarly elements of time, your foundation does not so much matter; but if you have set your heart on the glorious things of eternity, bear in mind that 'other foundations can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.' 1 Cor. iii. 11.

HOW TO PAY CHURCH DEBTS.

The church with which I am connected as a pastor, in erecting the building in which they worship, contracted a debt of about $5,000. It was held by seven or eight individuals in the congregation. Many had long used it as a very convenient excuse for not giving much to benevolent objects: and all felt it to be a real burden. Yet no efforts had been made for seven years to pay any part of it, either principal or interest.

Within two or three months past, the church has been roused to greater activity and faithfulness; and enjoyed a larger share than usual of the influences of the divine Spirit. Numbers have been awakened, and hopefully converted. In the midst of this delightful work, a missionary, who had returned for a season, in ill health, from a foreign field, visited us, and told us what his own eyes had seen of the perishing condition of the heathen, and of the openings, which God, in his Providence, is making, for Christians to send them the only remedy—the Gospel of the risen Savior. His statements and appeals deeply affected our hearts. He had scarcely left us, when we were visited by an Agent of the American Board of Foreign Missions, who by his lucid, able and warm addresses on the subject, deepened the good impression, and greatly advanced an effort which had been previously commenced by us, to raise sufficient funds to support a missionary in the foreign field.

At length, on the night of a communion Sabbath, after we had received a number of persons into the church, and had set down again at the table of Him who died for lost men in heathen as well as in Christian lands, and at the close of a very solemn meeting, an elder who was one of the largest holders of the debt against the church, arose, and with a full heart, begged leave to address the meeting. He stated, as well as his emotions would permit, that the debt of the congregation had been long felt to be embarrassing, and had been urged by some, as a reason, for not contributing more liberally to benevolent objects. He was exceedingly desirous to have it removed. And in view of what they had recently heard, and of the renewed dedication, which they had that day made of themselves to God, he felt it to be his duty and privilege, to relinquish the whole of his claim against the church, which he thereby did, most cheerfully, delightfully, and forever.

We were all taken by surprise, and melted into tears. Another elder instantly rose and said,—"I have long felt that silver and the gold are the Lord's, and have consecrated all my earthly property to his service I have this day renewed the dedication.—I know not the amount of that brother's claim against the church; but, whatever it be, just as much as he relinquishes, so much do I pay towards extinguishing the remainder of the debt."

Another large creditor and member of the Church then rose, and most cheerfully and unconditionally relinquished half of their claims, which reduced the debt to about $1000,—which amount has since been subscribed by other members of the congregation: so that now we are out of debt. We have also got enough subscribed annually, to warrant us in engaging to sustain a missionary in the foreign field. And all this has been done in the midst of a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord; yet so far from impeding the good work, it has evidently helped it forward.—Others have heard of these lovely fruits of religion amongst us, have come into our meetings, and have there, we trust, repented of their sins and embraced the Savior.—Sure I am, that there never was so delightful a spirit amongst us as at the present moment.

And now, permit me to say, to other churches that are in debt;—would you, brethren, pay your debts at once, in an easy, pleasant and profitable manner? Then enlarge your hearts. Make a dying world the object of your compassionate regard and benevolent effort. Increase your information concerning the deplorable condition of the poor benighted heathen, or the destitute in our own land. Let your sympathies flow out for them. Offer up unceasing prayer on their behalf. And above all, open wide your purses, and contribute liberally and cheerfully toward sending them the word of life. Do this at once, and continue to do it, and your debts will speedily vanish.—Pastor's Journal.

TO-MORROW.—Who can tell how much is embraced in this expression? Though a few hours intervene between it and us——though it will soon commence its course—who is there that can read a single page and pronounce the character of its events?

To-morrow! Those who are gay may be sad. Those who are now walking the avenues of pleasure, led by the hand of hope, may be the subject of intense sorrow.—Prosperity may be changed into adversity.

Those who are now on the mountain summit may be in the valley. The rosy cheek may be overspread with paleness—the strong step may falter. Death may have overtaken us.

To-morrow! It may have entirely changed the course of our lives. It may form a new era in our existence. What we fear may not happen.

To-morrow! away with anxiety. Let us lean on Providence. There is a being to whom all the distinctions of time are the same, and who is able to dispose of every thing for our wise improvement.

PRAYER.

Prayer is the divinely appointed means of sustaining spiritual life in the believer's soul, and by shedding on all within the influence of the divine grace, imparting to all without the impress of the divine image.

It is the gathering of the celestial manna—the feeding on the living bread which came down from heaven, to nourish the soul to everlasting life, and for the divine nourishment thus obtained, nothing can be safely substituted.

Praising the bread of life, however warmly, can not. Were you to try a similar experiment with your daily food for the body, what would be the result? And does the soul less require its appropriate nourishment, to strengthen its spiritual life?

Distributing the bread of life to others, however liberally, cannot be safely substituted for feeding on it ourselves by prayer.

Try a simple experiment, but for one day, with the body; and will not its weakened and exhausted state at night painfully remind you that the most benevolent zeal cannot supply the place of necessary food in supporting animal life. Believe me, it can as little supply the place of secret prayer in the support of the spiritual.

Working for God, however laboriously, is no safe substitute for devout communion with God; yea, the more work you have to do for God, you can alone obtain it by fervent prayer, and without which you will soon grow weary of, or weary in your work.

Were the invigorating sunshine and refreshing showers withheld, would the seed deposited in the bosom of the earth spring forth? Or, if he had put forth its tender buds and blossoms, would they not, if not nourished by heaven's sunshine and showers, soon languish, wither, droop, and die?

If the lamp be unfed by fresh supplies of oil, will not the flame burn dimmer and dimmer, and at length expire?

Not less indispensible is prayer to the progress, yea, the very life of spirituality in a believing soul!

Prayer draws down the warming beams of the Son of Righteousness, the refreshing showers of the Spirit of grace, beneath whose genial influence all the spiritual graces which God's own hand has planted, expand in their fullest bloom and diffuse all around their sweetest fragrance.—Meditations on prayer by H. White.

To walk by faith, and not by sight, is to believe in unseen things. The difference is not to be understood as times of spiritual light and spiritual darkness.

ADVANTAGES OF EARLY PIETY.

Early Piety Yields a sure Preparation for an Early Grave.

An early grave is the lot of millions of our race. Like the fair blossoms of an uncongenial spring, they come forth only to perish. A third part of the young are destined to an early tomb; and what but early piety can prepare them for such a destiny? The expiring child, who has been taught to fear his God, and to lisp the precious name of his Savior, is in a more envied position than the most renowned philosopher, in all the height of his discovery, who has not sat down, as a little child, at the feet of Jesus. O, the sweet peace, the calm and holy serenity, the bright and joyous hope, which play around the dying pillow of the young Christian, as he combats the last enemy, and prepares for his heavenly flight! We have seen him, in life's bright morn, ere yet the heart was saddened with care, longing to depart and be with Christ, which is far better; we have seen the glassy eye brightening and sparkling with the hopes of immortality; we have heard the faint but fervent prayer poured from quivering and pallid lips,—"Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" O, how unutterably sublime is the death of a young Christian! To see him quitting the world without a sigh, at that period of life when most it is fitted to allure; to hear him counselling his brothers and sisters, with a dying, faltering voice, to seek the Lord while he may be found, to call upon him while he is near; to behold him, with all the calm resignation and faith of a departing prophet, committing his immortal spirit into the bosom of his Savior and his God; to see the smile of peace resting upon his motionless features, even after they have subsided into all the stillness and coldness of death. Surely this is the perfection of the moral sublime—a spectacle of moral and spiritual grandeur which nothing but faith in a crucified Redeemer could ever realize.—Selected from an English Book.

"NEVER HUNCH WHEN OTHERS CROWD."

One very warm afternoon in July, I visited a school in Boston. There were about sixty children, from four to eight years old. The school room was small, and the children looked much oppressed by the seat, especially the youngest.

I stood up before them and asked, "Children, can you tell me what peace children will do?"

One said, "Love their enemies;" another, "Forgive their enemies;" another, "Resist not evil;" another, "When others strike one cheek, turn the other;" another, "Overcome evil with good."

All these were good answers. At length, a little girl whom I had observed on the middle of a seat directly before me, looking very uncomfortable, (being so crowded that she could not move her elbows,) looked up, and, in a most piteous and plaintive tone, said—

"Peace children, don't hunch when others crowd."

That was the very thing! The little crowded, suffering child, gave the best definition of peace I ever heard. She gave a sure and certain antidote to all anger and fighting. "Never hunch when others crowd." And she drew it directly from her own personal experience. She said what she felt. That makes it all the better. There the little girl was crowded up—her arms squeezed down to her side—she could hardly move or breathe; yet there was no anger, no quarreling, simply because she did not "hunch."

Let all children act upon this maxim, and never hunch when others crowd, and it would be impossible to get them into a fight. When other children get angry at you, pinch, strike, or kick you, destroy your things, try to provoke you by calling you names, or in any way crowd upon you, and try to injure you, do not "hunch"—that is, do not return anger for anger, and evil for evil; but affectionately and lovingly suffer the wrong, and it will be impossible to fight and war among themselves. Others will take care how they crowd upon you. This is the way that Jesus did.

How few children act as this sweet-tempered, lovely little girl did. They are selfish, and want to have all the best things for themselves, and are not willing that others should be more comfortable than they are. This is the reason there is so much quarreling among children. They do not love each other as well as they do themselves. But selfishness always makes them unhappy. If this little girl had "hunched" and crowded the other children, it would not have done her any good, for they would have crowded back again worse, and perhaps have struck her, so she would have been warmer and more uncomfortable than before.—A Kiss for a Blow.

My son, keep my words, and lay up my commandments with thee.—Prov.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, January 11, 1843.

Mr. John M. Carpenter will lecture in this village on the evening of the 13th inst. Mr. C. has no superior as a Temperance Lecturer, and his impassioned eloquence never fails to enlist the feelings of his hearers. Come out and hear him.

The Midnight Cry.

We have received two numbers of this paper, published in New York by J. V. Himes, assisted by others. It advocates the doctrine of Miller that the end of the world is to come during this year, (1843.) If this doctrine be true, it is a most important one. If it be false, it will do more for the cause of infidelity than infidels can do. The believers in it manifest much sincerity, and a zeal that is praiseworthy in a good cause. The writers in the Midnight Cry express the fullest confidence in the truthfulness of their sentiments, and even think there can be no doubt in the case. Whether this doctrine be true or false, we are not about to say; we think, however, that it is a delusion, but this thing is true, that many who may be startled at the idea that the end of the world will occur in April next, will, in all probability, be summoned to yield to the relentless hand of death before that time. We therefore, give this advice, "Be ye, therefore, also ready, for ye know not when the Son of man cometh."

Fire.—On the 29th of Nov., the Temperance house kept by Asa C. Potter, at the State Bridge, in Verona, was consumed by fire. The loss is estimated at from $800 to $1000. There was no insurance on the property.

Governor's Message.

The great length of the Message of Gov. Bouck prevents our giving it entire to our readers. We have, however, selected such portions of it as would be the most likely to interest them. This also prevents us from furnishing our usual variety of News.

The Court of Inquiry.

The examination of the mutineers on board the 'Somers,' has been in progress for more than a week, at the Navy Yard, in Brooklyn. The testimony thus far elicited corroborates the statements of Commander Mackenzie, and there seems to be no possible doubt of his triumphant acquittal.

The Second Advent.

Mr. Editor—In a late number of your paper it was stated that "Miller is preaching the day of judgment in New-York to crowded audiences. The clergy are taking up the question with considerable zeal—attempting to show that this fair earth will not be a smoking ruin next April."

I have not adopted the theory of Mr. Miller, and am not prepared to say, whether Jesus Christ will come to judge the world in 1843, or in a century from that time— On the contrary, I have not so much confidence in other theories on this subject as to be certain, that time will not close, and the solemn scenes of the judgment burst upon our view before the earth shall have performed another annual revolution. Jesus Christ, when speaking of his second advent, most impressively warns his disciples, saying "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man." Luke xxi. 34—36. Again, after declaring the parable of the ten virgins, which presents to our view the same great event, he says, "Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh." Mat. xxv. 13. The Apostles who witnessed the ascension of our Lord, being informed by 'two men in white apparel that this same Jesus who is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven, believed the testimony, and ever afterwards during the period of their earthly pilgrimage were looking and earnestly desiring the time might arrive, when he would "appear the second time without sin unto salvation." This glorious event was presented by the Apostles, as a source of comfort in trial, and a motive of encouragement to their persecuted brethren to persevere thro' all their tribulations in the way of holiness. 2 Thess. i. 4—10. In the first epistle to the Thessalonians, the Apostle, having introduced the subject and described the scenery of that day, and the important events connected with it, exhorts his brethren to "comfort one another with these words," and also in the language of affection and warning says to them, "Let us not sleep as do others; but let us watch and be sober." In his letter to Titus he exhorts him and instructs him to exhort others to be "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Savior Jesus Christ."

The Apostle Peter having directed the minds of his brethren to this important subject urges them to be looking and hasting unto the coming of the day of God. 2 Pet. iii. 12. The language of inspiration now quoted most clearly demonstrates that it was the privilege as well as duty of primitive christians to be looking and waiting for the second advent of Jesus Christ. If it was their duty, eighteen hundred years ago, certainly, it is not the less our duty at the present time; and if not too much enchanted with the scenery of this "fair earth," we we shall, like them be anxious for the approach of that day. Is it necessary on the supposition that Mr. Miller's theory is not true, and, notwithstanding he advocates it with so much zeal, that the clergy should spend their energies in allaying the excitement, by attempting to prove that Jesus Christ will not make his second appearance in 1843, and thereby induce the people of God to cease looking for that event, and a slumbering world to conclude, there is no danger that the Lord will descend at present with a shout, and that they will be startled, by the "voice of the archangel and the trump of God; or thrown into consternation by the cry, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh." For myself I can see no necessity for all this, and think it would be better when speaking on this subject to imitate more closely the language of Christ, and the two eminent Apostles whose words we have quoted. What injury would the cause of Christ sustain if all the clergy and every professed christian were to admit the possibility of Christ's second advent in 1843, and were each to make seriously the following important inquiries? Am I ready for that event? Is my lamp filled with oil, trimmed and burning? Am I "looking for and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of God?" Am I upon my watch, and like the faithful and wise steward diligent in the discharge of every duty? Am I in a state of preparation to give an account of my stewardship? Have I satisfactory evidence that if Christ should come suddenly, in his own glory, and in the glory of his Father, I should be of that happy number who will be 'changed in the twinkling of an eye and caught up to meet the Lord in air'? Can I say honestly I desire a personal interview with Jesus Christ? and as he says "I come quickly," can I cheerfully respond with the Apostle, and say, even so, come, Lord Jesus"? If we cannot answer these inquiries in the affirmative it becomes us instead of stopping to prove that Jesus Christ will not come in 1843, to awake to the subject of our own salvation and give all diligence to make our 'calling and election sure.' With the light I have on the subject, I choose rather to make the above admission and inquiries than to pursue an opposite course.

My desire is that I may be in readiness to meet my Lord, if he should come as soon as Mr. Miller anticipates; and if he should not, that I may be willing to labor, still longer for him in his vineyard here below, and like Job, patiently 'wait all the days of my appointed time until my change come.'

A. ESTEE.

Shiloh, Dec. 21, 1842.

For the Register.

It was not my intention in submitting a few lines to your paper on the subject of the impropriety of Capital Punishment, to show much labored argument for the position I have taken with respect to this momentous subject. Choosing rather to appeal to that swift witness for truth which I believe we all feel, or might feel, if we would take heed to that light which shines as in a dark place, and which would certainly teach us better things than to exult in, or even to countenance in the least degree the propriety of inflicting torture in any way on the body of a fellow citizen.

I think it must be acknowledged to be sufficient when we have a criminal in our power and are able to prevent him from committing the like offense again, and that every act of violence against his person after this, must arise from, and be the result of those revengeful and Anti-Christian propensities which must be sooner or later unprofitable to those that indulge them.

But, to return, as there were some observations made upon the few lines which were inserted for me last week, I thought I might remark that perhaps I might have been a little more explicit, as regards that portion of the decalogue which I referred to, "Thou shalt not kill," as being indefinite, inasmuch as there are no circumstances defined which might make it warrantable for us to take life, as to the other declaration, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed," it seems to run in parallel meaning with these words of Christ, where he says, "He that taketh up the sword shall perish by the sword;" the general meaning or exposition of these declarations must necessarily be that they who contend in battle are likely to become the sacrifice of their mutual animosities.

There might be abundance of argument deduced not only from the Old and New Testament; but from the opinions of most eminent men, as authors of comments upon government, law, &c., in favor of the position I have taken in this case, as in the former, the circumstance of Cain, where it is represented that the voice of his brother Abel's blood cried to the Almighty from the ground, and Cain, as it appears, well knowing the things of a man, by the spirit of a man that was in him, was led to declare from a knowledge of this vindictive spirit in man, (as a natural and unrestrained propensity,) that whosoever should find him should slay him. But now mark what forbearance and mercy is shown by the great Arbiter of life and death, to this abandoned and ruthless murderer, setting a mark upon him lest any one finding him should slay him, and issuing a declaration that whosoever slew Cain, vengeance should be taken on them seven fold.

But as I have said it was not my desire to take the field in argument, in fine language, neither by enticing words of the wisdom of man, neither to build up, or pull down any thing of sectarian character, but as far as I might be qualified, in my measure, although it may be small, in the demonstration of the spirit, and in the power of truth afforded me, to endeavor to convince the judgment that we ought to put in practice principles of forbearance, long-suffering, tenderness, and mercy.

The late tragical occurrence on board the Somers, which has so agitated the public mind, the suspicions and fears that are entertained that the innocent have suffered the awful penalty of the law as it now exists, is enough to arouse the feelings of every concerned individual, that a law authorizing such arbitrary measures, particularly when it stands connected with any uncertainty as to the actual committal of crime, (and this is no solitary instance where this has been the case,) might be repealed.

I do not think we ought to be weary with well doing, either to fold up our hands because our Legislature had the subject before them last winter, but to endeavor to keep it alive, and that those who feel concerned may individually espouse it, is the wish of a Friend.

News of the Day.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

To the Legislature of the State of New York:

Fellow Citizens—The Constitution makes it the duty of the Governor to communicate by message to the Legislature at every session, the condition of the State, and recommend such matters as he shall judge expedient, and take care that the laws are faithfully executed.

I have entered upon the discharge of the responsible duties of the Executive Department of the Government with a proper regard, as I trust, for the important obligations imposed upon me.

For the first time since the first organization of the Government, the Chief Magistrate has been selected from the agricultural portion of community. Whatever distrust I may feel in taking upon myself an untried station of so much importance and difficulty, I repose with confidence on the guidance of the Almighty; on the co-operation of every department of Government, and on the indulgence of a generous people, who are always ready to overlook unintentional errors.

Although the country is in possession of an uncommon surplus of the products of labor, yet business is depressed, and the people are embarrassed in all their moneyed transactions. This should doubtless be charged to the fact that fictitious prices and an inordinate desire for wealth have led to the contracting of debts which the products of the country at the present low prices do not furnish the means of paying. But I am confident that this state of things is gradually undergoing a salutary change. The people doubtless see the necessity of more economy in all their affairs, and the evil consequences of a system of credit altogether too much extended. I am also confident that they will not again be so easily misled by the fallacy of artificial means to make them prosperous; and that they have also become convinced that the substantial wealth can only be derived from productive labor. There is no nation so highly favored as the people of the United States, and if they properly improve the advantages they possess, time will show that in point of greatness they are, as yet in their infancy.

Under a power to "make or alter" regulations and relations to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for representatives in Congress, the present Congress has passed a law which, in effect, requires the several states to legislate in a particular manner, in relation to the choice of representatives. However unlimited may be the power of the national legislature to "alter" the existing regulations of the States or to "make" those which are entirely new, it is impossible, upon any fair construction, to maintain that the power to "make or alter" includes a power to act upon State Legislatures, and compel them to pass any particular law upon the subject. As a question of mere expediency, this measure was not called for. No State has ever omitted to make the necessary regulation for the choice of representatives in Congress. But as an authorized exercise of power, it was, like all other encroachments by the general government, highly dangerous to the stability of the Union.

I have been led to this course of remark from the tendency which has been noticed to strengthen the national arm at the expense of the several States, and from finding upon our statute books laws which have been adjudged to stand in conflict with our obligations to the other States. I allude to our laws relating to "persons held to service or labor" in other States who may escape into this. The federal Constitution has provided that they shall not "in consequence of any law or regulation" of the State to which they may escape, "be discharged from such service or labor; but shall be delivered up upon claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." In 1793 Congress passed a law prescribing the manner in which the surrender should be made, and forbidding all persons under a heavy penalty from interfering with the claimant.— Our laws have thrown many obstacles in the way of the claimant in the assertion of his right. The principle upon which these laws are based has been pronounced unconstitutional by our own supreme court of the United States. That high tribunal made a decision at its last January term, which goes the whole length of declaring our laws repugnant to the Constitution, and consequently void. After the question has been thus settled in the mode prescribed by the Constitution, I submit whether these laws ought any longer to have a place upon the statute book. It does not become us as a member of the confederacy to hold a language to our sister States which they may deem offensive, and which the common arbiter between us has declared to be repugnant to the national compact.

I will not discuss the question of slavery. The abstract right to hold any man in bondage is a question upon which in this State there is no diversity of opinion. We have happily relieved ourselves from the evils of slavery. But we have no right to interfere with that institution as it exists in other States. We have virtually agreed that it shall not be done, and until we are prepared to break up the national compact, and take the hazard of a civil war, our obligations to the other States should be faithfully discharged.

The federal constitution has also provided, that "a person charged in any state with treason, felony or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime." At the last session of the Legislature, a concurrent resolution was adopted by the two houses, declaring, "that in the opinion of this legislature, stealing a slave within the jurisdiction and against the laws of Virginia, is a crime within the meaning of the section of the fourth article of the constitution of the United States." I deem it proper to say, that resolution fully accords with my own judgment. Although such an act may not be forbidden by our laws, the stealing of a slave has been declared to be a crime in other states; and if a transgressor of their criminal laws flee within our jurisdiction, we are bound by compact not to screen him. The constitution declares that he shall 'be delivered up."

In stating thus frankly the opinions which I entertain upon this delicate and important subject, I am aware that I may incur the censure of some, whose good opinion I should be glad to preserve. But I repose with confidence upon the great body of the people, who, I am persuaded, are not so blinded by passion or prejudice, that they cannot look upon the subject with candor; and who, whatever may be their private opinions, will not attribute my course to any other motive, than a sincere desire to preserve the Union, and to perpetuate the blessings of a free government, by a scrupulous discharge of the obligations of good faith towards our sister states.

This state has constructed and put in operation about 700 miles of canal, and have in progress the enlargement of the Erie, the construction of the Black River and Genesee Valley canals, the improvement of the Oneida River, and has purchased the Oneida Lake canal. In addition to this, the state has loaned its credit to the following incorporated companies:—

Del. and Hudson Canal Co.	$ 800,000
N. Y. and Erie Rail Road Co.	3,000,000
Ithaca and Owego R. R. Co.	315,700
Catskill & Canajorharie R. R. Co.	200,000
Auburn and Syracuse R. R. Co.	200,000
Auburn and Rochester R. R. Co.	200,000
Hudson and Berkshire R. R. Co.	150,000
Tonawanda R. R. Co.	100,000
Long Island R. R. Co.	100,000
Schenectady and Troy R. R. Co.	100,000
Tioga Coal, Iron, Mining, and Manufacturing Co.	70,000
	$5,235,700

The New York and Erie, the Ithaca and Owego, and the Catskill and Canajoharie Rail Road Companies, have failed to pay the interest on their loans from the state, and the two latter roads have been sold at auction, and the sale of the former is postponed until the first Tuesday in May next.

The public work which has been put under contract, and is now suspended in an unfinished state, consists principally of portions of the Enlargement of the Erie Canal between Schenectady and the west bounds of the city of Utica; between Syracuse and the village of Jordan; between Lyons and the west bounds of the city of Rochester; at Lockport; between Black Rock and Buffalo; and also parts of the Black River and Genesee Valley canals; and the improvement of the Oneida river.

The work under contract for the enlargement and improvement of the Erie Canal, including that which has been completed, as estimated at contract prices, amounts to $13,026,919 92

The amount that has been paid for work done under the contracts, and upon those that have been canceled is 10,518,319 73

The amount due and remaining to be paid for work done is 210,324 47

Making the total amount of work done 10,728,644 20

And the total amount of work remaining to be done to close the contracts, 2,298,275 72

The work under contract for the construction of the Genesee Valley canal including that which has been completed, as estimated at contract prices, amounts to $4,223,305 68

The amount that has been paid for work done under contracts and upon those that have been cancelled is 3,120,821 34

The amount due and remaining to be paid for work done is 47,970 49

Making the total amount of work done, 3,168,851 83

And the total amount of work remaining to be done to close the contracts is $1,054,453 85

The work under contract for the construction of the Black River Canal and Erie Canal Feeder, including that which has been completed, as estimated at contract prices, amounts to 1,760,046 12

The amount that has been paid for work done under the contracts and upon those that have been canceled 1,670,680 79

The amount due and remaining to be paid for work done is 4,676 37

Making the total amount of work done 1,675,357 16

And the total amount of work remaining to be done to close the contracts 84,658 97

The work under contract for the improvement of the navigation of the Oneida River, including that which has been completed, as estimated at contract prices, amounts to 70,122 56

The amount that has been paid for work done under the contracts and upon those that have been canceled 53,963 04

Making the total amount of work done to close the contracts is 16,159 52

The work under contract upon all of the State Canals, including the Oneida River improvement, and the work which has been completed, as estimated at contract prices is 19,080,391 29

The amount that has been paid for work done under the contracts, and upon those that have been canceled is 15,363,841 90

The amount due and remaining to be paid for work done is 262,971 33

Making the total amount of work done 15,626,813 23

And the total amount remaining to be done to close the contracts 3,453,578 06

The praiseworthy and patriotic exertions of the last legislature to relieve the state in the crisis of our pecuniary affairs, is worthy of all commendation; and if the policy then adopted has resulted in some injury to individuals, it must be ascribed to the necessity of the case, rather than a willingness that any portion of our citizens should suffer detriment.

The policy of arresting large expenditures, and providing for the prompt payment of the interest, and a gradual diminution of the state debt, has exerted a salutary influence in reviving our credit.

The question of a direct tax, rendered necessary by the exigency of our affairs, has been clearly approved by the people; but direct taxation should not be regarded as a permanent measure of finance for the purpose of constructing public works, but as one of a temporary nature, called for by an existing emergency. All future appropriations should be made with reference to as speedy a relinquishment of the tax as the public credit and the general welfare of the state will permit.

The speedy completion of the Black River canal and feeder to and including the summit level, and the Genesee Valley canal, as far as the first feeder from the Genesee River south of Portage, is doubtless anxiously desired by the friends of these improvements. I do not feel that I should faithfully discharge my duty did I not recommend for your careful consideration these portions of the public works. This should of course be done with strict reference to the financial condition of the state,

The following statement shows the aggregate amount of the state debt, on the 30th of September, 1842, and the sum required to pay the interest thereon for the current year:

	Am't of debt.	Am't of int.

The officers who preside over the department of finance and education will submit in their annual reports statements in detail with such general suggestions as they may deem useful.

The subject of education in all its departments, merits your most attentive consideration. It is in my opinion quite proper that in relation to a subject of so much importance, the legislature should annually satisfy themselves that the Common School and Literature Funds are safely invested, and rendered as productive as practicable.

The revenue for the year ending the 30th of Sept. last, has been materially affected by a reduction in canal tolls, and in the auction and salt duties, as compared with the preceding year.

The tolls are less by	$192,968 86
The auction duties are less by	6,417 59
The salt duties	415,720 35
	$214,858 80

The impression is very general that several of the public officers in the city of New York, particularly those who are connected with our inspection laws, are extravagantly paid for their services. This ultimately operates as a tax either upon the producer, or the consumer, or both. There may be other public officers whose compensation exceeds a just equivalent for the services rendered. Should you find such to be the case, you will apply the proper corrective.

The privileges granted to banking institutions, doubtless had for their object the public accommodation; for any other purpose they would be entirely inadmissible. All legislation on this subject should be in reference to the accomplishment of this end, and the banks should be made to do their duty to the people.

A bank, while it pursues the fair and legitimate object of its creation, has the power of aiding all the business relations of the country; but when it is converted to the purpose of accommodating stockholders, directors, speculators and monopolists, to the exclusion of business men, it becomes a curse to any community, and I can hardly imagine a greater evil. Such a system is calculated to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer.

The banking institutions should at all times be subject to the control of the legislature, who cannot well be too watchful in checking their natural tendency to partiality, and inflated issues. Every institution that diverts its means from the legitimate purposes of banking, should be promptly deprived of its charter. Every institution that faithfully fulfils its duties to the public, should be sustained and protected.

The safety fund system was designed mainly to accomplish this end, and while the fund remained adequate, it furnished the means for a prompt and certain redemption of the notes of insolvent banks, and gave greater security to the bill-holder than any other system in practice in this country.

Until recently, the public have doubtless felt great security in this system; but the fund has become so much impaired by the failure of several banks, that it is now unable to meet the immediate calls upon it. The contributions required by law will not provide for a complete redemption of the bills of insolvent banks until the 1st of January, 1849. This estimate is based on the supposition that no part of the bills of the banks that have failed, will be paid from their assets.

The facts developed in relation to the insolvent banks, show that there has been, in some instances, great abuse in their management, and a reckless disregard of moral obligation. How it should have happened that a bank could so improperly conduct its affairs as to cause a total loss to the stockholders, and leave no assetts for the redemption of its bills in circulation, and yet escape the timely observation of the Bank Commissioners, I am unable to imagine. It may have resulted from the want of proper means for ascertaining the real condition of the banks. But whatever may have been the cause, it is quite evident that the appointment of commissioners has not answered all the valuable ends which were anticipated from the measure.

It has been ascertained that the issues of some banks that have failed, have greatly exceeded the amount authorized by law. To guard against such an abuse in future, I renew the recommendation of my predecessor, that the circulating notes should be registered and countersigned by some public officer.

The people have already suffered so much from the frauds and insolvency of some of these institutions, that the subject demands your careful attention.

In almost all instances, the mal-practice of these institutions can be traced to the neglect, or fraudulent acts of their officers; and within the last six years, there have been several extraordinary cases of peculation and fraud. I recommend that provision be made by law for punishing all future transgressions of the kind by imprisonment in the State prison.

Eighty-five associations and individual bankers have deposited the requisite securities, and received circulation notes therefor under the general banking law. Seven of these have been closed by their own officers, and redeemed their notes at par, excepting $1,108, now outstanding, for the redemption of which an equal amount has been deposited with the Comptroller, that had at the time of failure a circulation of $1,197,559 00.

I deem it my duty to call your attention to the consideration of an act entitled "an act to extend the exemption of household furniture and working tools from distress for rent and sale under execution," passed April 11th, 1842.

In addition to the articles formerly exempt, this act adds those of "necessary household furniture, and working tools, and teams, owned by any person being a householder, or having a family for which he provides, to the value of not exceeding one hundred and fifty dollars."

According to my impressions, this act has not in all its provisions, met with general favor; and the objections which have been urged with much plausibility, are the uncertainty of the value of the articles exempt, and its effects on contracts existing at the time the law passed.

When an indebtedness is incurred by one individual to another, the means and ability of the debtor to pay are doubtless taken into consideration, and serve as a basis for the credit. The propriety of any enactment which diminishes the means or lessens the ability of the debtor to pay, is, to say the least of it, very questionable.

Whether articles proposed to be exempted are worth one hundred and fifty dollars, or more or less, is a question about which parties may differ, and it is apprehended, will be the source of much litigation.

All laws which interfere with the relations between debtor and creditor, by impairing the obligations of contracts, have a demoralizing influence upon the people, and seldom, if ever, prove beneficial, even to those for whose benefits they were professedly made.

The repudiation of a public debt, is a heresy that I trust is no where seriously entertained. I am confident that the people of every state in this union would reject the idea of such dishonor, and that they possess a patriotism and public spirit that would induce them to submit to any burden, rather than incur the opprobrium of such foul disgrace.

It is doubtless true that during the inflated period through which we have passed, many states improvidently entered on the construction of public works, altogether too much extended, and under an ill digested and defective system of finance. Hence the lamentable spectacle of ruined credit, and suspended and unfinished roads and canals.—But in looking on this gloomy picture, we should always recollect that this improvidence proceeded from the motive of improving the condition of the states, and not from the intention of contracting debts beyond their ability to pay. The error that has been committed on this subject may be traced to that spirit of extravagance, and speculation, that pervaded every portion of our widely extended community. Few individuals were exempt from its direful consequences, and instead of indulging in feelings of recrimination, we should repair the sad consequences by frugality, industry and economy in all the departments of life.

Success in the great work of improving the condition of a state by the construction of roads and canals, depends very much on a prudent system, which shall have for its object the public good, rather than the gratification of sectional feeling or personal cupidity.

The public stocks of several of the states are discredited, and consequently much depressed in the money market; but the people of these states should not despair. Most of them possess a territory unsurpassed in its fertility. Every part of the globe is contributing by its surplus population to the settlement of the country, and preparing the way for the most important results. I indulge the cheerful hope, that the time is not very distant, when most if not all the states will find means to resuscitate their credit and finish their public works.

The state of New York should cherish the hope that such expectations will be realized. Her natural position, in reference to inland commerce, enables her to furnish the channels of communication for trade that, in no very distant period of time, will be unsurpassed in magnitude.

There has been paid from the public treasury, for all purposes connected with the establishment of the State Lunatic Asylum, the sum of $289,415,70. This sum was disbursed for the purchase of one hundred and twenty-five acres of land, the erection of a building five hundred and fifty feet in length, three stories high exclusive of the basement, and for incidental expenses. The building is located on an elevated and commanding site, about one mile from the city of Utica, and will accommodate three hundred inmates.

The act of 1842 appointed nine managers, to whom is assigned the general control of the property, the appointment of a superintendent the establishment of by-laws, rules and regulations for the management of the Asylum.

On the ninth of last September, they appointed Doct. A. Brigham superintendent, and physician. This gentleman has for several years been engaged in the retreat for the insane at Hartford, in the state of Connecticut.

Some delay has occurred in preparing the building for the reception of patients, by the necessity of repairing some defects in the furnace for warming it, and in providing for an adequate supply of water. It is now contemplated that patients will be received as early as the 16th instant.

The managers will doubtless report to you a detailed statement of all their proceedings, and I cherish the hope that this institution will soon dispense its relief to that unfortunate class of our fellow-citizens, for whose aid and comfort it has been established by an enlightened spirit of philanthropy.

At the extra session of the last legislature my predecessor communicated a report from Mr. Broadhead, in relation to his mission to England, Holland and France, to obtain or transcribe papers affecting 'the colonial or other history of this State.' From this report, and a letter dated at London on the 3d of last December, it appears that the agent cannot prosecute the object of his appointment to a successful termination, without a further appropriation of five or six thousand dollars. He states that he is in the midst of interesting examinations and that important documents have been selected for transcription. It is doubtless desirable that this undertaking should not be frustrated for the want of adequate means to carry it forward. If the legislature should concur in this opinion, their early attention to the subject is rendered proper, in order that the agent may be relieved from the painful position of being engaged in a foreign mission, without the requisite means.

A concurrent resolution was adopted at the last session of the legislature, requesting our senators and representatives in Congress to make use of their best efforts to procure the passage of a law refunding from the public treasury the fine inflicted upon and paid by General Jackson. Since that time, the President of the United States, in a just and magnanimous spirit, commended the subject to the attention of Congress. Altho' the sentiment of the people of this state was expressed through your predecessors, yet it will be highly proper that it should again be heard through you, until, mingling with the voices of the people of the whole Union, the national legislature shall feel constrained to consummate this act of justice.

A letter from a public officer at Washington, under the date of the 4th of Dec., says, that Gen. Worth reports all quiet in Florida, except a small band on the Oklaknee river.

Four churches, one of which cost $14,000, and four school-houses which cost $4,000 each, have been built at Pawtucket during the past season.

It has been ascertained from official or authentic documents, that the total indebtedness of all the States and Territories in this flourishing Union is $198,818,376 35.

Some time ago, it was stated that Gov. Seward had ordered the Sheriff of Oneida Co., to show cause why he should not be removed for malpractice in office. The Albany Evening Journal contains the removal of Mr. Moulton, and the appointment of Theodore S. Faxon, of Utica.

An important surgical operation was performed by Dr. Van Deursen, one day last week, in New-Brunswick, N. J., on a child of Mr. Smith Dunn. It had swallowed a grain of corn two days previous, which but for its extraction, would soon have proved its death. This was done by opening the windpipe, and so successful was the operation, that the child is now in a fair way of recovery.

The Hon. Mr. Wadsworth, of Geneva, N. Y., lately expended ten thousand dollars in the purchase of eleven thousand copies of a book entitled, "The Schoolmaster and the School;" for the purpose of presenting a copy to each school district in the State of of New-York.

Navigation of the Mississippi.—A memorial to Congress on the subject of improving the navigation of the Mississippi, was published in the St. Louis Republican a few days since. It is stated in the document that in four years, 138 steamboats were lost in the river, occasioning a pecuniary loss of $3,710,000. Between the 11th of September and the 15th of October, this year, eight boats were lost, causing a destruction of property to the amount of $219,000, and the loss of forty or fifty lives. Five of the boats were sunk within a mile of one place.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each: each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and traveling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, trouble and expense. The principal advantage to be derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inksand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents — Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Cost of preparing the work, $5000. This beautiful and important work contains upwards of 500 pages royal octavo, is printed from new stereotype plates, handsomely bound in gilt, and lettered, and retails readily at the low price of $2 50 per volume. The following extract is from a lengthy Review, written by the Rev. W. C Brownlee, D. D., and is only one out of several hundred recommendations, from the clergy and the press, that the work has already received.

New-York, August 6, 1842.

"This is, beyond question, one of the most elegant books ever presented to our fellow citizens in this Republic. It ought to be in every Christian family for its intimate value; and in every patriotic family as a splendid specimen of our progress in domestic manufactures, and the advancement of our artists and manufacturers in their rivalship with those of Europe. W. C. BROWNLEE."

A very liberal offer!—One Hundred Dollars will be given by the Publisher to every Agent who will undertake and sell One Hundred Copies of the above Work. He believes that there is scarcely a town or village in the Union, but that numbers may easily be disposed of.

⁂ Persons inclosing money, will be careful to pay the whole postage; and in ordering books will state, explicitly, how the books shall be sent to them

Also, in press, another important, valuable, and cheap work, in the course of publication, and will be ready for delivery early in October, 1842, complete in one volume royal octavo, containing about 600 pages of letter-press, and more than five hundred Engravings, elegantly bound in gilt; price only $2 50 per copy.

The Tulip Bulb.

Conversation between a Mother and Child

MOTHER.

Why is it, my child, you're so sorrowful look?
And seem to forget you was reading your book,
Come tell your dear mother what troubles you so,
And why the big tears from your eyes so fast flow.

CHILD.

I was thinking, dear mother, that soon I must die,
And low in the dark and cold ground I must lie,
Where nothing will cheer me, but all will be sad;
While thinking of these things how could I look glad!

MOTHER.

'Tis true, my dear child, that we all must soon die,
And low in the dark and cold ground we must lie
But still if we think of that time as we ought,
There's something can sweeten and gladden the thought.

You remember, last spring, that I placed in the ground
A small tulip bulb, which you told me you found
Lying dry and neglected, exposed to the sun,
Till life and all moisture, both seemed to be gone.

CHILD.

O yes! I remember qute well the affair,
And wonder'd you placed the dry tulip root there,
But you told me to wait till the summer was near,
And see if my tulip would not then appear.

MOTHER.

And did it there buried in darkness remain,
And never come forth from its prison again?
Or when the bright sun shed its warm beams around
Did the dry tulip bulb burst forth from the ground.

CHILD.

I anxiously watched it, day after day;
Till once on a bright and fair morning in May,
I carefully looked and saw a small blade
Had sprung from the spot where the tulip was laid.

And soon it grew large and the buds could be seen
With their beautiful red, bursting forth from the green,
And next the bright blossoms hung full on their stalks,
And I pluck'd and admir'd them oft in my walks.

MOTHER.

Just so our frail bodies will burst from the gloom,
That surrounds them while lying confined in the tomb;
The Power that bade the dry tulip put forth,
Will summon our bodies to rise from the earth.

And if we have here kept our Savior's commands,
We shall burst with more glory and beauty those bands,
Than the tulip can boast when its petals unfold;
Or the butterfly with its bright wings of gold.

CHILD.

How beautiful, mother! I never shall weep
Again when I think that in death I must sleep;
But I'll think of the tulip, and try to obey,
And hope with the Righteous to rise on that day.

NEW-YEAR'S NIGHT OF AN UNHAPPY MAN.

FROM THE GERMAN OF RICHTER.

An old man stood in the New-Year's night at his window, and looked with a glance of fearful despair upon the immovable, ever-blooming heavens, and down upon the still, pure white earth, on which was no one so sleepless and so desolate in soul as he. For his grave stood near him; it was covered with the snows of old age, not with the green foliage of youth; and he had brought out of a rich life nothing but errors, sins, and disease; a wasted body, a desolate soul, a breast full of poison, and an old age full of remorse. To-day, the beautiful hour of his youth re-appeared like spectres, and re-conveyed him to that lovely morning when his father placed him upon the cross way of life, which leads on the right, by sunny paths of virtue into a large quiet land, full of light and harvests; but on the left, plunges down into the mole-walks of existence, and a black cave, full of distilling poisons, hissing snakes, and dark sultry vapors.

Alas! the snakes, were hanging on his breast, and the drops of poison were on his tongue; and he knew now where he stood. Distracted with irrepressible grief, he called to the heavens:

"Give back to me my youth! O, Father! place me again upon the cross way, that I may choose aright!"

But his father and his youth were long gone. He saw the igni fatui dancing upon marshes and disappearing upon cemeteries; and of which he said: "These are my foolish days." He saw a star flying from heaven, and, glittering in its fall, vanish upon the earth. "Thus am I!" said his bleeding heart, and the snakes teeth of repentance probed still deeper into his wounds. His flaming imagination showed him flying ghosts (natcht wandler) upon the roofs; the wind-mill lifted its threatening arms for destruction; and a scull, having been left in the dead house, assumed gradually his features. In the midst of the struggle, the music of the new year flowed down from the steeples, like far-off church melodies.

His emotions began to soften. He looked around the horizon, and abroad on the far-extended earth, and thought of the friends of his youth, who, now happier and better than he, were teachers of the earth, and fathers of happy children and blessed men. He said: "O, if I might also slumber like you, with dry eyes this first night of the year! Alas! my dear parents! I should now be happy had I followed your precepts!"

In the feverish remembrances of his youth, it appeared to him as if the scull with his features, in the house of the dead, upraised itself; and at length, by that superstition which in the New-Year's night sees spirits of futurity, became a living youth.

And at last he could look upon it no more. He covered his eyes; a thousand hot tears vanished in the snow; and he sighed in accents scarcely audible; "Return youth! return!"

And it did return. It was a horrid dream. He was yet a youth; his errors only were no vision. But he thanked God that while yet young, he was able to shun the loathsome walks of vice, and turn into the sunny path which leads to the land of harvests. Return with him, young reader, if thou art standing with him in the way of error. This terrific dream would become thy future judge. And if thou shouldst call, 'Come back, beautiful youth!' it would no more return.

From the Haverhill Gazette.

GRACE DARLING,

OR THE WRECK OF THE FORFARSHIRE.

Grace Darling, the heroine of this story, whose heroic conduct in aiding to rescue a shipwrecked crew, is already familiar to many of our readers, a short account of which is given below, died in England, the 20th of Oct. aged 24.

The Forfarshire left Hull on the evening of Wednesday, Sept. 25, 1838, having on board a valuable cargo, and passengers. Her crew consisted of 21 persons; the captain's wife accompanied him on the voyage.

The Forfarshire had not proceeded far when a leak was discovered in the boiler. this rendered it necessary to extinguish two of the fires, which were, however relighted when the boiler had been partially repaired. The vessel continued her course until the following evening, by which time she had proceeded as far as Berwick Bay, when the leak again appeared. It had now become so great that the greatest difficulty was experienced in keeping the boilers filled, the water escaping through the leak as fast as it was pumped in. The wind was blowing strong and the sea running high, and the leak increasing so much from the motion of the vessel, that the fires were extinguished, and the engines, of course, became entirely useless. It was now about ten o'clock at night, and they were off St. Abb's Head, a bold promontory on the Scottish coast. There being great danger of drifting ashore, the sails were hoisted fore and aft, and the vessel put about in order to put her before the wind, and keep her off the land. She soon became unmanageable, and the tide setting strong to the south, she proceeded in that direction. It rained heavily during the whole time, and the fog was so dense that it became impossible to tell the situation of the vessel. At length breakers were discovered close to the leeward, and the Fern Lights, which about the same time became visible, put an end to all doubt as to the eminent peril of the unfortunate vessel.—An attempt was made to run her between the Fern Islands, but she refused to obey the helm, and at 3 o'clock on Friday morning, she struck with tremendous force against the outer Longstone Island.

At the moment the vessel struck, most of the passengers were below, and many of them asleep in their berths. One, alarmed by the shock, started up, and seizing his trowsers only, rushed upon deck. When he reached it, he found every thing in confusion, and seeing part of the crew hoisting out a boat, he sprang into it. The raging of the sea instantly separated it from the vessel, and though several other passengers attempted to reach it, they were unsuccessful, and perished in the attempt. The boat itself escaped by something little short of miracle. There was but one outlet by which it could avoid being dashed in pieces on the breakers by which it was surrounded. This outlet it providentially took without its crew being aware of it; and after being exposed to the storm all night, it was picked up by a sloop, and carried in to Shields.

In less than five minutes after the vessel struck, a second shock separated her in two parts—the stern, quarter deck, and cabin being instatly borne away, through a passage called the Piper Gut, by a tremendous current which runs with considerable violence, even in temperate weather—with a rapidity of about six miles an hour—but which, when the weather is tempestuous, flows with a force truly terrific.

The fore part of the vessel, in the mean time, remained fast on the rock, and to it still clung the few passengers who remained, every instant expecting to share the fate of their unfortunate companions, whom they had seen swept away by the raging element. In this dreadful situation their cries attracted the attention of Grace Darling, the daughter of the keeper of the Outer Ferne Lighthouse. With a noble heroism, she immediately determined to attempt their rescue, in spite of the raging storm, and the all but certain destruction which threatened to attend it.

Having hastily awkened her father, he launched his boat at day break, and, with a generous sympathy, worthy of the father of Grace Darling, prepared to proceed to their rescue. The gale, in the meantime, continued unabated, and the boiling of the waves threatened a speedy destruction to their frail boat. It was, therefore, with a heart full of fearful forebodings that he undertook the perilous enterprise. After watching the wreck for some time, they discovered that living beings were still clinging to it, and the gallant young woman, with matchles intrepidity, seized on an oar and entered the boat. This was enough—her father followed; and, with the assistance of his daughter, conducted the frail skiff over the foaming billows to the spot where the wreck appeared. By a dangerous and desperate effort he was landed on the rock, and to preserve the frail boat from being dashed to pieces, it was rapidly rowed back among the awful abyss of waters, and kept floating by the skillfulness and dexterity of this noble-minded young woman. At length the whole of the survivors, consisting of five of the crew and four of the passengers, were taken from the wreck, and conveyed to the lighthouse, where she ministered to their wants, and anxiously, for [illegible] days and three nights, waited on them and soothed their affliction. This perilous achievement, unexampled in the feats of female fortitude, was witnessed by the survivors in silent wonder. The weather continued so tempestuous that the main land could not be reached till Sunday, when the nine persons, saved by the gallant heroism of the Darlings, were landed in safety; thus making the entire number of persons saved from the wreck eighteen. All the others perished.

Those who found refuge on the rock suffered severely during the night from the cold and heavy seas which swept over them. The captain and his wife were both drowned, clasped in each other's embrace.

This daring act of Grace Darling's was one of heroism in which few parallels can be found; nor has it been without its reward. Besides the satisfaction of saving nine fellow creatures from certain destruction, the fame of the heroic act has spread far and wide, and its praise been on every tongue. Painters have portrayed the scene, and its memory will be thus preserved.—Presents have been poured in upon her and her father, and every thing been done to mark the public sympathy and approbation of the daring and disinterested deed.

THE YOUNG MAN'S ESTATE.

An Italian philosopher expressed in his motto, that "Time was his estate;" an estate indeed! which will produce nothing without cultivation; but will always abundantly repay the labors of industry, and satisfy the most extensive desires, if no part of it be suffered to lie waste by negligence, to be over-run with noxious plants, or laid out for show, rather than for use.—The duties of man, as Dr. Johnson finely observes, are such as human nature does willingly perform, and such as those are inclined to delay, who yet intend some time to fulfill them. It was therefore necessary that this universal reluctance should be counteracted, and the drowsiness of hesitation wakened into resolve. That the danger of procrastination should be hourly detected.—To this end all the appearances of nature uniformly conspire.—Whatever we see on every side, reminds us of the lapse of time and the flux of life. The day and the night succeed each other; the rotation of seasons diversifies the year; the sun rises, attains the meridian, declines and sets, every night the moon changes its form. The day is an image of the Year, and the Year the representation of Life. The Morning answers to the Spring and the spring to Childhood and and youth; the Noon corresponds to the Summer, and the summer to the strength of Manhood. The Evening is an emblem of the Autumn, and Autumn of declining life. The Night, with its silence and darkness, shows the Winter in which all the powers of vegetation are benumbed; and the Winter points out the time when life shall cease, with all its hopes and pleasures. If these parts of time were not variously colored, we should never discern their departure or succession; but should live thoughtless of the past and careless of the future; without will, and perhaps without power to compute the periods of life, or to compare the time which is already lost, with that which may probably remain. And yet it is certain that these admonitions of nature, however importunate, are too often vain; and that many who mark with such accuracy the course of time, appear to have little sensibility of the decline of life. Every man has something to do, which he neglects; every man has his faults to conquer, which he delays to combat. But—let him who proposes his own happiness reflect, that while he forms his purpose, the Day rolls on, and "the night cometh when no man can work."

From the American Messenger.

FICTITIOUS AND LICENTIOUS PRESS.

One great source of alarm is immediate and imminent. The press teems and the mails groan with fiction and trash. Daily, and weekly, and monthly periodicals are filled with matter, not only worthless, but often positively demoralizing. The injury to mind and morals was sufficiently deplorable, when hundreds of steam-presses were throwing off their thousands of volumes daily of novels and romances; and when circulating libraries served as literary groceries, to furnish the means of mental intoxication for the fashionable and the foolish.—But now the United Mail Department is transformed into a great circulating library, by which, at the twentieth part of the cost of transmitting a billet to a friend, enough of the confection of literature to derange healthy mental digestion for a month, can be conveyed to the remotest village in the land. The extent of the issues of this kind is as incalculable as the mischief wrought by their indiscriminate and almost universal perusal.

But this evil demands a more solemn and stern rebuke. It is not a light thing that there should be entering all our dwellings, men—or what is worse, their works—with unprincipled morals, giving false views of life, and casting sneers upon the Gospel and its professors, to fill up all the leisure hours of parents, children and domestics with tales, that, if true, should not be read, and the less, since they are false. Every steamship brings "the latest novel"—of an author, who, perhaps, is illustrating in his life the principles of his book, violating one or all the commandments of the Decalogue—while every steamboat carries into the interior mammoth editions to poison the minds and ruin the souls of the multitudes who are eager to devour the precious effusions. O, what havoc of mind and morals results from this wholesale dealing in what is false! Popular fiction invariably gives a disrelish for simple truth; engenders a habit of reading for amusement simply, which destroys all hope of mental improvement; familiarizes the mind with scenes of genteel or vulgar debauchery, and excites a thirst for similar adventures; gives false views of the perfectibility of human nature, and leads to disappointments in the relations of life; undermines the Gospel and the influence of the pulpit, by drawing away the mind from serious things, lessening the probabilities that its truths will take effect on the conscience; or if they do, furnishing a ready mode of shaking off conviction; and by degrees sapping the foundations of virtue, and leading to crimes which once would have been abhorred.

He must have been a careless observer who has not noticed fruits like these, of the seeds of ruin sown broadcast over our land, in the fictitious publications of which we speak. We have now arrived at the second natural stage of the degenerate tendencies of the press. Grossly licentious papers, without even the concealment of the name which once would have been scouted from the community, are unblushingly circulated in the channels opened by "the polite literature," which has contributed to form the morbid appetite that now cries—"give, give." Whether it will end in any thing short of the indecencies, obscenity and infidelity of France, remains to be seen.—Laws seem to be inoperative; public sentiment does not correct the evil, and will not, so long as it tolerates and craves a literature that has paved the way for this; and for aught that now appears, the moral sensibilities are to be still farther outraged with the sight and the sound of libidinous papers, even when going to and entering the sanctuary of God.

Is it not a proper subject of discussion and inquiry, on the part of the Board, whether something may not be done to restore a healthy moral tone of feeling on this subject? Whether, by arresting public attention by the pulpit and the press, the tide of evil may not be stayed before every thing that is "pure, and lovely, and of good report" is blighted?

POVERTY.—We all say, "you need not be ashamed of poverty—it is no disgrace;" and most truly have spoken, poverty is no disgrace; but why do we preach, treat it as if it were a pestilence?—shrink from it—proclaim it—insult it—chastise it—betray it—loathe it—abandon it! We shame to greet that "shabby looking man," or bow to that 'ill-dressed' woman because we have not industry to separate the chaff from the wheat, because we are too prone to honor the garments woven by men's hands rather than the creature stamped in God's own image—because we want moral courage enough to walk erect in the right path, unless it be the chosen highway of the great and powerful. The grave is the poor man's sanctuary; he can lay him down there and neither feel nor fear the chilliness of the world—the earth-worm knows the heart that poverty destroyed—but it only takes its portion. Earth has returned to earth—the spirit is far beyond the reach of poverty.

"Generation after generation," says an eloquent modern writer, "have felt as we feel, and their lives were as active in life as ours are now. They passed away as a vapor, while nature wore the same aspect of beauty as when her Creator commanded her to be. And so likewise, shall it be when we are gone! The heavens will be as bright over our graves, as they are now around our path; the world will have the same attraction for offspring yet unborn that she had once for ourselves, and that she has now for our children. Yet a little while and all this will have happened. The throbbing heart will be stilled, we shall be at rest. Our funeral will wind on its way, and the prayers will be said, and the grave clods will be thrown in, and our friends will all return, and we shall be left behind in darkness for the worm. And it may be that for some short time we shall be spoken of; but the things of life will soon be forgotten. Days will continue to move on, and laughter and song will be heard in the very chamber in which he died; and the eye that mourned for us will be dried and will glisten with joy; and even our children will cease to think of us, and will not remember to lisp our name." Then shall we have become, in the touching language of the Psalmist, 'forgotten and clean out of mind.'—Knickerbocker.

HINTS TO FARMERS.—A farmer should never undertake to cultivate more land than he can do thoroughly; half tilled land is growing poorer; well tilled land is constantly improving.

A farmer should never keep more cattle, horses, sheep or hogs, than he can keep in good order; an animal in high order the first of December, is already half wintered.

A farmer should never depend on his neighbor for what he can, by care and good management, produce on his farm; he should never beg fruit while he can plant trees, or borrow tools when he can make or buy them—a high authority has said, "the borrower is servant to the lender."

A farmer should never be so immersed in political matters as to forget to sow his wheat, dig his patatoes and bank up his cellar; nor should he be so inattentive to them as to be ignorant of those great questions of national and state policy which will always agitate, more or less, a free people.

No farmer should allow the reproach of neglected education to lie against himself or family; if "knowledge is power," the commencement should be early and deeply laid in the minds of his children.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To Families and Invalids.

THE following indispensable family remedies may be found at the village drug stores, and soon at every country store in the state. Remember and never get them unless they have the fac simile signature of Comstock & Co. on the wrappers, as all others by the same names are base impositions and counterfeits. If the merchant nearest you has them not, urge him to procure them at 71 Maiden-lane, the next time he visits New York, or to write for them. No family should be a week without these remedies

BALDNESS.

Balm of Columbia, for the hair, which will stop it from falling out, or restore it on bald places; and on children make it grow rapidly, or on those who have lost their hair from any cause. All vermin that infest the heads of children in schools, are prevented or killed at once. Find the name of Comstock & Co. on it, or never try it. Remember this always.

RHEUMATISM AND LAMENESS

Positively cured, and all shrivelled muscles and limbs are restored, in the old or young, by the Indian Vegetable Elixir and Nerve and Bone Liniment, but never without the name of Comstock & Co. on it.

PILES &c.

Are wholly prevented, or governed if the attack has come on, if you use the only true Hay's Liniment, from Comstock & Co. All sores and every thing relieved by it that admits of an outward application. It acts like a charm. Use it.

HORSES that have Ring-Bone, Spavin, Wind-Galls, &c., are cured by Roofs' Specific; and Foundered horses entirely cured by Roofs' Founder Ointment. Mark this, all horsemen.

A Defense of the Christian Sabbath.

The author of this article designs a brief review of a sermon delivered in the village of Oxford, Chenango Co., by a brother whose talent and piety as a gospel minister demands respect. The labors of the brother were expended to justify the observance of the first day of the week as the Christian Sabbath. I feel myself bound to do this from various considerations.

1. The doctrine advanced was a subversion of plain bible facts, as I will show, and farther, it was apparent that many received it as truth, and were thus corrupted by the doctrine and commandments of men; and further, I believe it to be the duty of every lover of truth, and purity of faith, to lift his voice against false doctrine, especially when that doctrine is a substitution of the law of man for that of God, and this too in a practical point; and further, because reference was made to what I had written on this subject some time previous. The text was, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Exo. xx. 8. I must confess I was at a loss to know how he was about to get first day keeping out of his text, as I well knew it stood in close connexion with a positive declaration that the seventh day of the week was the Sabbath, the reader will see this by a reference to the brother's text, adding only the two following verses, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work: but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." &c., but I soon learned that it was to be obtained as other substances are, by grinding and renewing, which was but little better than handling the "word of God deceitfully." I should just as soon have thought of justifying murder from the sixth command, which is, "Thou shalt not kill," as to have attempted to prove first day keeping from the fourth; but nothing is too great for man to undertake but simply to receive the bible as it is, but the course is a quite common one for there is not an institution of God's house but is denied, or subverted, or both.

I ask if in scarcely six short months the church of Christ, with those that have corrupted her, are to stand before the awful bar of an offended God, with this mass of corruption that she has been gathering for nearly eighteen centuries? May God prepare her for the event whether it is sooner or later. The brother divided his sermon into two general heads, 1. The history of the Sabbath, and 2. The manner of its observance. My objections will be confined to the first general divisions, and to that I saw no particular objection until he spoke of the deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt, when he said that some thought the Sabbath was changed to the day on which they were delivered from bondage; he was careful to avoid saying it was his opinion, but said it was very plausible, and then to justify the position gave his reason for so saying; first, by saying that a great and good man said it was his opinion. To this I would only say in the language of Job, "Great men are not always wise."

The next was that the Lord changed the Sabbath to avoid the appearance of idolatry, for they, (idolators,) observed that day. This was a new course of reasoning to me. I thought God commanded all men to obey him, and the sin of the world was that they had forsaken God, and not that they had kept his law. Mark it well, reader. God forsaking or altering the law to avoid the appearance of idolatry! What said God? "My people have committed two evils, they have forsaken me." How different the language, they left God and not God them?

A third argument was that it is recorded in Deut. v. 15, that the Lord had brought them (the Israelites,) out of the land of Egypt, therefore, they were bound to keep the Sabbath. It is true that the Lord urged that as a reason why they should keep the Sabbath. I ask if that proved a change? Certainly not. Does not the brother know that the same reason is placed at the head of all the commands, and this too as a reason why they should keep them? Hear what the Lord said in the 6th and 7th verses of the same chapter, "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Would the brother argue from these verses that they now worshiped another God?—No; yet he might do it with just as much propriety as he argues a change of the Sabbath from the 15th verse. Now, reader, the doctrine there taught is this, because God had been merciful to them they were bound to obey him and keep his commandments.

Again; the brother said that Henry was of the same opinion; but judge of my disappointment when I turned to Henry and found no such thing intimated. I will give his own language, which is a very early move by him to secure his views of the change of the Sabbath at the resurrection of Christ: he says, "There is some variation here from that recorded Exo. 20, as there is between the Lord's prayer as it is recorded in Matt. 6, and as it is in Luke 11, in both, it is more necessary that we tie ourselves to the things than to the words, unalterably. The most considerable variation is in the fourth commandment, Exo. 20, the reason annexed is taken from the creation of the world; from their deliverance out of Egypt, because that was typical of our redemption by Christ, in remembrance of which the Christian Sabbath was to be observed. In the resurrection of Christ we were brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God, with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm; therefore, by the gospel edition of the law, we are directed to keep the first day of the week." But now suppose Mr. Henry did believe the Sabbath was changed here? What then? I suppose it would be worth as much as it is on the subject of baptism. Does the brother believe him there? No; but it is by no means certain that the Israelites did not leave Egypt on the Sabbath. The scriptures are silent on this point. How then can we tell any thing about it? But one more objection to the supposed change, and that is drawn from the reason urged for the observance of the Sabbath of the fourth command. This reason is applicable to no other day of the week but the original Sabbath, for no other day stood in that relation to creation; therefore it is plain that no change did take place. We have no other objections, but these are sufficient.

The next general position was, that the original Sabbath was instituted to commemorate the creation of the world, and that the work of redemption was greater than that of creation, and therefore the Sabbath was transferred to that, and it was farther claimed that the resurrection day was validly the redemption day, and that the first day of the week was the resurrection day or the day on which Christ rose. As a proof of this change, the example of Christ and the Apostles were quoted. These several propositions are now to be considered in order. Now, reader, mark well the position, which is, that the work of redemption is to be observed, and that the change then and there took place, for the reasons above assigned, and that the examples above alluded to is not quoted as the change, but as proof of the change. Now if I succeed in showing that the resurrection day was not the redemption day, but the crucifixion day was such, then it will appear that there is no connection between the redemption and the examples quoted, then all will see that no attention was paid to the redemption day by the Apostles, and, therefore, the position will be lost and every argument fail. Now to the matter before us.

1. I would say it is by no means certain that the Sabbath was instituted to commemorate the creation of the world. I know that this is the general opinion of the writers of the present age, but I ask if the opinion of man is to be taken for a foundation of our faith? But hark! hear what God says by the mouth of Moses, Gen. ii. 3. "And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it: because that in it he had rested from all his works which God had created and made." Here the reason of his sanctifying the seventh day is plainly expressed, and that is not that he had created a world particularly, but that he had rested on that day. From this view of the matter it will be seen that the argument fails, for the anticipated analogy does not exist.

But once more admitting the position to be true claimed by the brother, the analogy does not hold good for this obvious fact, that the rest instituted was on the day after creation was finished, and not on the last day of creation. To make the analogy good, with the admission that the work of redemption was finished on the first day, we should rest on Monday, that being the day after the work was done. Here the analogy fails, and if so, the argument is lost for no precept is claimed to this effect.

And now, admitting the analogy to hold good, what does it all amount to without a "thus saith the Lord?" This is not a change arising from a moral principle, but is of a positive nature, and hence we are to get its length and breadth from the precept enforcing it. Where is the precept? Let the brother give the chapter and verse, and then we hold ourselves bound to believe, and not till then. Until these objections are fairly met and shown to be wrong, the sin of Sabbath-breaking that the brother would bind on others, will rest on himself.

The next that claims our attention is, (for there is nothing more,) that the work of redemption is greater than the work of creation. But I ask what mode of calculation is adopted to find this out? There must be some principle adopted to determine the magnitude of one or the other, or both of them, or certainly we are unprepared to determine. I ask again, how the narrow mind of man that cannot tell how he sees, talks, thinks, or moves, can judge of the magnitude of the entire work of God? I say again, better had he come back from his hazardous circumnavigation of the work of the Almighty God, and sit the foot of revelation clothed in his right mind, and learn the will of his Lord from that. This path for mortal man is safe —We ask again the scripture proof, but it is not to be had. The most horrible inquisition through which the Bible has passed has not been able to produce one for its relief.

But to notice the arguments might not be amiss in this place. The brother was quite indefinite here and did not say whether the magnitude of the work consisted in the amount of labor, or in point of value, but some times spoke as if it was the last, and at other times as if it was the first. I do not suppose, however, it was in the amount of labor, for this would imply limit to the power of God. God being Almighty every thing is equally easy to him. It is but for God to speak and it is done. If it is in point of value, then there might be a chance for an argument; but in this it would appear to me that the brother made an unfortunate choice, for in my humble opinion, so far as human reason may be brought to bear on the question, the argument is in favor of creation. The brother spoke of the worth of the soul, and said it was worth more than worlds like this, and inquired, what it would profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what he would give in exchange for his soul?

But had the brother forgotten that the soul that had been redeemed had been created? If the soul that had been redeemed had also been created, then there could be nothing made in the argument, for the same amount of value that was redeemed was created, but were all redeemed that were created? The redemption is the application of the atonement made. If there should be any finally to whom the application should not be made, then it will appear that the work of redemption is not as great as that of creation, there being a part of the most important work of creation lost. But now admitting that all were redeemed who were created, the next question would be, was the redemption as complete as the work of creation? or were all that was lost restored to all intents and purposes? No; evils of a temporal as well as spiritual nature now rests on the earth.

But one more on this point, admitting the redemption to be perfect in all points, and every thing restored that was lost there was a part of the creation that never sinned, and, consequently, were never redeemed, (I speak of unaccountable creatures.) From these reasons it may be seen that the brother's ground is untenable, and again his position fails.

Admitting the work of redemption to be greater than that of creation, does it follow that the Sabbath must have been changed to that day on which it was done? No; there is no scripture to that effect, neither is there any example to warrant the course, no, not one. Why then labor so hard to prove the position when it amounts to nothing after all? We have other objections to the position, but these must suffice at present. The next thing that claims our attention is, that the work of redemption was finished at the resurrection of Christ. As the main question of the whole matter rests here, we will be somewhat particular on this point. I will say here that I take the position that the day on which Christ was crucified, is validly the redemption day. I shall not try to argue the question at length, but will bring the proof. I will do this so abundantly as to supercede the necessity of argument.

I am aware that the resurrection of Christ is a glorious event to the Christian world, and so is the birth of Christ, and I might add, with equal propriety, his assertion, all these are marked in scripture as works of great moment to the children of God, but whoever thought of ascribing redemption on this account to them? and all these events must necessarily take place, or our happiness must or could not be complete. He must have been born or we could have had no Savior, "For unto you is born a Savior." He must have rose or the scriptures would not have been fulfilled, "And he said unto them, these are the words that I spake unto you while I was yet with you, that all things might be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses and the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me." He must ascend for our comfort. "It is necessary for you that I go away, for if I go not away the comforter will not come. I go to prepare a mansion for you," but does all this make them a part of the redemption of man? No; this I think must be plain to all, for, from the very nature of them, there is no redeeming quality or principle in either of the above events, however important they may be in themselves. But on the other hand we may plainly, from the nature of the death and sufferings of Christ, discover its redeeming and justifying principles, but we are not left to wander in the wide fields of nature for evidence alone, but abundance of testimony may be brought from the bible to show that inspired men ascribed redemption to the death of Christ, some of which we will here introduce.

We will begin with the Prophet Isaiah, liii. 7, 5. "Surely, he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows; yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him." Verse 8, "for he was cut off out of the land of the living; for the transgression of my people was he stricken." Again, v. 10, "Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief: when thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin." In these few passages the prophet fully ascribes our redemption to the death of Christ.

Rom. v. 8. "But God commandeth his love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."

Mark x. 45. "The son of man came to give his life a ransom for many." John xi. 50. "It is expedient that one man should die for the people, and that the whole people die not."

John x. 14. "The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep."

"I lay down my life for the sheep."

"He gave himself for us."

"He died the just for the unjust."

"Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many."

"In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins."

"He gave his life a ransom for many."

"We who are far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ."

"While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."

"Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his blood."

Gal. iii. 13. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us, for it is written cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree."

Eph. xi. 13. "But now in Christ Jesus, ye who were sometimes afar off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ."

Peter ii. 18. "Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation, received by tradition from your fathers, but with the precious blood of Christ."

Rev. v. 7. "And they sung a new song, saying, thou art worthy to take the book and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain and hast redeemed us unto God by thy blood."

Many more passages of scripture might be quoted on this point to the same effect, but why should we quote any more? if man will not believe this multitude of testimony, I should despair of making him believe, though I should quote the whole bible. Certainly wild and deceptive was the writings of that age, if Christ did not redeem lost and ruined man by his death, for it is repeatedly stated that we were redeemed by the blood of Christ, it is in vain to say that our redemption was finished by the resurrection of Christ. This is but to contradict the holy scriptures themselves. Yes, dear reader, reflect upon that day when the awful contest between heaven and hell was to take place on Mount Calvary. Behold on one hand the combined forces of the lower world, and on the other stood alone the despised Nazarite, and of the people there was none to help.

Peter, who had but yesterday said, "although all men forsake thee yet will I not," had retired to weep over his sins. John who leaned on the breast of his Lord at the last supper, at a lonely distance stood to behold the heart rending tragedy. The sun darkened, the earth quaking, the rocks rending, the Son of God crying with a loud voice, "it is finished"! the veil of the temple rending, signifying to the lost and ruined world that the way into heaven itself is now made perfect. Yes, the graves are opening and the dead saints are enjoying a year of jubilee. Yes, glory to God, the battle is fought, the victory is won, and "the Lord alone in that day was exalted."

Once more to the analogy. Here we find it complete with the admission that Christ was crucified on the sixth day of the week, he finished his work on that day and then rested in the grave on the Sabbath, arose, and on the first day he went from place to place publishing the glad tidings of his resurrection. By this time I think it may be plainly seen that we not only have the plain and unerring command of God, "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God;" but we have the corroborating testimony and example of our Lord to justify our practice in the observance of the Sabbath of the fourth command.

With the admonition to the reader that he should keep still, in view that the redemption gave rise to the change, (as our first day brethren claim,) and not the example of the Savior and His Apostles. But these are quoted, as above stated, simply as proof that the Sabbath was changed for the purpose of observing the redemption day. We will consider the evidences claimed as justifying the observance of the first day of the week. On this point there was no direct precept claimed, but the brother thought there was a prediction of the change by the Psalmist, which was, "this is the day that the Lord hath made, we will rejoice in it and be glad." In answer to this I would say,

1. I do not know by what rule of interpretation he could apply this to the change of the Sabbath, but it is plain that this is a forced construction on the passage from its connexions. Commentators generally understand this as not referring to any day of the week particularly, but to the gospel day. Christ said, "Abraham saw my day and was glad." None doubt, as I know, but the Savior here referred to his reign on earth. This, doubtless, was the day to which the Psalmist referred; but if it is still claimed that he must have referred to a natural day, then it was the seventh and not the first; for that day only is called God's in a peculiar sense.

God says of that day, "If thou turn away thy foot from my holy day," &c. And Christ says, speaking of the seventh day, "The Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath-day." Then if this proves any thing, it proves too much. But there is a passage that might with some degree of propriety have been quoted by the brother, which you may find in Daniel, vii. 25. "And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws." This looks more like a prediction of the Sabbath-change of which the brother spoke: for it was changed by Popish authority to which Daniel refers.

Now to the examples claimed; And what are they? First the example of Christ; it is said that Christ met frequently with his disciples on the first day of the week. The brother said he met them four times; first, with Mary; second, with Peter; third, with the two disciples on their way to Emmaus; fourth with his disciples at Jerusalem. We cannot look at these separately; our space will not suffer it, and in fact we have but little disposition to do it; for the reader must see that one must be panic-struck for evidence to rely on this. Does not the brother know that Christ lived, and associated with his disciples every day of the week for more than three years? Why then bring such proof? I suppose probably for the want of better! But the reader will remember that all this time the disciples did not believe that Christ had risen from the dead. Mark xvi. 11. And they when they heard that he was alive believed not. Luke xxiv. 10, 11. It was Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary the mother of James, and other women that were with them, which told these things unto the Apostles, and those words seemed unto them as idle tales, and they believed them not: neither did the two disciples that journeyed to Emmaus believe him till the day was far spent. Now under those circumstances, of what use is it to talk about the example of Christ? None. The next example was taken from Acts xx. 7. "And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them ready to depart on the morrow; and continued his speech until midnight." There are several objections against the doctrine drawn from this passage; but we will be satisfied with a few at this time. Our first objection is, that it is the only meeting on that day of the week mentioned in the bible! This we do not think is sufficient to justify the supposition that it was the custom to meet on that day, and if they did it would not prove a change, but that they had two Sabbaths now, there being no intimation of the removal of the Sabbath of the fourth command.

A third objection is, it was a night meeting; and the example being the rule would only make a Sabbath of the night. This, I am aware would suit the convenience of many; but one of the great purposes of the Sabbath would be much crippled in this manner of its observance. But the brother said he could not tell whether it was a night meeting or not! If so, I am not surprised that the brother should be found keeping the first day of the week. Such piteous ignorance discloses the difficulty. I may be thought to be rash; but I ask if such things are to be passed over slightly, especially when coming from the sacred desk? Read from the 7th to 12th verse and see who can doubt. We have many other objections, but with these we submit it to the reader.

The next example referred to was, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. "Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gathering when I come." As the reader will readily see that there was no meeting intimated here, there is nothing more called for from me. Mark it well!—LAY BY HIM—not the church.

The next argument was drawn from —numbers! To this I would say, first, if the argument is a good one, then the Catholics are right, and not my brother with his fraternity. Again, one of the poets of my brother has well said:

"Numbers are no mark
That men will right be found,
For few were saved in Noah's Ark,
And many millions drowned."

"Many are called but few are chosen."—Jesus Christ.

The last argument that was advanced, was stated to be drawn from history. He said that Ecclesiastical history taught us that the church kept the first day of the week as the Sabbath from the time of the Apostles until now. He did not quote his authority, but simply gave his own word.—This I think was a prudent step for him, for it saved detection, for history teaches no such thing. I intended to have quoted some 14 historians subversive of his statement; but my space will not allow it, and only add that any wishing information may obtain it by perusing the S. D. B. Register, No. 38, present volume, or call on the subscriber.—Any correction in this article would be gratefully received by me from the brother.

NOTHING LIKE THIS AMONG THE PEOPLE.—"One of our missionaries at the East," says a correspondent of the N. Y. Observer, "writing home a few months ago, in a letter just received, describes the death scene of Mrs. A., the wife of one of the devoted servants of God, now toiling among the heathen. He speaks of the power of the scene upon the natives who were standing around the bed of the sufferer, as she triumphed in the hour of expiring agony, and smiled sweetly in the moment of her departure. One of the heathen looked on with wonder, and at length broke the silence of the room by saying, 'We never saw any thing like this among our people.'

"No, no, poor pagan! and you never will till the religion of the Gospel shall shed its blessed influence on the hearts of your dying friends. Heathenism, philosophy, infidelity, may teach us to die without emotion; but the gospel only can cause us to smile and sing while the heart-strings break."

Be just, and fear not.

All Infidels either Ignorant or Willful.

There is no subject that comes up before man that is sustained by a better and more extensive array of proof, than the evidences of Christianity, and the Divine authenticity of the Sacred Scriptures. It is no part of our object to present any of the proofs now, but simply to call attention to the fact that all infidels are either ignorant or wilful. Ignorance is doubtless the most prolific cause of Infidelity. The carnal heart is opposed to God and his government, consequently it is unwilling to examine the claims of God upon it. This opposition to the will of God and his claims, leads also to efforts to disprove his existence. Hence every effort is made to discover an inconsistency in God's word and the religion of Jesus Christ. And the great power of most modern infidels consists in their ability to present apparent inconsistencies and childish quibbles. They have by no means a consistent and thorough knowledge of God's word, for this would at once destroy their infidelity. An honest infidel must also be ignorant of himself, and his own emotions, and almost every thing around him; for these all testify of a God and the immortality of the soul. Such persons are entitled to the commiseration of every one that has not become fastened in the same meshes.

But there are infidels who are such not from ignorance, but from a determination to oppose the right way of the Lord, and as much as in them lies to destroy the influence and power of Christianity, so that with less of opposition they may give unrestrained license to their depraved dispositions. Such are advocates of socialism who would sunder all the interesting relations of life, and make the gratification of their unholy desires, the supreme law of action and of right. Infidelity never has been productive of any good to man or societies. Its uniform tendency is to corrupt; and we have never yet seen that infidel who has not had other views associated with his infidelity. They are in fact inseparable. The moment that ignorance and vice are done, any infidelity ceases. It has nothing to sustain it.

Prevailing Prayer.

It is a most interesting reflection to the Christian that he has power with God. Jesus Christ gave the assurance to his disciples that not only himself loved them, but also the Father, and that whatever they asked of the Father in his name would be given them. The Savior well knew the necessities of his children and the opposition they must meet from opposing influences, he therefore bade them look unto God for wisdom. He understood, too, the great work that was assigned them in his vineyard, and the grace needful to sustain them in it. He knew the anxiety they would feel for sinners unreconciled to God, and gave them instruction that in all these matters they should make their requests to God, and assured them that God would hear and answer; and it is further said that the fervent effectual prayer of the righteous availeth much. We might repeat numerous promises given to Christians of God's willingness to hear and answer his children when they call upon him, but it is not needed, for every one knows that this truth is fully taught. But if Christians have power with God, how is it that so few of the blessings God is able and willing to give are received? Christians are in the habit of praying for their advancement in spirituality, for the triumph of the Church, and the conversion of sinners, with other requests; but after all are left to feel the weight of their own sins and see the Church remain insensible, and sinners grow hard in their sins. This is not because God is unwilling to bestow the things sought, but the cause exists with men. Prayers, in order to be prevailing, must be offered

1. With earnest desire for the thing asked. When this earnest desire is felt it will be accompanied with consistent efforts for the attainment of the object. If the Christian wishes to be more spiritual he will make use of the means for securing this. If he wishes the promotion of spirituality in the Church and the conversion of sinners, he will labor as best he may to promote the same, and through these consistent efforts God will doubtless bring about the object sought, and answer the prayer.

2. With strong assurance that God is willing to answer. Without such faith it is impossible to please God. To ask for things of God without feeling from the heart that he is willing to bestow them and will do it, is but little short of mocking him. When this strong assurance is felt, it will lead to a persevering effort that will not close till the answer is obtained. The example of the widow with the unjust judge is given for encouragement to Christians to pray and not to faint.

Possessing feelings like the above, the Christian may present his request to God for any thing that God can bestow consistent with his purposes revealed in the gospel, and the thing sought will be obtained. What encouragement is here! Heaven is open to the Christian with all its joys, and he is at full liberty to reach forth his hand and take to himself fulness of joy. Freedom from the condemning power of sin is offered. The purity and enlargement of the church are matters in which he has power, and the holy spirit in answer to his prayer, will be sent to accompany the invitation he may make to sinners to be reconciled to God.

Let the Christian be unceasing in his consistent earnest prayers for the conversion of sinners, and God's work will be accomplished in enlightening their minds, and induce them, unless they willfully oppose, to be reconciled to him and be saved.

DE RUYTER BAND.—It will be seen, by a notice in another column, that the Band of our village propose giving a Concert on the 24th inst. The Band have been to no small item of expense in purchasing Instruments, paying for Tuition, &c., &c., for the year past, and it is but a laudable effort, in prospect of meeting some of their vast expense, that they have adopted in giving a Concert. We trust those who have will manifest it by their patronage to the Band on this occasion.

THE MOTHERS' JOURNAL AND FAMILY VISITANT, Edited by Mrs. Eliza C. Allen. The first No. of Vol. 8, has come to our table. This Monthly has a deservedly high reputation. During the present vol., a series of articles on "Social Manners" is promised from the pen of a gentleman whose culture has been in the best circles, and who has mingled freely with society in all conditions, and who has traveled extensively in every quarter of the globe. The No. before us has several interesting articles. Indeed, they are all of this class. The following is a table of its contents:

- "How long have I lived," by JANE TAYLOR.
- "Annual Report of the Bowdoin Square Maternal Association, Boston."
- "Nursery Sketches" by Mrs. E. R. STEELE.
- "A Mother's grief and a Mother's consolation."
- "The Christmas Party," by Mrs. M. A. IRVING.

The work is not only designed to aid Mothers in their responsible duties, but is also well calculated to be of especial service to all the members of the Family.

We will thank the publishers to forward to our table the future numbers. Any of our subscribers wishing the Journal may obtain it by forwarding $1, post free, to Bennet, Backus, & Hawley, Utica, N. Y., Ira M. Allen, 350 Broome-st., New-York, John Putnam, 81 Cornhill, Boston, or Henry Platt, 441 Market-st., Philadelphia.

Dates of Popish Errors.

An article headed as above has been going the rounds of the papers, showing the time when many of the errors of Papacy had their origin. There is one important omission in the list which should stand first.—We will supply this in its proper place at the head of the list, and give the remainder as they stand. This will perhaps make it complete: if not, let others correct it further.

We publish this week a communication from Rev. W. B. DOWNER, setting forth some of his reasons for connecting himself with a S. D. B. Church. Br. Downer was formerly Pastor of the Baptist Church in Woodville, Jefferson co., N. Y. He is now acting as a Book Agent for the American Tract Society.

About that "Grammar."

The Editor of the Western (Zanesville, O.) Recorder, has given us a lesson on "Grammatical inaccuracy!" We may now expect "a right smart chance" of edification in the "lots and slathers" of instruction that will be dealt out to the "powerful ignorance" of "unthoughted minds."—There will be a "power" of good in it "we reckon."

A number of articles designed for this week's paper are omitted for want of room.

DEAR BR. BAILEY—Perhaps some of my numerous friends may wish to [illegible] the reasons that have induced me to connect myself with a S. D. Baptist Church. You will oblige me, therefore, by giving this a place in your paper.

My first serious doubts, as to the propriety of Sunday-keeping, instead of the observance of the divinely appointed Sabbath, were excited while visiting this place several years since, on a first day of the week, in company with a beloved brother, since deceased. On our way to the Baptist meeting we saw, what was truly a novel sight to me, numbers busily employed on their farms, and buildings, on the day I had hitherto been taught to regard as the day of rest. This naturally led to inquiry on my part, and I soon ascertained that these were "Sabbatarians," a sort of people who believe God means just as he says, and consequently, when he commands them to observe the seventh day as the Sabbath of the Lord their God; they cannot be made to understand that they comply with the divine requisition by keeping the first day of the week.

The information thus obtained, led to an earnest desire to know the truth on this important subject, for, as such, I could but regard it; but at that time no facilities offered for such an examination into the matter, as I wished.

For a time, therefore, the inquiry was dropped, but was revived some time after, during my residence in Jefferson Co., by my being brought into contact with Seventh day friends. During the excitement in Adams, growing out of the sermons of Rev. Mr. Mattison and Eld. E. S. Bailey, I read both discourses, and was constrained to admit that the Bible was on the side of the Sabbath of the fourth commandment.

But still, I could not give up the observance of a day which from long usage, had become invested with a peculiar sanctity in my eyes, nor could I easily persuade myself that it were possible to transfer my regard to any other day of the week, no matter how divine its claims.

My mind was somewhat in this state when I came to reside in this place last Fall.—Soon, however, I found my conscience at work, and my doubts and difficulties returning anew, and like a flood rushing to overwhelm me. Hereupon, I resolved to avail myself of all possible facilities for a thorough examination of the whole subject.

I perused various authors on both sides of the question, and found them to agree on the institution and perpetuity of the Sabbath—differing only in respect to a change in the day. I read the arguments adduced in favor of a change, with my prejudices all on that side; until, after a most careful examination, I was constrained to conclude that there was no valid scripture evidence in favor of such change from the seventh to the first day of the week. Indeed, I have been amused to see Baptist writers, of undoubted wisdom, presenting arguments in favor of a change of the Sabbath, which would have justly merited and received their contempt, if offered in support of infant sprinkling. Pedo-Baptists, no doubt, can find a warrant for 'Baby Sprinkling' on the very next page to the one on which the Baptists obtain a "Thus saith the Lord," for the change of the Sabbath.

Having thus conscientiously come to the above conclusion, the path of duty seemed plain; and accordingly I have connected myself with the Seventh-day Baptists. But still, I love the Baptists. I can truly say,

"There my best friends, my kindred dwell,
"There God, my Savior reigns."

I shall ever delight to co-operate with them, to the extent of my feeble ability, to promote the kingdom of Christ; and humbly do I hope to share a long eternity with thousands of my dear Baptist brethren, in the rest that remaineth to all the people of God.

Fraternally, yours,
WM. B. DOWNER.

BROTHER BAILEY—Our Quarterly Meeting commenced on the 6th day before the second Sabbath of the present month with the 3d Genesee Church, and it was under quite discouraging circumstances that the meeting commenced, as the church were laboring under serious difficulties among its members, and darkness seemed to pervade every corner. The laborers being very few, they began to feel sensibly their need of divine aid; therefore bowing before the Lord laying hold with the arm of Faith upon the promises of our Redeemer. We believe that he lent a listening ear to our broken breathings. And when the hour arrived that the meeting was to have broken up, the indications of the outpouring of God's Spirit were so evident that we thought it best to protract the meeting another evening.—The Lord met with us, and it truly was a time of mourning in consequence of our unlikeness to the Savior. Numbers of backsliders, with the unregenerate were crowding their way to the anxious seat, desiring that the saints would bear their case up in prayer before God. The anxiety manifested was such that the meeting was protracted from evening to evening for about two weeks. Br. H. P. Greene and myself, with the occasional labors of brethren Z. Campbell and J. Brown, laboring from house to house, day by day. The Lord truly is good, merciful and kind. The church were generally willing to come up and put on the beautiful garment. Backsliders were reclaimed, and sinners were born into the kingdom of Christ. The second Sabbath after the meeting commenced, five persons, upon the profession of their faith, went down into the liquid stream and were buried with Christ in Baptism, four of them uniting with the church, and the work is still progressing. Next Sabbath two others went forward in the ordinance of Baptism, and became members of the church. Others are still enquiring the way to Zion. Brethren, pray for us.

Upon returning home, I found that a meeting of evenings had commenced in our place, and strong indications of a revival of religion were discovered. The meeting has now continued evenings for three weeks, and the Lord has truly revived his work—and some twenty persons or more, as we hope and humbly trust, have been redeemed from the thraldom of sin.

Also, in the village of Bolivar, (two miles from us.) meetings have been held about the same length of time, and from thirty to forty souls have come to the knowledge of the Savior. The two last meetings mentioned are still in progress.

Also, in the village of Friendship, (some 10 miles from us.) meetings have been held for some five weeks in succession, day and evening, which has resulted in the conversion of between 50 and 100 souls. Truly, the Lord has done great things for us in the county of Allegany, whereof we are glad.

Yours, in christian bonds,

LATEST FROM NEW YORK—NEWS FROM CHINA AND INDIA.

By the packet ship Iowa, Capt. Lines, from Havre, we have received Paris papers to the 7th ultimo, and by the packet ship Rochester, Capt. Woodhouse, from Liverpool, we have London papers to the 5th ultimo. The latter are two days later than before received, and contain further accounts from India and China, fully corroborating the intelligence from that quarter brought us by the last steamship. There seems still some uncertainty about the ratification of the Treaty dictated to China by the English forces. Some speak of it as positively ratified by the Emperor; others, that a messenger had returned from Pekin and that the Emperor had expressed his full acquiescence to the terms of the treaty:—

The Queen of England had returned from Walmer Castle to Windsor.

London, Dec. 5.

The news received from China by express through Paris, and published in a second edition of the Times, came too late in the city to have any effect upon the stock markets, though it is viewed as favorable.

Intelligence from Bombay to the 1st of November, entirely confirms not only the glorious news brought by the late intermediate mail, but that published in our second edition of Saturday.

The proceedings of the British armies in the neighborhood of Cabul have been eminently successful. The whole of the British prisoners have been liberated from the hands of the Affghans. Their number was 109 persons, who had suffered the horrors of captivity from the 10th of January to the 21st and 27th of Sept. The meeting between the veteran Gen. Sale and his wife and daughter is described as highly affecting.

On the arrival of Gen. Nott's division at Cabul, the resolution adopted by the British Government to destroy all the Affghan strong holds was carried into execution. An expeditionary corps of about 4,000 men was sent to demolish the strong forts of Istalif and Chareekar.

On the 29th of Sept., Gen. McCaskill and Brigadiers Tulloch and Stacy, who commanded this force, were met by a strong body of Affghans, led on by Ameen Oola and 16 of their most determined Chiefs, who sought to defend Istalif. This town consisted of masses of houses built on the slope of a mountain, in the rear of which were lofty eminences shutting in a defile leading to Turkistan. The number of its inhabitants exceeded 15,000, who from their defenses and the difficulties of approach, considered their position unassailable. The greater part of the plunder seized last January from the British was placed there, and the Chiefs kept their wives and families in it, and many also of those who had escaped from Cabul had sought refuge there.

The British troops soon made themselves masters of the town, driving the enemy before them with considerable slaughter.—Two brass field pieces were taken. The loss to the victors consisted in one officer (Lieut. Evans of Her Majesty's 41st Regiment) killed, and four wounded. The demolition of the forts was immediately begun. The expedition, after the destruction of Chareekar, was expected to return immediately to Cabul.

The notorious Akhbar Khan was a wanderer in Kohistan.

One of the duties performed by the British was the interment of the skeletons of those who had fallen during the fatal retreat of January last. The number did not exceed 400 or 500. Several of these melancholy remains were recognizable. It is further stated that very many of the native soldiers and of the Hindoos who had accompanied the troops during the final retreat, have come into the British cantonments.

Correspondence of the Journ. of Com.

WASHINGTON, Wednesday, Jan. 4.

The bill providing for the military occupation of the Oregon territory, the settlement of the same, and the extension of the United States over it, passed the Senate. It is certainly the beginning of a very important movement. If there should be any doubt as to our title to the territory, this bill will go far to remove it. At all events, the country will soon be settled by citizens of the United States in overpowering numbers, under the protection and inducements afforded by this act. There is no doubt, I think, that it will pass the House.

Several petitions on the subject of the warehouse system were presented to-day, and referred to the Committee of Commerce.

Mr. Rives laid on the table a resolution calling for any correspondence between Mr. Everett and the British Government in relation to the burning of the Caroline.

The House makes no progress in repealing the bankrupt act. There seems to be no disposition to take the question this week.

In the House of Representatives to-day,

Support of the Army.—Mr. Fillmore from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the support of the army and the military academy, and the several armories and arsenals for the half calendar year, ending the 30th June, 1843, and for the fiscal year, beginning on the 1st July, 1843, and ending on the 30th June 1844; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Oregon—Military Posts.—Mr. Pendleton, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill authorizing the President of United States to establish two additional military posts; one at some suitable point on the Missouri river, west of the meridian of Council Bluffs, or at some point in the most practicable line of communication between the United States and the Pacific ocean, at or near the mouth of the Columbia river; and the other established at the mouth of Columbia river, and appropriating $200,000 for the purpose.

The bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, and five thousand copies of the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Fine Imposed on Gen. Jackson.—The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Bowne, instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to report on Thursday a bill to refund, with interest, the fine imposed upon Gen. Jackson in 1815, was taken up and discussed during the morning hour. A motion was made to lay the bill on the table, but it did not prevail. Yeas 91, nays 107.

The bill to repeal the bankrupt law was announced as the order of the day.

Mr. Bowne of New York, deprecated the epithets of traitor, wretch, etc. which had been applied to the President, and said that he would give to all measures of the administration, which, in his opinion, were democratic, his earnest support. It had been said by some of his friends that they would not accept of public office, and yet, in the same breath they asserted that they could not countenance the retention of such men as Webster and Spencer in the cabinet. Now, if these gentlemen were dismissed, who would fill their place, since the Democrats had said that they would not hold office under the administration? For his part, he was willing to receive Webster into the ranks of the Democratic party, if the Secretary would show to the world that he had renounced his political sins and was at heart a Democrat.

He had himself been brought up a Federalist; but when he was twenty-four years of age, he began to examine for himself, and he changed his creed, and joined the party to which he was now attached. And if the test had been applied, and insisted upon, a large number who now held seats on this floor would not have been elected by the people. He was willing to keep open the door, and receive Mr. Webster, or any others, as they had received thousands heretofore on their renunciation of Federalism. In the course of his remarks, he appealed to the gentlemen to dispose of the subject before them without further delay, so that they might transact the public business, and as one third of the session had already elapsed.

Mr. Meriwether declared against the repeal, and said that the gentleman from New York no doubt had been a Federalist, for he was now prominent among his friends, and it was an old adage, that converts to a new cause were always the most zealous. And the gentleman illustrated the truth of the couplet—

"While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return."

He then read extracts from newspapers, to show that defection existed in the Democratic party, and he broadly asserted, judging from the remarks of the gentleman from New York, and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Weller,) they would have no objections to enlist and fight under the Tyler banner. He asked Mr. Cushing whether he expected the Whigs or Democrats to bid when he (Mr. Cushing) put up the administration at auction several days ago.

Mr. Cushing challenged the gentleman to point his finger to any sentence or expression in his speech, which warranted the imputation.

Mr. Meriwether said that it was evident throughout the speech.

Mr. Cushing asked the gentleman to put his finger on a sentence which justified the imputation that he had put up the administration at auction, or which the gentleman could declare unjust in principle or untrue in fact.

Mr. Meriwether repeated that the speech clearly proved the inference. And he continued and concluded his remarks.

Mr. Proffit urged the repeal of the law, on the ground that it passed both Houses by the votes of a minority, and its abrogation was demanded by the public will.

Mr. Gordon of New York obtained the floor, and the House adjourned.

News of the Day.

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF POSTAGE AND ITS COMPUTATION IN FEDERAL MONEY.

Special Report of the Post-Master General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, }
Jan. 5, 1843. }

Hon. Wm. P. Mangum, President of the Senate of the U. S.:

SIR,—The Senate of the United States, by resolution of the 27th of July last resolved that "the Post Master General be directed to communicate to the Senate, at the commencement of the next session, an estimate showing what reduction of the number of miles on which postages are now charged, in the several cases designated by law, would be necessary to introduce the Federal coinage, so as not to diminish the aggregate revenue of the Post-Office Department."

I find it difficult, if not impossible, to comply with this resolution, if regard be had to its literal import.

A reduction of distance in the different classes of the rate of postage, so as to introduce the "Federal coinage," and at the same time preserve the present aggregate revenue, could not be well accomplished without a very considerable increase of postage upon some of these classes, covered by the reduction of distance.

I have, therefore, assumed that the Senate meant by this resolution to require an estimate, &c., showing what change of the distances and rates of postage would be made, so as to introduce the coin of the Federal Government, and at the same time preserve the present aggregate average revenue without, in any considerable degree, increasing the postage upon the present given lines.

In obedience to the resolution, thus understood, I have the honor to make this report.

For the sake of easy reference, I submit a table exhibiting the present rates of postage and the distance, and probable number of letters, and amount received upon each class of letters, compiled from data furnished by this Department in 1836.

The law of 1825 imposes the following rates of letter postage:

Upon single letters sent through mail, any distance not over 30 miles,	6 cents.
Over 30 to 80,	10 "
Over 80 to 150,	12 1-2
Over 150 to 400,	18 3-4
Over 400,	25 cents.

Of the first class it is estimated 5,328,600 letters are sent through the mail, producing	$319,716
Of the 3d class at 12 1-2 cents, 5,328,600, producing	666,075
Of the 4th class at 18 3-4 cts., 3,992,869, producing,	748,663
Of the 5th class at 25 cents, 1,865,008, producing,	466,252
Total letters 24,567,904 producing,	$3,000,000

It may not be out of place here to observe, lest a conclusion not altogether correct be drawn from the fact that the highest rates of postage produce the smallest aggregate amount of revenue, that the two great commercial points of the Union approach each other within the range of the two distances of 80 or 150 miles.

In lieu of the distances and rates of postage fixed by the act of 1825, in order to accomplish the views of the Senate, as understood to be expressed in the resolution above, it is proposed that the following scale of distances and rates of postage be adopted, viz:

Upon all single letters sent by mail any distance not over 30 miles,	5 cents.
Over 30 to 100 miles,	10 "
Over 100 to 220 miles,	15 "
Over 220 to 400 miles,	20 "
Over 400 miles,	25 "

Assuming the data given in the first table as correct, or as approximating to correctness, the probable receipts of each class of letter postage, if the above scale be adopted, may be estimated as follows:

	No. letters	Income.
On the class under 30 miles at 5 cts.	5,328,600	$266,430 00
Over 30 to 100 miles, at 10 cts.	9,515,390	951,539 00
Over 100 to 220 miles, at 15 cts.	4,924,111	738,616 65
Over 220 to 400 miles, at 20 cts.	2,874,885	574,977 00
Over 400 miles, at 25 cts.	1,865,006	466,252 00
Total,		$2,997,814 65

This calculation exhibits a probable loss of aggregate letter postage of 2,185 35.

A too confident reliance, however, upon the accuracy of the result produced by this calculation should not be entertained.—Without an increase of correspondence and mail matter between the points embraced within the range of distance upon which a reduction of postage from 12 1-2 to 10 cents, and from 18 3-4 to 15 cents takes place, the aggregate amount of revenue will sustain a greater loss than $2,185 35.—In some degree to guard against this probable reduction of revenue by the change of distances and rates of postage, I would recommend that the lowest rates of letter postage be imposed upon what are denominated 'drop letters," where the postage is not pre-paid. This is a class of letters which are usually sent from one place to another by private conveyance, and are 'dropped' or deposited in the post-office for delivery. Beside the intrinsic justice of imposing upon such letters postage, would tend to lessen the temptation to seek for channels of private conveyance over mail lines, to avoid the payment of postage. It is not proposed to prohibit, as is done in most of the European governments, the sending by private conveyance a letter; but if a letter so sent, shall be deposited by the bearer in a post office, to be delivered, then to charge it with postage.

It would be difficult to estimate the amount which would be derived from this new class of letter postage, but it is the opinion of some intelligent post masters that not less than $50,000 would thereby be added to the revenue.

Under the hope that Congress will at its present session, by proper legislation, protect the Department against innovations upon its rights and consequent loss of revenue, I respectfully recommend the adoption of the distances and rates of postage above, in lieu of the present.

If Congress will relieve the Department from the amount now paid annually for rail road transportation, by a permanent arrangement with the great leading lines of intercommunication, and also regulate the franking privilege and restrain it within proper limits, then I am prepared to meet the demands of public sentiment, and recommend a further reduction of letter postage to ten cents upon all letters over thirty miles.

The inquiry, what effect such a reduction would have upon the revenue of the Department, appropriately suggests itself.

The answer to be given involves several considerations.

In the first place, the Department should be relieved in its expenditures of the sum now nearly equal to half a million per annum, and which is liable to be increased at each period for the renewal of contracts for rail road transportation. Deduct this sum from $1,235,952, the current expenditure of 1842, and it leaves 3,802,484 as the probable future expenditure, upon the present basis of service. Upon the hypothesis that the letter correspondence through the mail shall, under this reduced rate of postage, increase at the rate of 20 per cent only, upon the letters sent through the mail in 1836—the revenue from letter postage may be estimated at $2,621,243 28. To which is to be added the amount to be received from newspaper postage, $572,228, and the amount from fines and forfeiture, $766. This will give a gross revenue of $3,194,237.

It must be admitted that this reduction of postage will be followed by a considerable increase of mail matters. The rate of increase is matter of opinion and speculation. I confess that I do not allow myself to hope for a greater increase than 20 per cent. for years to come, though others, whose opinions are entitled to respectful consideration, estimate a greater increase varying from twenty to fifty per cent.

Assuming the increase of mail matter to be 20 per cent., consequent upon the proposed reduction, the amount of gross estimated revenue will be as above,

	$3,194,237
Annual amount of expenditure for 1842, exclusive of $432,588 paid to Railroads,	3,802,484

This $3,802,484, may therefore be assumed as the average amount of future expenditure.

It will be seen that, by calculating the revenue upon the amount of mail matter in 1836, and the future expenditure by that of 1842, the proposed reduction of postage would cause a reduction of revenue of over half a million of dollars below the expenditures of the Department.

If, however, the increase of mail matter shall be equal to forty per cent. upon the basis of 1836, as some confidently believe, this would give a further sum of $436,873 38. To which amount may be added $50,000, the probable income from the proposed postage on drop letters.

In the foregoing estimate of income and expenditure, I have adopted the amount of mail matter of 1836, and the amount of expenditure for 1842. There has been account taken of the number of letters which passed through the mail during the last year. An estimate of the number may be made by the amount of letter postage received during the year 1842. That amount was $3,953,319 34. To produce this sum would require 32,295,972 letters charged with postage, to have been delivered thro' the mail.

A calculation of revenue based on this number of letters, upon the supposed reduction of postage and the probable increase of mail matter, will be more likely to give the revenue to be received, than upon the number of letters delivered through the mail in 1836.

Postage on 7,021,900 letters under 30 miles, at a rate of 5 cents on a single letter,	$351,095 00
On 25,274,072 letters at 10 cents,	2,527,407 20
Add 20 per cent. for probable increase or ten cent letters,	505,481 55
From newspapers,	572,228 00
From fines and forfeitures	766 00
Total aggregate of rev.	$3,956,977 75
Average future expenditure, exclusive of Rail-road transportation,	3,802,484 00

The rate of reduction here proposed is not equal to the ratio of reduction recently made in England, and consequently the ratio of increase of mail matter will not be so great as in England.

There is an additional reason why it will not be in the same ratio of increase, and that is the power which is exerted in England to force the entire correspondence of the kingdom through the Post Office.

The reduction here proposed, and any other, should be proceeded by specific legislation, whereby the Department is to be relieved from the amount paid for rail road transportation. Secondly, by a total repeal of the franking privilege, or a strict confinement of it to official business, and an ample protection against inroads upon the revenue by private expresses, and other modes of evading the payment of legal postage. Respectfully yours, &c.

C. A. WICKLIFFE.

Important from Mexico—Another Revolution—Occupancy of Monterey by the U. S. Squadron.

By the arrival of the bark Annahuac from Vera Cruz, dates to Dec. 19th are received. A letter dated Vera Cruz, Dec. 19th, (in the Union,) says:

News from the city of Mexico received to-day is very interesting and important.—Gen. Gustarrey of the department of San Luis had declared the dissolution of Congress, and announced the convocation of a new one by Santa Anna to form a constitution for the Republic. Gen. Caniligo, of Puebla, has made the same declaration for his department. These movements created a great sensation. The news reached Mexico by express, and was committed to Gen. Tornel, the Minister of War who immediately made it known to Congress.—That body at once took a dignified stand, and replied that they would not listen to threats from any military chieftain, and would continue to sit till driven from the hall by force of arms. This is purely a military movement which has been in embryo for some time.

News has arrived here, from the west, of the occupancy of Monterry, a town in California, by Commodore T. Ap Catesby Jones of the U. S. frigate Potomac and Corvette Cyane. He held the town about two days and then gave it up, declaring that he took the town in consequence of a report that war was declared by the United States against Mexico.

The Mexican general in command gave information of a body of 3000 Texians marching towards Rio Grande. Campeachy still holds out against the government of Mexico. The garrison of Vera Cruz was momentarily expected to declare in favor of the resolution against Congress.

Mr W. E. Dryden with seven other Americans who had been confined nearly twelve months in Chihuahua have been liberated by the Mexican government, through the interposition of the United States minister.—N. Y. Express.

The Hon. John Mattocks, Representative in Congress from the Fifth Congressional District of Vt., (by the new division the Fourth,) has published a letter in the Vermont Watchman, to his constituents, declining to be a candidate at the next election. In closing his letter, Mr. Mattocks says: "Finally, may the all-wise Being, who controls the destiny of nations, protect and perpetuate our free institutions: and may the God of Heaven hasten the time when Slavery shall exist only in the infernal regions, where it originated, and where it is inflicted for crime, and not for color."

The Largest Hog and the Coldest Weather.—The Bangor Democrat says a hog was killed in that city last Saturday, 21 months old, which weighed, when dressed, 823 pounds—jointly owned by George Wellington and James Smith.

We learn also from the same paper, that the thermometer stood at twenty degrees below zero in that city, at sunrise on Monday morning.

Chinese Silver.—Lord Jocelyn remarks, "When the dollar first comes into the possession of a Chinese, he gives it a stamp or chop, thus extracting a small portion of the metal; receiving the same usage from each hand it passes through, it is reduced from its coinage value to that of merely its weight. The possessor of this clipped money, finding the bulk inconvenient, melts it down into the form of sycee silver, a species more easy to stow than if it was in the former coin, in which one thousand drilled dollars might not exceed the value of two hundred. The sycee silver is more valuable than any other, on account of its containing portions of gold dust. It is generally in the form of a canoe, with a stamp in the centre."

There were 86 fires in Boston last year, which destroyed property to the amount of $107,694.

Croton Aqueduct.—The Board having charge of this great work have, in obedience to to the call of the Common Council, made a very full report, as to the ways and means for paying the large debt.—They state that the whole expense, including two hundred thousand dollars to be expended to lay pipes, and half a million to bring the Aqueduct across the Harlem River, will be about twelve and a half millions of dollars. Twelve millions have been raised by the issue of the public stocks.

By provision of law they state that certain specific revenues arising from Markets, Quit Rents, and other items, with certain Real Estate, and the Revenue to be derived from the Croton Water, were set apart for the redemption of the debt.—These funds have been appropriated to the purchase of the city stock, and no portion is to be applied to the payment of the interest on the city debt.

The Board then recommended that every effort should be made to increase this sinking fund. Among the resources of the city, they set forth, is a large Real Estate, productive and non-productive; and a sale of superfluous property, they say, would simplify the business, lessen the offices, and save the Treasury from fraud.

Another valuable property, they add, are the wharves and slips, which in sixteen years have cost 1,121,472 dollars, and from the same period have yielded 1,050,175 dollars, the sale of which property, it is believed, would yield a million of dollars.

An increased wharfage might be laid upon goods, they remark, which they believe, however, would be injurious to trade. But they recommend the sale of all the city lots between twenty-third and forty second streets, the value of which is estimated at a little short of a million of dollars.

The interest on the Water debt is 665,000 dollars per annum, which must be paid by tax. The taxable property assessed this year is 176 millions real estate, and 61 millions personal—on which a tax of 28 cents on the hundred dollars is required. The estimate for making the work was $5,512,236 72; the actual expense however is twelve and a half millions.

The Board are opposed to compelling every house to take the water, as that would in their opinion be a burden on the poor, which ought not to be laid.

If the applications for water continue in the same ratio as they have been made up to the first of May next, the rents for the full year would be $72,000. The receipts for the year to 1843 are estimated at $150,000. The receipts beyond five or six years are estimated at four thousand dollars.—But none of these receipts can by law be applied to the payment of interest, as they must go to pay the debt.

The Board then set forth the propositions that have been made to meet the debt, thus:

In the Board of Assistant Aldermen it is proposed to levy an annual tax of three per cent. on the rents of all the buildings in the city; valuing those rents at $9,750,000, on which three per cent on all the personal property in the city—valuing it at 65,000,000 dollars—on which the one half of one per cent is $325,000.

In the Board of Aldermen it is proposed that the inhabitants of the city be permitted, at their own expense, to take the water into their dwellings, stores, and warehouses, free of charge; but that a Water Tax of one fourth of one per cent be levied "on all goods, wares, and merchandize, sold within this city; also, on commissions arising from the negotiation and sale of all foreign exchange; also, on the cost of erection of all houses, and the building of ships or vessels; also, on all manufacturing and mechanical productions; also, on the salaries, fees, or perquisites of all professions, when the same shall amount to seven hundred dollars."—N. Y. Express.

Curious Monuments of Slavery.—Out of twenty-six Weslyan chapels in Sierra Leone, the roof timbers, the flooring, and other wood work, of twenty, are composed nearly exclusively of slave-ships, which have been taken by her Majesty's men-of war on the coast, and condemned by the Mixed commission court.—Sierra Leone Watchman.

No Hoax.

THE SUBSCRIBER would respectfully inform the public generally, that he is manufacturing Cabinet Ware of all descriptions, wanted by the inhabitants in this section of the country, although he cannot boast of his great EXPERIENCE, he having carried on the business only 10 years; yet in that time he has learned that basswood, does not make as good and durable posts and draw fronts for Bureaus, as well seasoned cherry does; although there is in this section, pine and basswood in abundance, thrown together something in the shape of a Bureau, but it is not, and cannot be done in his shop, nor under his superintendence. The Subscriber intends that all Cabinet Wares sold by him, shall be made in a good workmanlike manner, and of thoroughly seasoned lumber, and will be sold on as good terms, as can be had at any well established shop in this, or any of the neighboring villages. His shop is in the east corner of LaFayette block, No. 3, Cortland street.

Ready Made Coffins.

THE SUBSCRIBER having long regretted the too high charges made for COFFINS and funeral services in this place, and at the request of many citizens, has made, and will keep on hand, a full assortment of Coffins, from the largest to the smallest size.

A HEARSE WILL BE IN READINESS

at all times, and he pledges himself that his charges shall be as low as in any of the neighboring villages.

THE Natural, Intellectual and Moral Sciences, are taught by the different Instructors, as best suits the circumstances accompanying the formation of classes, except those mentioned above, which are always taught by the same Teacher.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the [illegible] of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and travelling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, [illegible] and expense. The principal advantage [illegible] derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inkstand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents.—Consequently a medal was awarded by the Institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

POETRY.

For the Register.

God's Sovereignty.

To me, it is a precious thought,
And with instruction richly fraught,
That God rules over all;
He reigns on high, and has control
O'er land and sea, from pole to pole,
Of this terrestrial ball.

He reigns above—let us adore,
His power extends from shore to shore,
O'er all created things;
He bears o'er all a righteous sway,
And shows to us in varied way,
That He's the King of kings.

His faithful subjects He will bless—
In truth, and love, and righteousness,
Before Him, they shall stand;
While all those unbelieving souls,
Whom Satan, now, with ease controls,
Shall perish from the land.

Then let us all in pious fear,
Adore the Lord with hearts sincere,
With joy and free-good-will,
So when we lay our armor down,
We shall receive a starry crown,
From God on Zion's hill.

Be this our prayer, our hope, our joy,
To find in Heaven, a blest employ,
Throughout eternal days;
Then shall our great reward be this,
In Heaven to gain unfading bliss,
And sing our Savior's praise.

Miscellaneous Department.

NINE PLAUSIBLE REASONS FOR SUBSCRIBING FOR THE CULTIVATOR.

Messrs. Gaylord & Tucker—My destiny is to labor—to cultivate the soil—to obtain my "bread by the sweat of my brow"—Father Adam like—an honorable avocation. My hand is callous by the habitual and daily use of the implements of the farm, and more accustomed to wield the plow than the pen, which may account for all deficiencies in my communications.

But, notwithstanding all this, permit me to adduce a few reasons, which have been conceived while following the plow, or other ways engaged, why farmers should subscribe for the Cultivator.

1. Every farmer should subscribe for the Cultivator, and read it; because a vast deal of manual labor is unnecessarily expended, and completely lost; and a great extent of soil remains in an uncultivated condition, year after year; and benefits no one a farthing, merely for the want of the information, which an agricultural journal so abundantly imparts.

2. Men of the most occupations through necessity, require reading adapted to their pursuits.

The moralist must have his Advocate—the divine his religious periodicals, in order to keep up with the spirit of the times; and to learn the condition and changes in community; and the progress of the moral and religious world.

The polition, the lawyer and physician, must read extensively; and devote much time to matters relating to their occupations, or they make little or no proficiency in their professions.

And shall not the cultivator of the soil, to whom the votaries of pleasure, and the whole professional class look for support, avail himself of the information, adapted to his pursuit, which he so greatly needs.

Now the Cultivator will furnish him with abundance of the necessary information, both theoretical and practical; and the result of experience clearly demonstrates that if he would be the most successful cultivator of the soil, and a connoisseur in agriculture, he should combine his experimental knowledge with what he reads;—and theory and practice should go hand in hand.

3. The stock of most farmers is improvable; and as it should be the aim of every one, to improve his stock of all kinds, and at the least possible expense to make it the most profitable, he can find in the Cultivator portraits of various animals, which in competition stand unrivaled; and all the requisite knowledge to guide him in matters relative to the treatment of cattle; and particularly to sheep husbandry.

He will find, also, in the veterinary department, prescriptions for the treatment and removal of most of the diseases, to which animals are subject.

4. There may be (as has been the case,) information in the Cultivator which may be the means of improving the condition of the farms of many—of improving their stock—of saving the lives of many neat cattle, and thereby enriching the pockets of the owners many hundreds of dollars.

To corroborate this assertion, I would refer to the testimony of Mr. Woodward, Cultivator, p. 68, who, speaking of agricultural journals, says, "could I have had the Cultivator, with the present light on the subject of farming, when I first commenced (eighteen years since,) I think it would have been more than $1,000 benefit to me.

Also, to the testimony of that enthusiastic and devoted friend of agriculture, COMMENTATOR, who, speaking of the value of your paper, says, "your two statistical tables, alone would be a bargain at $2,00, could they not be obtained elsewhere."

Also, a writer in a back volume says, "your last number saved me ten dollars." And another, "I consider each number worth a fat cow."

Need we more than this? Does any one question such testimony? The opinion of such gentlemen as I have quoted, with me, ranks exceedingly high—I can rest assured that they speak the unexaggerated truth.

5. The proper value of the various manures of the farm are not duly appreciated by the majority of farmers, because a correct application is not understood; and thus, much of the good effect, which it should produce, is lost in toto.

Now, much light is reflected through the medium of the Cultivator on the great subject of manures—much may be learned in regard to the manufacture of compost, &c., which is, in a great measure, the grand means of keeping the soil in its greatest state of productiveness.

6. From the earliest history of agriculture, until the present time, the implement most to be relied upon in tillage, because of its efficiency and almost universal application, is the common plow; and in the Cultivator may be seen cuts and descriptions of this, and other implements of great utility, such as the harrow, drill-barrow, cultivator, &c. of which all may avail themselves, in the greatest degree of perfection.

7. The Cultivator, wherever it circulates is an agricultural lecturer; and by whomsoever it is perused, it scarcely fails to exert, in some degree, a beneficial influence on them; and where its precepts are practiced, and strenuously adhered to, the most unobserving mind would quickly remark the decided change that has been produced.

8. Each volume of the Cultivator is worth double the annual subscription to bind, and to place in an agricultural library, as a volume to which reference may be made, in relation to the various sorts of husbandry; and in fact, to every thing appertaining to the affairs of the farm.

It embodies a grand mass of facts, which in most cases, are the result of long experience—it contains the improvements, which have been, and are now being made, in the cultivation of the soil; and, also, many in the mechanical department. It embodies the experience of many of the most scientific agriculturalists of America—which alone could not fail to render it valuable, useful and instructive to most classes of community.

It is not a publication of dignified pretensions, merely; but one of unadorned verity—of extraordinary intrinsic merit, which furnishes a rich supply of food, alike to the illiterate and to the man of science.

The plain and unaffected style of expression, in which the subjects are handled so meritoriously in the editorial department is such that both old and young readily comprehend the idea, which the author would convey.

9. Modern agriculturalists are annually making new improvements in the living science of agriculture; and men of science are continually enlisting in this noble work; and are bringing along with them boundless stores of useful knowledge; and by the light of science, are putting to flight those spurious and traditionary principles of antiquity, to which our ancestors adhered with such death-like grasp; and which were such insurmountable barriers to the improvements in agriculture; and they are evincing to the world, on principles strictly scientific, how barren soils, and those, which, by an injudicious system of management have become completely impoverished, may be resuscitated and restored to their native fertility; and they are publishing the result of their research and investigation, to the world, through the medium of agricultural journals. And now, if the farmer neglects to avail himself of the information, which his imperious necessities demand—if he will not awake from his stupor and arouse to a sense of his condition, from this chilling apathy of indifference and unmindfulness of the changes, which are transpiring around him, and engage heart and hand in promoting the great cause of agriculture, as the march is rapidly onward, he must content himself to sit down in ignoble ease and live unknown and die unmourned—to be a "cat's-paw" of artful speculators—a "hewer of wood and drawer of water."

These Messrs. Editors, are a few general reasons why every farmer should subscribe for the Cultivator; and I might easily double this number. But I trust, that these only will be sufficient to convince any reflecting person of the great advantage there is to be derived from, and the great need there is in the farmer's subscribing for the Cultivator, or some other agricultural work.

They will, also, deter any one from discontinuing their subscription, it is hoped, at the end of the current volume; and be an inducement for those, who are not subscribers, to transmit their names without delay. And in conclusion, let me request every subscriber to use his influence, when it is possible, to obtain one new subscriber, for by so doing, he will contribute very materially, towards promoting the great business of cultivating the soil; and through agricultural journals, in a great measure this noble work is to be accomplished. Truly yours, S. E. TODD.

Lansing, Tompkins Co. N. Y.

RUSSIA AND THE RUSSIANS.

The Czar in the Streets.—"Natives of the West, as well as orientals, are surprised to see how so much greatness, power, and majesty, can submit to be drawn along the streets in a simple sledge by a single horse. On his journeys in the interior of the empire, the sovereign is frequently seen in a common, rudely made telega, such as is used by the serfs; and one can scarcely conceive how it happens that he is not afraid to diminish his consequence in the eyes of the people, when thus exhibiting himself divested of all signs of grandeur. One is the more puzzled to account for this, because, at other times, the Court of Russia displays a splendor and magnificence not surpassed by any.—It is not merely a custom peculiar to the present Emperor, but it is common to the sovereigns of Russia in general. Peter the Great followed it; so did Paul; and the plain appearance of Alexander [illegible] astonished even the English, who received from the mightiest sovereign in the world lessons of unnecessary splendor. I am convinced that the pettiest prince in Germany would make some scruple, if he were asked to step into a small, low droschka, such as the Emperor of all the Russians is seen in every day.

Ceremony of Choosing Wives.—"The most brilliant day in the year for the Summer Garden is Whit-Monday. On that day the Russian tradesmen assemble there, for the famous ceremony of choosing wives. This is a spectacle so unique in its kind, that it would have been well worth the while of the Englisman, to whom I had elsewhere alluded, to make a journey expressly to see that also. According to an acient Petersburgh, and a still more ancient Russian custom, which reminds one of the markets for young women in Hungary, all the tradesmen's grown up sons and daughters meet here on that day, the former to gaze, and the latter to be gazed at. The girls, pranked out in their finest clothes, are drawn up in a row along the parterres. Their mothers are stationed behind them. They have rummaged their own and their grandmother's wardrobes for everything showy and brilliant, to bedizzen their daughters, attaching it to hair, ears and arms, round neck and waist, to fingers and feet, wherever there is a possibility of fastening it; and many are, in fact, so covered with gold and jewels, that little, if anything, of their natural charms, is visible. It is related that on one occasion a mother, not knowing what more to add to the decoration of her daughter, fastened six dozen gilt teaspoons to a gold chain, and hung them in a double row about her neck, in addition to the pearl necklaces, and that she surrounded her waist in like manner with three dozen tablespoons and two large punch laddles, placed crosswise before and behind.

"The young men, with their fathers, in long kaftans of fine cloth, and their beards smartly curled, walk along the file of blushing, silent damsels, who, at the same time, are desirous enough to please; and Cupid, who is sure to attend, points out to them the children of the Graces, but is prudent enough, before he speeds his arrow, to ascertain the genuineness of the gold and precious stones. The young men, and the mothers and fathers, here and there try to get up a conversation, in the course of which glances and sentiments are interchanged. Eight days after this exhibition, a second meeting takes place, in which the affair is more pointedly discussed, and, by the aid of officious relatives and female go-betweens, all the preliminaries are settled, on which the company return home coupled and mated.—Similar customs at marriages prevail among all the Salvonic tribes. But it is extraordinary, that, in gorgeous Petersburg, where a numerous portion of the public never fails to ridicule the practice, such a singularity should maintain its ground to the present day."

A Religious Devotee.—"I entered the church with a tradesman's wife, splendidly dressed, who alighted from her carriage, and called out to her French female companions, 'Attendez un moment, je veux faire mes prieres.' She then went around to all the images of saints, one after another, made her obeisance to each, eyeing it at the same time with the kindest look, and self complacently was wagging her head, tripped out of the church to drive away to another."

Anti-temperance Habits.—"The whole nation, there is no denying it, is addicted to intemperance, both in eating and drinking; and yet it not only furnishes models of the most exemplary sobriety, but there are times when the greatest drunkards practice the strictest temperance. It is generally admitted, that in drinking, and especially in the drinking of ardent spirits, the Russian surpasses all other nations; and yet, it is singular, he seems to be little affected by it. The awful lesson which Hogarth has given, on excessive indulgence in spirituous liquors, is not applicable to this country; on the contrary, these people, who, while infants in arms have been accustomed by their mothers to their share of the dram, live to the age of eighty or a hundred years, and are hale and hearty, as though they had never swallowed anything but milk warm from the breast, and can justly say of brandy, as Voltaire, at fourscore, said of coffee that if it is a poison, it must be a very slow one. When they have money, they are to be seen not sipping out of thimble glasses, as we do, but gulping incredible quantities of these pernicious liquors out of the largest pewter measures, in which they are served to them. Women, girls, boys, and literally infants at the breast, partake of these carouses, which, in any country, would be productive of the worst consequences.

AN ABLE-BODIED SEAMAN.—A good story is told by Pratt of the Baltimore Republican, about a stout athletic lump of a chap, who, during the last war, enlisted on board one of our men of war, as an able-bodied seaman. The fellow was from the country, and knew just about as much of the duties of a sailor, either on deck or aloft, as he did of astronomy or metaphysics; but he was a fearless fellow, and ignorant that the term able bodied meant other than a stout man who could whip his weight in cats or bears, at once answered the question in the affirmative when asked whether he was an able bodied seaman or not. The fellow was duly entered on the ship's book and was soon at sea. The first rough weather that came he was ordered aloft, with the usual accompaniment of "hurry," but he didn't happen to be in a particular hurry at that particular time.—He looked aloft, shrugged his shoulders, and coolly answered the order of officer by saying, "Mister, I shan't go up thar!"—"Not go up, you rascal?" "No, sir; I'm d—d if I'm going up thar to have my head broken with them conflutements that's knockin' and swingin' about, at least until everything is quiet." "Why, you lubberly scoundrel, didn't you ship for an able-bodied seaman?"

"Yes, I did, and I am an able-bodied seaman!" "You are, are you;—tell me what you mean by saying you are an able bodied seaman," said the officer in a rage. "Why, I mean," says Bob, "I can whip any man on board!" This was too much for the officer, and too good to keep. He related it to the Captain, and the way the recruiting officer was quizzed during the cruise, was fun all round. Bob, however, became an able-bodied seaman, in fact; and proved it by whipping the whole crew at Martinique.

THE CULTIVATION OF THE TEA PLANT.—For some time past, the attention of the Dutch government has been directed to the Growth of the tea plant, in their East India possessions. Persons competent to perform all the process of its preparation have been brought from China. The tea shrub is found to be hardy, and easily cultivated; it thrives in many parts of Java. Its height is generally about three or four feet, when it has attained the age of four years, at which period, it is in condition to yield good tea.

The quantity of tea already exported from Java, amounts to 100,000 pounds, and in two years it will be, it is said, fully two millions of pounds.

To manufacture tea in Batavia, or Java, costs about 37 cents per pound, and it cannot be afforded in Holland for less than 55 cents per pound. "The Dutch Government," says the "Friend of China," "have a very extensive establishment at Batavia for curing, dividing, classifying, and packing their tea, which is contracted for in a partially prepared state, and is thus delivered at the warehouse, where it undergoes a process of firing, and where it is assorted and packed for the home market.—Green and Black teas are made from leaves of the same tree. Leaves for black tea, are put into the sun for a time to dry, whilst those for green tea are immediately put over the fire, and when heated are pressed very tightly and worked by the hand by which an oily substance seems to be extracted.

"In Java, as before said, the leaves for green and black tea are treated oaxactly alike; with this simple difference, that the black is higher dried than green. The whole manufacture is so easy that good teas of both kinds are made by some of the residents for their domestic consumption, from shrubs, growing in their gardens."

CHINA.—The letters of Mr. Lowrie mention his arrival at Macao, in good health, after a pleasant voyage. He had the satisfaction of finding Mr. and Mrs McBryde at Macao, where they had arrived some months previous, having left Singapore on account of their health.—They were both stronger, but not entirely recovered; and they proceeded to Amoy, reaching that city on the 9th of June, partly for health, and chiefly to make inquiries about that place as a missionary station, for which it is supposed to have many advantages. Mr. McBryde and Mr. Lowrie previously visited Hong Kong, and made similar inquiries there; and Mr. Lowrie was to leave on the 19th of June, for Singapore, agreably to the instructions of the Committee. From the full accounts sent home by these brethren, the Executive Committee have become satisfied that it will be expedient to have the chief seat of the mission at some of the places immediately on the borders of China—perhaps at Hong Kong, or Amoy, if not Chusan.—The missionaries had been previously authorized to transfer the mission to such place as they might select. Letters from Dr. and Mrs. Hepburn, and from Mr. and Mrs. Buell, both dated on the 23d of May, had been received at Macao.—Missionary Chronicle.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL ARMY.—The boys and girls in our common schools—the true standing army. These soldiers are in citadels which rise up around us, the noblest bulwarks against ignorance, that worst enemy of the human race. Whoever builds a school house or teaches a good school, is erecting the strongest monument to freedom. If the time shall ever come when this great government shall totter, when this Beacon, now the sign and wonder of the world, shall wax dim, the cause will be found in the ignorance of the people, 'And the people perish for lack of knowledge."

TRUE.—A clergyman in one of our large cities lately addressed his people thus:—"My dearly beloved brethren, let me solemnly assure you, that some of you might appropriate five, some ten or fifteen, some twenty thousand dollars, for charitable and benevolent purposes, and still retain enough to ruin your children.' What a lesson! How little regarded by parents in general! How fully borne out by the career of a large number of those who inherit independent fortunes, without the necessity of attending to businesss.—Chr. Reflector.

BEAUTIFUL REPLY.—Not many months since, while a number of young people were discoursing upon the easiest mode of leaving the world—whether drowning, freezing, &c., were the least painful—a young woman of fifteen was asked how she would choose to die, who replied, "I wish to die the death of the righteous."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To Families and Invalids.

THE following indispensable family remedies may be found at the village drug stores, and soon at every country store in the state. Remember and never get them unless they have the fac simile signature of Comstock & Co on the wrappers, as all others by the same names are base impositions and counterfeits. If the merchant near you has them not, urge him to procure them at 71 Maiden-lane, the next time he visits New York, or to write for them. No family should be a week without these remedies

BALDNESS.

Balm of Columbia, for the hair, which will stop it from falling out, or restore it on bald places; and on children make it grow rapidly, or on those who have lost their hair from any cause. All vermin that infest the heads of children in schools, are prevented or killed at once. Find the name of Comstock & Co on it, or never try it. Remember this always.

RHEUMATISM AND LAMENESS

Positively cured, and all shrivelled muscles and limbs are restored, in the old or young, by the Indian Vegetable Elixir and Nerve and Bone Liniment, but never without the name of Comstock & Co. on it.

PILES &c.

Are wholly prevented, or governed if the attack has come on, if you use the only true Hay's Liniment, from Comstock & Co. All sores and every thing relieved by it that admits of an outward application. It acts like a charm. Use it.

HORSES that have Ring-Bone, Spavin, Wind-Galls, &c., are cured by Roofs' Specific; and Foundered horses entirely cured by Roofs' Founder Ointment. Mark this, horsemen.

AN APPENDIX FROM DR. OWEN.

"Among Christians, says he, this name, viz. Sunday, was not in common use, but by some was rejected, as were also the rest of the names of the days used among the Pagans; so speaks Augustine, wishing that christians did not call the days as Pagans do. Hierome would not have the days of the week called after the names of the idols and planets, but first day, second day, third day, fourth day, fifth day, sixth day, seventh day Sabbath day, and he rejects the use of the ordinary names unto the Heathens. Philastitius makes the usages of them among Christians almost Heretical; and the Popish Rhemists on Revelation i. 10, condemn the name of Sunday as Heathenish; and Polidore Virgil before them saith, In truth 'tis both a shame and matter of great lamentation, that before now the days have not been called by christian names, that the Heathenish Gods might not have had among us such a standing monument, and indeed among sundry of the antients there do many severe expressions occur against the use of the common planetary names, and at the first relinquishment of Heathenism, it had no doubt been well if these names of Balaam had been taken away out of the mouths of men, especially considering that the retaining of them hath been of no use nor advantage. I must add, that the severe afflictions, and contemptious reproaches, poured out against them who abstain from using them (the Heathenish names) argues a want of due charity, since certainly there is an appearance of warranty in them who use not Heathenish names, sufficient to secure them from contempt and reproach, for it is given as the will of God, Exo. xxiii. 13. Make no mention of the names of other Gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth. And it cannot be deny'd but the names of the days of the week were names of the Gods among the Heathen; the prohibition is renewed in Joshua xxiii. 7. Make no mention of the names of their Gods, nor cause to swear by them, neither serve them, nor bow yourselves unto them, which is yet extended in Deut. xii. 3, to a command to destroy and blot out the names of the Gods of the people, which by this means are retained; accordingly the children of Reuben building cities, formerly called Nebo and Baalmeon, changed their names, because they were the names of the Heathen idols, Numb. xxxii. 38. And David mentions it as a part of his integrity, that he would not take up the names of idol gods in his lips, Psal. xvi. 4."—Thus far Dr. Owen. John xiii. 17. If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them. Holy David and Dr. Owen were not of Mr. Ward's mind in this thing.

There are many other names of days and seasons used both in common speech and writing to be rejected by all good Christians, they being set up for these three wicked ends chiefly.

I. To uphold the detestable idol of the Mass, as Lammas day, Michaelmas, Christmas, and Candlemas. And,

II. To give God's time either, 1. To real saints who abhorred such things, as James tide, Bartholomew tide, or 2. To superstitious saints who never had a being but in wicked men's brains, as Valentine's day, George's day.

III. To encourage people in horrid superstitious observations of times, as Shrove tide, Lent, Easter, Whitsuntide, and which they call holy days, and honor them more than the Lord's seventh day Sabbath, the only holy day of God's appointing, whereby the Lord's time is justled out to bring in times devised by wicked men, who herein are like to Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who sinned and bade Israel to sin, 1 Kings xii. 32, therefore christians should not take up these abominable names in their mouths, lest they learn the ways and walk after the custom of the Heathens and Papists, which being vain and abominable, are positively forbidden in these and among many other scriptures.

Exo. xxiii. 13. In all things that I have said unto you be circumspect and make no mention of the names of other Gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth.—Deut. xii. 3. God expressly commands his people to destroy the names of idols out of their land. Joshua xxii. 7, this command is repeated, that they should not so much as make mention of the name of Heathen Gods. Nehem. xiii. 24, 25. The chief rulers vehemently contended with such as spoke half in the speech of Ashdod, and not altogether in the language of the people of God. Psalm xvi. 4. David a man after God's own heart declares, That he would not take up the names of other Gods into his lips. Hosea ii. 16, 17. God promised to take away the names of Baalam from the mouths of his people, and they shall no more be remembered by their names. Zeph. iii. 9. Then will I turn to myself the people of a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord to serve him with one consent. Zach. xiii. 1. 2. God promiseth when his people are washed from sin by Christ the fountain of grace, that he will cut off the names of idols out of their land and they should be no more remembered. 1 Cor. xv. 33. Be not deceived, evil communications corrupt good manners. Eph. iv. 29. Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth. Col. iv. 6. Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that you may know how ye ought to answer every man. Titus ii. 1. Use sound speech which cannot be condemned, that they who are of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you. 1 Peter iv. 11. If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God, that is scripture language. And indeed there is the highest reason for calling the days of the week and the months by scripture names only, for all times being the Lord's, and the Lord having put names upon his own time, we should call his time by none other names than those the Lord hath given it in his holy word. Hear what Christ speaks in Matt. xii. 36, 37. But I say unto you that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give an account thereof in the day of judgement; for by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned. Therefore keep yourselves from idols.

COMMUNION WITH GOD.

We commune with the minds of past ages, when we pursue their immortal productions. We commune with absent friends, when they are brought to mind by some written communication, or some mementoes of their affection. But there is a higher power, more ennobling communion, that which the renewed spirit holds with him who gave it birth,—the communion of a heart that pants after knowledge, purity, and bliss, with Him who is all-wise, holy, and happy. It is by such intercourse of the finite with the infinite spirit, that the character is moulded into moral beauty, and fitness for companionship with spirits uncorrupted is acquired.

He who maintains it, cherishes a deep and abiding conviction of the omnipresence of God. He cannot, indeed, behold him face to face, but sees him with the opened eye of faith. He converses not with him as a man does with his friend; his communion is that of a sanctified intellect and a holy heart.

Ever wakeful to discern the proofs of his presence, he hears his voice of power in the warring elements, of love in the mercies of every day, and of reproach in chastisement and affliction. He beholds the work of his fingers in the moon and stars that shine above him, in the gay attire of spring, and in the sober tints of autumnal scenery. The innumerable objects that meet his eye, from the mote that floats in the sunbeam to the sun itself, the varied sounds that fall upon his ear, from the rippling of the brook to the thunder of the cataract, all speak audibly to him of Jehovah's presence. All that is sublime and beautiful in nature, all that is dark and mysterious in Providence, and all that is marvelous in sovereign grace, combine to impress upon his mind the great truth, that he is surrounded by an ever present God.

He carefully endeavors to preserve such a frame of mind as will favor intercourse with this glorious Being. The sin of thought, or of deed that would soil his conscience, he avoids; the devices of his great spiritual foe he watchfully guards against, and he earnestly struggles to keep himself free from the entanglements of the world.

He redeems the time that others spend in frivolous and useless pursuits, that he may secure it for devotional purposes. He loves to retire from the noisy and bustling scenes of life, that in the solitude of his heart he may commune with his Maker.—His is the language of the divinely taught bard,

"Far from the world, O Lord I flee,
From strife and tumult far;
From scenes, where Satan wages still
His most successful war.

The calm retreat, the silent shade,
With prayer and praise agree;
And seem by thy sweet bounty made
For those who follow thee."

He hails the return of his appointed seasons of prayer, for then, especially, he forgets all meaner things and ascends the mount to talk with God. Thus employed, he makes large and enrapturing discoveries of the divine character, becomes intimately acquainted with once hidden and precious truth, and rapidly advances in holiness.

The higher he ascends above the polluted and polluting atmosphere of the world, the sweeter is his communion, and the more ardent are his pantings after heaven, and the greater ripeness for its holy scenes and enjoyments does he acquire.

Dear reader would you possess that "joy of the Lord" which is the strength of the believer, that peace, the rich bequest of Christ, whose serenity neither the fluctuations nor the trials of time can destroy; that hope which is the soul's anchor, keeping it firm upon the stormiest sea of life,—would you have every earthly pleasure made doubly sweet, and every grief robbed of its poignancy,—would you have heaven begun here below, to be completed in the world above, then diligently strive by the grace of God, to maintain this communion.

I SHALL GO TO THE PRAYER MEETING.

I shall go to the prayer meeting, not only to get good, but to do good: for

1. Though I have but one talent, if I bury that, or hide it in a napkin, I shall be like the wicked and slothful servant. I will therefore not only gladden the hearts of my brethren and my pastor by my presence, but by my efforts to encourage and sustain the interests of piety.

2. If I am unwilling to bear my part in prayer and exhortation, my feeble gifts remain stationary or are diminished, and I virtually refuse the strength I might acquire, to do good to the souls of men.

3. If I go to the prayer meeting having no sense of responsibility except to be at my post, and bear no part in the services, the meeting may soon become formal and dull, the services confined to a few individuals, the thoughts running all in the same channel, the unconverted who come expecting to hear many prayers and animated addresses, will go away disappointed, their souls will be injured and the cause of religion depressed.

But if I go to the prayer meeting to do good, I will observe two rules.

1. I will endeavor, so far as circumstances will allow, to go prepared to engage in such duties as the occasion may suggest.

2. I will not weary my brethren with long, dry prayers and exhortations. I must repeat this rule lest it be forgotten. I will not weary my brethren with long dry prayers and exhortations. And to assist myself and my brethren in carrying out these purposes, I will give a short sketch of two different prayer meetings which I have attended.

As I entered the chapel in company with the minister, I found an audience of 50 or 60. No sooner was the minister seated than a brother struck up in a pleasing manner, one or two verses of a hymn, assisted by several voices in different parts of the room. The singing closed and in an instant was heard the voice of prayer from one of the brethren, and no sooner had he said amen, than another followed; this done, as quick as thought the music of another voice was heard quickly aided by many others. Then followed two or three others in prayer. By this time a little space was left for the reading of a few verses from the word of God, and some remarks by one of the ministers present.—Then followed exhortations, prayers, singing, requests for prayers, until before I was aware, two whole hours had passed away. All the services were short, intelligent, pious, and the whole assembly seemed interested.

At another meeting a good number of souls were present, the minister came in, waited a few moments, asked the brethren to strike a tune in some hymn: two or three conversed together about it and then sung.

The minister said, "Will one of the brethren engage in prayer?" all were silent. He then arose, no doubt with rather depressed feelings and tried to pray as well as he could, then read from the word of God, and waited a few moments for some brother to pray, but as none seemed inclined, he went on to make some exposition of the verses read, accompanied with exhortation. By this time there began to be manifest a little feeling, either from what had been said, or from what had been omitted, and one or two prayers were offered; and when the usual hour to close had arrived, half a dozen brethren seemed just ready to exhort and pray, but the meeting was closed and they went away with a heavy heart, and the impenitent with an unfavorable impression of the energy and life-giving power generally ascribed to religion. I prefer the kind of prayer meeting first described, and shall do what I can, to make the meeting such which I attend.

From the Boston Recorder.

A DIVINE PURPOSE.

One of the grand purposes of God is that the earth shall be filled with his glory, as the waters cover the sea. The whole Christian church rejoice in the belief of a universal reign of holiness. Here is a pre-determination of God, producing an infallible certainty. Heaven and earth may pass away, but his word shall not pass away.

It has been said that a belief in the divine decrees tended to throw the mind into a state of sloth and inactivity—that it discouraged all exertion—that it favored a species of fatalism which cut the sinews of effort, and resolved the moral world into a kind of machinery, which being moved by an omnipotent hand, superceded altogether the enterprise and industry of man.

But what is the actual operation upon truly spiritual and holy minds of the doctrine of the divine purpose to make "the wilderness as Eden, and the desert as the garden of the Lord." Does not the announcement of that purpose awaken not only the most animated and happy hope; but the most vigorous exertions? Who of this world's population, are so bent upon the work of evangelizing the whole mass as those who most firmly believe that an infallible purpose of God touches this very point. Their confidence in the certainty of that event could not be greater. They have an assured conviction that the word of God shall triumph in all lands. But does this throw them into lethargy? Does it lead them to feel that they have nothing to do about this glorious result? Do they regard the divine decree as so settling the matter that all that remains for them is simply to await with folded arms the coming of those times which God has put in his own power.

On the other hand, is there a greater stimulus to all the forms of self-sacrificing labor than this very irreversible purpose of God? Had no such purpose been announced and no light shone on the certainty of the event, would there not have rested such dubiousness upon it as greatly to paralize exertion? Would the soldiers of the cross move in that case with the zeal, boldness, and hope that now animates them? Would theirs have been as it now is "The strength to suffer, and the will to serve."

With such a mass of guilt and pollution before them, the gigantic superstitions of pagan nations, consolidated by the progress of centuries, and entrenched in the human heart by attracting to their support all the powerful passions of corrupt minds with such obstacles frowning upon them, with what comparatively feeble hearts and hands would the servants of Christ have gone forth to evangelize the world, had there been no announcement of a divine purpose concerning the world's redemption. But that purpose is recorded. The palaces and towers of superstition shall fall. The fountains of the great deep shall be broken up. The kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. What animating power this announcement has to the servants of the Savior? It lifts up the hands that hang down, and confirms the feeble knees. What joy have the purposes of God awakened in pious hearts! What inspiration they have given to the spirit of prayer! What themes of holy exultation they have been to the missionaries of the cross! How often they come, in the hour of darkness and discouragement, to rouse the fainting soldier to grasp again his fallen weapons, and renew the conflict! The certainty of a triumphant and glorious result, made infallible by the expressed purpose of God, has been the most animating of all considerations which have ever appeared to the mind. It has been the death of sloth, the life and love of zeal.

There is no natural tendency in the doctrine of predestination, rightly understood, to encourage the inactivity of men. What portion of our race have been more earnest, active, watchful, and prayerful in securing their own salvation, than those who have maintained them? And where has self-sacrifice been so abundant, the free expenditure of property and life, to bring all men to the knowledge of the truth?

Predestinarians, or those who have believed in the purposes of God respecting the moral affairs of this world, have been the bone and muscle of those great enterprises which contemplate the universal triumph of holiness. These purposes have been like that cheering voice which greets the mariner, who faint and desponding, yet clings to the wreck. It sends the ebbing current of life with new power through his veins. He revives, is roused to new exertion, and is saved. So break the glad sounds of the purposes of God concerning human redemption on the ears of lovers of souls. The spiritual pulse beats quicker. The eye brightens with hope. The hand becomes strong, the feet swift. He hath purposed and will do it. Therefore will thy servants arise and build.

HASTY ADMISSIONS TO THE CHURCH.

As the evils of admitting persons to the Church, in a very short time after conversion, are becoming more apparent, it is gratifying to find that our Congregational churches are more favoring the side of caution and delay: and thus we are profiting by the unhappy experience of others. The greatest temptation to err on the side of haste is the fear that injury may be done by the proselyting zeal of our neighbors: and no doubt some evil in some cases may be avoided by such haste. But a greater evil is incurred. More often the persons who are drawn away into other sects, during the interval between the supposed conversion and the proper time for admission to the Church, are those who would be of little value in any Church: and then it is better to lose one desirable member of the flock, than to gather in two wolves in sheep's clothing. The Church that exercises a wise caution, and receives none to its fellowship till after reasonable opportunity had for the candidate to show the permanency of his change, may increase its numbers less in a given revival; but will, in a course of years, other things being equal, gather much more of abiding strength, enjoy more of harmony, and every way better answer the end of a Church of Christ.

Another thing is worthy of notice; an experiment is going forward, which gives illustration of the nature and tendency of two opposing classes of principles. The practice of gathering into the Church speedily and indiscriminately as many as possible in a scene of revival, has become a part of one set of measures and principles; and the practice of caution, delay, and careful discrimination, stand associated with another class of principles and measures: and the results of the two are having their development; and principles are coming to their test by this means.—And not only for the good of the churches with which our interests and responsibilities are located, but for the sake of sustaining correct principles for all coming time, we ought to discourage this ruinous haste. The results are but partially developed now, and are less decided than they would be if the friends of truth had, in times past, been more careful; and yet it is cheering to see the advantage which our Congregational churches have over some of their neighbors who encourage the contrary course. The excommunications from our churches are reported, and the number published in the Minutes of the General Association; and that they are so few, compared with what appear in some other denominations, who pursue a different policy, as to admissions, shows that the real gain of strength to a Church is not always according to the numbers added.—N. E. Puritan.

SUPERFICIAL INFIDELS.—Sir Isaac Newton set out in life a clamorous infidel, but, on a nice examination of the evidences of Christianity, he found reason to change his opinion. When the celebrated Dr. Edmund Halley was talking infidelity before him, Sir Isaac Newton addressed him in these or like words: "Dr. Halley, I am always glad to hear you when you speak about astronomy, or other parts of the mathematics, because that is a subject you have studied, and well understand; but you should not talk of Christianity, for you have not studied it. I have; and am certain that you know nothing about the matter." This was a just reproof, and one that would be very suitable to be given to half the infidels of the present day; for they often speak of what they have never studied, and what, in fact, they are entirely ignorant of. Dr. Johnson, therefore, well observed, that no honest man could be a Deist, for no man could be so after a fair examination of the proofs of Christianity." The name of Hume being mentioned to him, "No sir," said he, "Hume owned to a clergyman in the bishoprick of Durham, that he had never read the New Testament with attention."

BEAUTIFUL REPLY.—One of the deaf and dumb in the Institution of Paris being desired to express his ideas of the eternity of the Deity, replied, "It is duration, without beginning or end; existence without bounds or dimensions: present, without past or future. His eternity is youth without infancy or old age, life without birth or death: to-day without yesterday or to-morrow.

How deficient are they, in their religious views and concerns, who do not look to the Lord Jesus as the sanctifier as well as the Redeemer!

REASONS WHY YOUTH SHOULD EMBRACE CHRIST.

BY JOHN BATEY.

1. Because God, who knows when we are best qualified to engage in his service and escape evil, has set the time of youth as being the most favorable season. Eccl. xii. 1. "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth;" Lam. iii. 27, "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke (or serve Christ,) in his youth." "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found;" "They that seek me early shall find me."

2. Because then, if ever, the heart is susceptible of religious impressions. The whole of the writings of Solomon, especially, go to establish the truth of this position.

3. Because then the poison of infidelity has not taken so permanent a foundation in the mind as to render it unmoveable. Ps. i. 1, 2. "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful. But his delight is in the law of the Lord; and in his law doth he meditate day and night." Prov. iii. 5, 6, "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and learn not to thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge him and he shall direct thy paths."

4. Because then no deep seated crime, that tends to harden the heart and sear the conscience, has taken an unyielding grasp of the affections. Prov. ii. 10--15,—"When wisdom entereth into thine heart, and knowledge is pleasant unto thy soul, discretion shall preserve thee, understanding shall keep thee; to deliver thee from the way of the evil man, from the man that speaketh froward things; who leave the paths of uprightness to walk in the ways of darkness; who rejoice to do evil, and delight in the frowardness of the wicked; whose ways are crooked, and they froward in their paths." Intemperance, Sabbath breaking, profane swearing, lying in all its forms, licentiousness, &c. &c., are all avoided by embracing Christ when young.

5. Because then less difficulties arising from external circumstances, such as hurry of business, anxieties and disappointments of the same, and the perplexities of a family, &c. &c., are to be encountered in seeking religion, and in persevering in holiness. Eccl. xii. 1, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them."

6. Because then, more than at any other period, you would be the subject of the Christian's sympathy, and care of the fathers and mothers in Israel, who would regard your youth, and the circumstances attending a religious life in youth. Christ in his incarnation manifested a peculiar regard for the young, and when about to leave his disciples, he gave them particular charge to "feed the lambs," as well as to "feed the sheep," which we are informed, was strictly met by, at least, Paul, Peter, and John, in whose epistles we find a manifest attention paid to the babes in Christ, especially of the youth.

7. Because then you will lay a foundation of pure principles, to guide, guard, and happify you during this life. Prov. iii. 1—4, "My son forget not my law; but let thine heart keep my commandments; for length of days, and long life, and peace, shall they add to thee. Let not mercy and truth forsake thee: bind them about thy neck; write them upon the table of thine heart: so shalt thou find favor and good understanding in the sight of God and man." 1 Tim. iv. 8, "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having proisme of the life that now is, and of that which is to come."

8. Because, in death, it will afford you great consolation to reflect upon a whole life spent in the service of God. "Mark the perfect man, behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."

9. Because, in eternity, it will be a source of joy to you, that you commenced a life of holiness, when you did, which, you may then plainly see, was with you the only time favorable. The rich man, who in hell lifted up his eyes to heaven, being in torment, desiring a favor, was called upon by Abraham to remember certain circumstances in his earthly existence; hence we may reasonably conclude that saints also will be put in remembrance of the fitness of the period when they gave their hearts to Christ, as well as some other peculiar circumstances of their lives in this state of probation.

MY MOTHER'S LAST PRAYER.

"May God protect thee! my little one," said my mother, as I stood by her dying bed. There was a soft tremor in her failing voice, which checked the joyous laugh that trembled on my lip, as I, in childish joyfulness, shook the pale hand of my dying parent from my head, and buried my brow in the rich mass of bright hair which floated over her pillow. Again her sweet voice sighed forth, "Lead her not into temptation, but deliver her from evil." I raised my face from its beautiful resting place, and young as I was, felt the influence of a mother's prayer. Her lips still moved, and her deep blue eyes were bent on me as if they would have left one of their bright unearthly rays as a seal to her death-bed covenant, but she spoke not again; the last effort of nature had uttered that prayer, and she lived not to breathe another.

I have every reason to believe that God has, in a great degree, caused that prayer to be instrumental in gaining its own answer; for often, when the heedlessness of childhood and youth would have led me into errors, has the sweet voice, now hushed forever, intermingled itself with my thoughts, and like the rosy link of a fairy chain, drawn me from my purpose. Oft, when my brow has been wreathed with flowers for the festival, when my cheek has been flushed, and my eye sparkled with anticipated pleasure, have I caught the reflection of that eye in the mirror, and thought it resembled my mothers; her last maternal supplication to Heaven has come back to my memory; the clustering roses have been torn from my head; sober sadness has chased the unnatural glow from my cheek, and the sight from my eye, and my thoughts have been carried back to my lost parent, and from her to the heaven she inhabits; the festival, with all its attractions, has been forgotten, and I have been "delivered from temptation."

Again, when the sparkling wine cup has almost bathed my lips, has the last prayer of my mother seemed to mingle with its contents—and it has remained untasted.—When my hand has rested in that of the dishonorable, and trembled to the touch of him that "says in his heart, there is no God"—has that voice seemed to flow with his fascinating accents. I have listened to it, and fled as if from a serpent of my native forest.

Oft have I heard it, as a warning, sound high above the music of the violin, as I have joined in the mazes of the intricate cotillon; and it has saved me from temptation. Never have I received any great good—escaped any threatened evil—or been delivered from temptation—but I have imputed it to the effects of my mother's last prayer.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, January 25, 1843.

"Pray Without Ceasing."

The spirit of this Divine precept enjoins habitual prayer, or the possession of such a temper of mind, as to be continually aspiring after holiness of heart, and the promotion of Immanuel's kingdom. The Christian feels that he is imperfect, and often longs for that happy period of his existence, when he shall have become a perfect man in Christ Jesus. For this he should labor, and for this, ever pray.

1. He should pray in Secret.—The closet should be his delight. Here he may breathe forth the earnest aspiration of his soul to God, with none to interrupt, or make him afraid. Here he can commune with God, as if face to face. Like friend to friend, he can recount his joys, and sorrows; tell him of his wants, and supplicate his mercy; of his dangers, and invoke his protection; of his weakness, and implore his aid; and especially entreat his guidance through the labyrinths of life. Those only should expect to grow in grace who, in addition to other duties, pray in secret. Neglecting this duty, our graces become dormant, and we cease to be, what every child of God should be, an active Christian.

2. He should pray in Public.—The house of prayer should be his frequent resort.—It should ever be his delight to bow with Christian friends around the "Common mercy-seat." Here he may do, and receive good. His fervent and effectual prayer may benefit others, by enlivening their desires, and quelling their fears; arousing them to renewed efforts in the cause of Christ, and to give all diligence to make their calling and election sure. He will hereby conduce to the prosperity of the church. No church can expect to prosper in spiritual things, only as her members carry out the spirit of the precept, "Pray without ceasing." Hence, prayer-meetings are the pale of the church. If these are cold and lifeless, the cause of Christ is assuredly waning among them, and if they become wholly neglected the church is virtually dead—her pulse has ceased to beat. Let every christian, then, consider that by absenting himself from the prayer-meetings he conduces to the death of the church, and let him act in view of the consequences. Let him delight

"To mingle where,
"Christians meet for praise and prayer."

3. As a Parent, he should Pray in his Family.—To bring up children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, is a highly responsible and important duty, and no one need to expect successfully to train up children in the way they should go, without erecting & maintaining a family altar. This duty is awfully neglected. Thousands of professing Christians act as though unaware of the fearful denunciation of Jehovah upon the neglecter of family worship. Were this duty universally practiced by the heads of Christian families, the church and the world would be greatly benefitted. The former would have more abundant grace, and receive more frequent accession to her numbers; and the latter would be relieved of much of that baneful influence now exerted upon it by the ungodly children of professing parents. In view of the consequences, let no christian parent neglect family prayer. W. B. D.

New York Legislature.

This body is "hastening slowly" with their business, having as yet done but little. Petitions numerously signed are coming in for the repeal of the exemption law, the abolishment of the office of Deputy Superintendent of Common Schools, and for the suppression of Licentiousness. We are right glad to find the number of petitioners on the last mentioned subject increasing. There is no point on which legislation is so much needed as this. Laws should be enacted that would throw security around virtue and innocence, and effectually shield the helpless from the power of the soulless seducer. As the laws now are, virtue has no protection, and innocence no security. He who inflicts an injury worse than the destruction of property and even death itself, and fills the soul with the keenest anguish, destroying domestic happiness, covering fame with effaceless ignominy, blighting every earthly prospect of peace, wrapping the mantle of perpetual shame around the character, closing every avenue to respectability and usefulness, making life with all its endearments, its social intercourse, its hopes of future good, and its thousands varied scenes of pleasure a burden, is allowed by law to hold up his head in community to be called a gentleman and is in no wise deprived of any advantage that may be enjoyed by the virtuous and pure. Ye lovers of purity and virtue, and ye who would protect innocence, send on your petitions till our Statute Books shall contain salutary laws, that shall punish seduction and adultery so as to make the punishment a terror to evil doers.

We publish the following by request of a friend, hoping that it will be the means of disseminating truth on the subject of the Sabbath:

The New-York Sabbath Tract Society are desirous of establishing a Library of works treating upon the Sabbath Question, for the purpose of loaning them to enquirers for the truth, and for making extracts for publication. As many works upon this question are seldom found in the stores, or even in the public libraries, the benefit of having such a library in a place like the city of New-York would be too obvious to require mention. Those, therefore, having old or rare works which they would be willing to sell or loan, are requested to forward them, or a notice of them, together with copies of pamphlets or sermons upon this subject, at the earliest opportunity to PAUL STILLMAN, Cor. Sec., or to T. B. STILLMAN, Pres.

We have received the Minutes of the Sixth Anniversary of the Pennsylvania Baptist Convention, got up in a very neat style. The Convention is a Missionary body, and its receipts during the last conventional year, amounts to $5,437,90. Forty-four Missionaries have been employed, who "visited 3,074 families; baptized 973 persons, and preached 5,313 sermons." The following statistics are given: Churches 200; Ministers 186; Licentiates, 39; Baptized 3,341; Total, 24,584. W. B. D.

Secessions.

REV. LUTHER LEE, and M. O. MOTT, have seceded from the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Lee gives his reasons for withdrawing from this Church at some length in the "True Wesleyan," which are, in short, on account of the alliance of the M. E. Church with Slavery.

Incorrect Illustration.

The following illustration has been given of the Divine Trinity;—Corn is planted, and in due time comes to maturity, producing more corn. Of this, meal is manufactured, and by another process it becomes bread. Here are three different articles, but the substance is one and the same. So in the Trinity, there are three persons, but one God.

Perhaps those who use this illustration are not aware that when corn is ground it is no longer corn, but meal; and when meal is baked it is no longer meal, but bread.—So, when the Father becomes the Son, he is no longer the Father, &c.

Such illustrations injure the cause they are brought to defend, and give force to the objections of Unitarians against the doctrine in question. It is to be devoutly wished, therefore, that the defenders of the Scripture doctrine of the Holy-Trinity, will content themselves with Bible illustrations of the same, rather than use those of "Backwood's preachers." A TRINITARIAN.

VERONA, Jan. 10, 1843.

DEAR BRO. BAILEY—The Lord has evidently been pouring out his Spirit in this part of his moral vineyard. Saints have been revived, backsliders reclaimed, and sinners converted to God. It is almost one year since I commenced preaching in the North West part of this town, in a place where there had not been a sermon delivered except one, for some years, and as you may suppose the people were like the Sodomites of old.

Soon after I commenced holding meetings there, the Spirit of God seemed to attend the word, and the truth of God fell with mighty power upon men's hearts, and I am happy to say there has been scores hopefully converted. The work has been in slow but steady progress ever since. Within a few weeks the work has been more rapid, and some of the vilest opposers have recently been found sitting at the Savior's feet, clothed and in their right mind.

Pray for us that our faith fail not.

Yours, &c. E. ROBINSON.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the N. Y. Tribune.

LATER FROM EUROPE.

The packet ship Garrick, Capt. Skiddey, came in a late hour last night from Liverpool, bringing dates to the 14th ult., five days later than we had before. While in charge of a New York pilot she ran aground upon what is called the tail of the West Bank in the lower Bay, about eleven miles from the city.

We received our files of London and Liverpool papers from the Garrick, at 3 o'clock. There is little of general interest from England, though from Spain the intelligence is of considerable importance. The period of prorogation having expired, Parliament assembled pro forma, on the 13th ult., and was farther prorogued until the 2d of February.

Lord Hill died on the 10th, at his seat, Hardwicke Grange, in his 71st year.

The money Market had undergone no variation. Cotton in Liverpool was dull, though no change in price is noted.

FROM SPAIN.

The latest dates from Barcelona are up to the 5th. For many days before, the disturbances had continued to increase. Frequent scuffles and slight tumults arose, and on the morning of the 14th matters came to an issue. The crowds in the Plaza San Jayme were so numerous and so tumultuous that it became absolutely necessary to dislodge them. The advance was sounded; orders were given; and the troops proceeded au pas de charge against the mob. The National Guards were prepared for battle, shots were fired, and the combat soon became general.

The military fought with bravery, and the city was speedily put in a state of effective defense. Every window became a bulwark, and all kind of missiles were showered from roofs, balconies, &c., upon the military as they marched through the streets.

Whilst this fierce warfare was going on, orders were given that the assembly should beat through the streets, to call the entire force of the National Guards to arms.—They at once responded to the call. They rushed to their barracks; from this position they opened a deadly fire on the troops, who, notwithstanding the resistance they met with, were gaining ground, and gradually approaching the Plaza San Jayme.

At this moment the great alarm bell sounded and roused all to arms. The combat deepened in ferocity and in bloodshed the moment the roar of that "horrid bell" opened from the Cathedral. The battle was fought with the utmost desperation until the soldiers, seeing their best and bravest officers lying dead or dying in the streets, began to commence retiring along the Rambla, towards the Citadel, and in the direction of the sea wall. While in the act of retreating by this point, they unfortunately, through haste or imprudence, formed a dense mass, and thereby presented a mark to the enemy, of which they were not slow to take advantage. The first battalion of National Guards, whose barracks are close to the wall, lifted their pieces as one man, and threw a volley into the thick of the fugitives. More than 600 bullets carried death and destruction among them.

Van Helen made his retreat, and the insurgents remained complete masters of the town. A supreme popular juntar was immediately formed. Something more than 1000 killed and wounded, formed the loss of the military. An immense amount of money, jewelry, &c., was plundered by the rabble.

FROM PORTUGAL.

We have Lisbon news to the 5th inst.—The municipal election was going on in the Portuguese metropolis, and the Government had so far been successful; it was probable that the great bulk of the Municipal Chamber would be composed of its adherents.

The Government had carried the municipal election of Oporto by a considerable majority. Throughout the districts of Douro and Aveiro they had been equally successful.

The coast of Portugal had been visited by fresh storms, and two English vessels had been wrecked, one the Chatham, bound to New South Wales, the other was the bark Wexford, with a cargo of coals. Five lives lost.

FRANCE.

The Administrators of the Versailles Left-Bank Railroad were acquitted on Saturday, by the Cort of Correctional Police, of the charge of negligence or imprudence, on the occasion of the dreadful accident that occurred on the 8th of May last.

The "Rhenish Gazette" copies the following from an Hungarian journal:—"Russia ought to reflect seriously on the unpleasant consequences which may result from her plan of attacking the rights of the King of Hungary in the principalities of the Danube. Assuredly, should a war arise on the subject, 100,000 Hungarian volunteers, united with a French and British force commanded by some of the Polish heroes now in exile, would deal Russia such a blow that she would not easily recover. Public opinion throughout Europe would infallibly declare in favor of such a movement.

Nothing further has been heard from the East, and we see nothing more in the English journals of general interest.

Congressional News.

Correspondence of the Jour. of Com.

WASHINGTON, Wednesday, Jan. 11.

Mr. Cushing moved that the House go into Committee of the whole, for the purpose of giving the Exchequer bill a fair hearing. But pending this motion, the House adjourned.

In the morning hour, there was some debates on the remission of Gen. Jackson's fine. Mr. Butler, of Ky., who was an aid-de-camp to Gen. Jackson, spoke in its favor, till the hour expired.

The Warehouse Bill.—Mr. Kennedy, of Md., from the Committee of commerce, submitted a resolution, (the adoption of which, he said, was necessary, to enable the Committee to form a bill establishing the warehousing system,) calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the House what amount of goods deposited in the public stores has been destroyed by fire during the last ten years, and what duties would have been paid if the said goods had not been destroyed. The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

Exchequer.—An extra number of copies (10,000) of the reports of the majority and minority of the Committee of Ways and Means on the Exchequer, were moved and will be ordered. The report of the majority is long, but that of the minority only one page.

The Democrats are in favor of printing a large number, however, because they say every argument of the Whigs against the exchequer is an argument against the national bank.

In the Senate, to-day, there was no business worthy of notice. The Senate refused by a vote of seventeen yeas to twenty-three nays to print an extra number of copies of the reports of the majority and minority of the Committee of the judiciary on the subject of Gen. Jackson's fine.

The Quintuple Treaty.—The President pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, in answer to the resolution, (adopted at the instance of Mr. Benton,) calling upon him to state whether the quintuple treaty, for the suppression of the slave-trade, has been communicated to the Government of the United States in any form; if so, by whom, and for what purpose, etc., and also to show the origin of the American squadron articles.

[The President, in reply, says: These inquiries were particularly unexpected by me at the present time. As I had been so fortunate as to find my own views of the expediency of ratifying the late treaty with England confirmed by a vote of somewhat more than four-fifths of the Senate present, I have flattered myself that the motives which influenced my conduct have been fully appreciated by those who advised and approved it; and that if a necessity should ever arise for any special explanation or defense in regard to those motives, it could scarcely be in the Assembly itself.]

The Statue of Washington.—Mr. Greenough has addressed a memorial to Congress on the subject of his statue. He states that the statue is now in a bad light. The light is vertical and casts a shade on the lower features of the face, and gives the figure an appearance of constraint. He states that there is no light suited to it in the Rotunda, and recommends that it be removed to the square west of the Capitol, and that a shelter be erected over it. He also enters into a justification of the design, so far as relates to the costume of the statue. He gives ample reason for not exhibiting the old hero in the awkward and grotesque habiliments of the day in which he lived.

News of the Day.

Horrid Cruelty and Death.—The Hartford Ct. Review of the 14th contains a notice of one of the most melancholy deaths we have seen on record for many days.—On Tuesday morning the 3d of January, between 7 and 8 o'clock, a wagon loaded with wood drove up to a store in that city, driven by a man named Viets, from Granby, 18 miles distant. The morning was one of the coldest known for many years, and a lad about 14 years old, named Gillet, who had been living with Viets for some months, had been forced to ride the horse all the way. He was very thinly clad—having on thin cotton trowsers, worn out stockings, and a short thin jacket.

They started about one o'clock in the morning, and on arriving at the store Viets ordered the boy to get off. He could not do so and several bystanders immediately assisted him. It was found that he was unable to stand. He was taken into the store, and both feet were found to be frozen to the knees. A physician was sent for—his limbs, being put into cold water, swelled up to an enormous size, blood started from them in several places, the lad's sufferings were excruciating; and it was decided that his life could be saved only by amputating both limbs at the knee, as mortification had already commenced.

He was sent to his friends, and on Wednesday his agony being too great for longer endurance, preparations were made for taking off his limbs. It was then found that his whole back, from the shoulders to the hips, was in a state of mortification, having been completely frozen and thawed. Before night he was dead. A legal investigation into the treatment he received from Viets, will be had.—Tribune.

The Mexican Indemnity.—We are happy to be enabled to inform our readers, from information received from an unquestionable source, that the terms of payment of the Mexican Indemnity have been agreed upon, and the negotiation respecting them settled.

The payments are to be made in ten half yearly instalments, with eight per cent. interest upon the principal.

In case any delay occurs in meeting the payments as they fall due, an additional ten per cent. is to be added to the principal.

Provisions are made for the consideration of such claims as have not yet been presented or adjudicated, by appointing commissioners to examine them.

The payments, as they fall due, are guarantied by a mortgage upon the internal revenues of the Republic on which no prior lien exists.

We are right glad that this business is concluded. Mexico has set an example in the way of paying her debts that some of the States of this Union, whose citizens are wont to berate her without stint, would do well to follow.—N. O. Bee.

From Yucatan.—The New Orleans Picayune of the 3d inst., says—Since our last publication some stray items of intelligence have reached us from the seat of war, by the schr. Rosario, which arrived here on Saturday—the most important of which is, that another engagement had taken place outside the walls of Campeachy, in which the Mexicans were again repulsed, with considerable loss. The Mexican fleet was still before Campeachy enforcing the blockade, which was daily violated with impunity by trading vessels.

We published yesterday a statement from the Hartford Ct Review, of the death by freezing of a boy named Gillet who had been living with a Mr. Viets in Granby.—The Courant of Tuesday says that only two of the boy's toes on his right foot, and the whole of those on his left were frozen, and that he is now well and attending school. We have some curiosity to know what could induce the Review to publish so atrocious a falsehood as this.—Tribune.

LATEST FROM TEXAS.

Galveston dates to the [illegible] ult. have been received at New Orleans. The intelligence is of some interest commercially and otherwise. In Congress, bills have been introduced to repeal the Tariff, (this bill passed by a vote of 19 to 13, but will, it is said, be rejected in the Senate;) to repeal the bill of the extra session requiring collectors to receive exchequers at their market value only. Also resolutions to inquire into the expediency of annexing the Republic of Texas to the United States. This latter, it is said, will pass.

By a statement from the Treasury Department, it appears there were not over $20,000 exchequer bills in circulation on the 1st of this month.

A bill has been introduced to repeal the duties on iron, steel, salt, sugar and coffee, and all kinds of provisions.

A bill has been brought forward to alter the tonnage duties on vessels as to levy the tax upon the actual measurement of their freight, and at the rate of five tons for every three passengers.

Bills have been introduced in the House to inquire into the expediency of passing some law to confiscate the estates of traitors and enemies to the Republic, and to establish a sabbath, or day of rest throughout the Republic.

The President has issued a proclamation, revoking the proclamation of his predecessor, whereby the duty on French wines was abolished. The proclamation of Gen. Lamar was not authorized by law or required by any treaty with France, and was the subject of complaint when first issued.

Maj. Reily, late minister to the U. States, reached the seat of government on the 17th inst.

We look for the announcement of the ratification of the treaty between Texas and the United States.

On the 18th a messenger arrived at Washington from the Wacoe Village, and brought news that the representatives of twenty-one tribes of Indians had arrived at that village, and were waiting the arrival of commissioners to conclude a treaty of peace.

The steamer Lafittee, with a cargo of 319 bales of cotton, 59 hides, and two bales of deer skins, from Brazos for Galveston, went ashore on the 20th, on the beach, after having passed San Louis.

The army, numbering 800 effective men under Gen. Somerville, left the Rio Frio on the 29th ult. for Mexico. There were in fine spirits, and were provided with good horses; were well armed and equipped, and are represented to be the most experienced and daring troops in all Texas.—When last heard from, they had reached the Mexican town of Laredo, and we hope soon to hear good accounts of their performances in the enemy's country.

The Mexican settlement styled New Bahia, better known as Carlos Rancho, was destroyed a few weeks ago by a party of volunteers from Victoria, under the command of Capt. J. Owen. The Mexican settlers at that place had frequently manifested hostility to the Americans residing near there, and whenever a Mexican force was in the country they became insolent and often appeared armed. Mexican soldiers were often seen at the settlement, and it was evident they came as spies.

The Dutch in Java.—The Dutch government is expected to bring forward a project for building a town in the interior of Java, on the border of a river which is to be made navigable, or, if no natural site offered, a canal would be dug. The notion of security seems to have prompted this design, as it is thought that Batavia is in such a situation that it might easily be taken by an enemy, who finding himself in possession of this seat of the colonial government.—Bombay Times.

Escape of a Female Convict.—Mrs. Honora Shepherd, whose husband is in the State Prison for counterfeiting, whose brother-in-law, Charles Shepherd is in prison, on conviction of the same offense, and who, herself, was on Friday last, convicted of forgery in the 2d degree, in having in her possession $2,270 in counterfeit $5 bills of the Manufacturer's Bank of Providence, contrived on the afternoon of Monday, to effect her escape from the female department of the prison, owing to the negligence and want of vigilance of some of the under keepers in disobeying the orders of Col. W. Jones, the principal keeper of the prison, and Mr. Homan, the chief deputy. She had run a long race of crime prior to her last arrest and conviction, and has again been permitted to defeat the demands of justice by an escape, as she was on the eve of being sent to expiate her crimes in the State Prison.—Courier.

Outrage on an American Vessel.—We learn from Capt. Bassett, barque Z. D., from Messina, that on the 13th of Dec., when passing Teneriffe at the rate of 10 miles per hour, she was fired into from the Spanish Fort at that place, a ball knocking away part of the starboard railing on the bows and cut away the flying jib-boom guy.—Cour. and Enq.

New Jersey Schools.—The whole number of school districts in New Jersey, is stated at about 1,500; the whole number of children between 5 and 16 years, 100,000; in the 102 towns that have reported the number of children not attending school, it is put at 17,970, and taking these to be two-thirds of all the non-attending children, the number of those in the whole State is put at 26,955.

Strange Disappearance.—We find the following paragraph in the N. Orleans Picayune of the 6th, the latest dates from that city:—

No little excitement has been created in the city within the last twenty-four hours, in relation to the sudden and mysterious disappearance of Geo. B. Ogden, Esq., President of the Canal Bank. He left his house on Tuesday morning last, about 11 o'clock, where he had been engaged for some hours about his garden, and remarked when he started that he was going out to ride on horseback. Since that time his family have not seen him.

It appears he was traced to Bach's Garden in Faubourg Bouligny, and was shortly afterwards seen riding up the river road [illegible] on a grey mare. Late in the evening the mare was picked up on the Shell Road, near the Lake, the bridle dragging along upon the ground and broken. Search was made yesterday in the swamps and along the Lake, but nothing was found of the body nor any clue to the mystery.—The search will be resumed to-day, and by reference to an advertisement in another column it will be seen that a reward of $200 has been offered for his body.

As a matter of course, conjecture was busy yesterday in accounting for this mysterious disappearance. On examining his accounts at the Bank, as we were informed late last evening, every thing was found straight, and the general supposition is that he was either thrown from his horse and drowned in the canal or lake, or else murdered and his body secreted.

It will be noticed that the accounts of Mr. Ogden had been examined and found correct at the Bank.

A Washington correspondent of the N. York Courier expresses the opinion, that the rumor of the cession of California to the United States, is well founded, and adds:

"It is understood that the District of California was offered by the Mexican Government to that of Great Britain in payment of a debt amounting to about $60,000,000, but as that government has a mortgage upon the custom house duties of Vera Cruz, which is the principal port of entry for Mexico, it declined the cession. This information is believed to be correct, as it was rumored in the best informed circles in the city of Mexico, and believed to be derived from a source entitled to the fullest credit. It is well known that Mexico possesses an extent of territory beyond her ability to control. The District of California is densely filled with savage and warlike Indians, and it should not be matter for surprise if Mexico with an exhausted Treasury, knowing her inability to protect and populate this district, should be disposed to cede it in liquidation of the heavy claims of citizens of other nations against her. Should this not be the case, there is no known source from which payment can be expected in her present exhausted fiscal condition."

The office of Sheriff of Oneida.—A few days ago Sheriff Moulton was removed from office for alleged misconduct by Gov. Seward, and Theodore S. Faxton appointed in his place. He had scarcely got well agoing in business when he was removed by Gov. Bouck, and a supersedeas was served upon him by his sucessor, I. S. Parker, of Rome.

Decision under the Compromise Act.—A mercantile firm at Norfolk, in Virginia, imported a cargo of Sugar, during the month of July last. This was previous to the passage of the recent Tariff Act, and during the time that the Treasury department claimed the right to collect an ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. under the Compromise Act. In this case the importers refused to pay any duty, and the United States brought a suit to recover the 20 per cent. ad valorem. The case was brought before the Circuit Court of the United States, at Richmond, in Virginia, in which Judges Daniel and Mason, presided.

The Court having taken some days to consider the questions presented, decided that the law was in favor of the United States and directed a judgment to be entered for the amount of duties claimed by them, viz: twenty per centum upon the value of the cargo as appraised at that port; the duties amounted to about $1,100 This is the first case, we believe, in which the question above stated, has been judicially decided.

Our Banks.—We learn that the amount of specie now in the vaults of the Banks of this city, is about $4,500,000, while the circulation of bank notes is less than two millions of dollars. This partly accounts for the scarcity of money, of which many complaints are still heard. The banks do not feel authorised to increase their circulation, because much of the coin in their vaults comes under the head of special deposites.

The Bank of Louisiana has in its vaults, specie amounting to 2,040,000 dollars, while her notes in circulation are only for the sum of $150,000.—N. O. Cour. Dec. 29.

The Navy.—A communication from the Secretary of the Navy was presented to the Senate on Friday, showing the entire expense of the Naval establishment for the year 1843, and the number and class of vessels to be employed in the African squadron, with the cost of repairs, the number of officers, seamen and marines, the probable amount of expenses, &c.

The Secretary estimates as follows:—Two sloops of the first class, and four brigs or schooners, the cost of which is $124,212; amount of repairs wear and tear, $40,000; number of officers to be employed, 32; number of petty officers, seamen and marines, 626; annual expenses under all the heads of expenditures, except wear and tear, $241,182; number of guns estimated for the year 1843, 946; total estimated expense of the naval establishment for the year 1843, $6,983,215. The armament of a sloop of war of the first class is as follows: 2 eight inch Paixhan guns, 20 thirty-two pounder medium guns, 80 muskets, 80 pistols, 150 cutlasses, 110 boarding pikes. The armament of a schooner is as follows: 10 thirty-two pound carronades, 40 muskets, 40 pistols, 60 boarding pikes, and 80 cutlasses.

Naval.—We understand that orders have just been received at the naval station to get ready for sea, with all despatch, the frigate Potomac, and the new frigate Cumberland, now lying at the Navy Yard. It is said that the frigate Savannah, in New York, will also be got ready for sea without delay.—Boston Mer. Journal.

Seat of Government.—It is said that a despatch has been received by the packet of the 10th of November, on this interesting subject. Rumor says the choice between Kingston and Montreal was left to the Provincial Government, and that the matter was taken into consideration by the Council, when the division was six to five in favor of Montreal.—Quebec Mercury.

The Prize Fighters.—Gov. Bouck has refused to interpose Executive clemency in the case of the prize fighters, convicted in Westchester county, in this State. He alleges that it is too soon, but if the prisoners show an intention to avoid being parties to future scenes of a similar character, they may expect pardon during the ensuing spring.

Fruits of Temperance.—The number of paupers in Massachusetts is less than it was five years ago. More than half of them, or 7,154 out of 13,688, were made paupers by intemperance, either by themselves or others. The number of State paupers is 5,251, of whom 2,895 are foreigners.

Hard Currency Wages.—One hundred and fifty men are now at work upon a job within a hundred miles of this city, for their meals and shoes for the winter.—Com. Adv.

An Important Case.—The case new before Vice-Chancellor McCoun, in relation to the North American Life and Trust Co., is one of great magnitude. The Receiver, David Leavitt, has made an application to break up what was called the Yates Trust, which was made to T. G. Tal'madge, Wm. Curtis Noyes, and Henry Yates, embracing property assigned of about a million of dollars, to meet the payment of about $600,00 of post notes. If this trust is set aside, then other trusts, of a much larger amount, it is believed, must follow—and the result will be that a large portion of the assets will fall to the stockholders.

Wiskonsan.—The Green Bay Republican says, "The result of the attempt to force the people of this Territory in the formation of a State Government, has most signally failed, and the question is effectually settled for the present. The votes in the counties of Brown, Milwaukie, Racine, Iowa, and Grant, are as follows: For State Government 552; against it, 1754. The majority will be increased 1800 to 2000 against State Government."

Public Printers.—According to a statement in the Madisonian, Messrs. Blair & Rives, of the Globe, have been paid for public printing, since 1832, the sum of $613,943 33. The correspondent who makes this expose, adds:—"It is rumored that the proprietors have salted down about $300,000 in Treasury Notes, drawing 6 per cent. interest, bating, perhaps, what of that amount they may have transferred to the 10 per cent. stock of Missouri.

Mr. Barnard stated in a speech in Congress, that in the United States, 90 out of every 100 who buy and sell become bankrupts; in England 35 out of every 100.—In the United States the creditors received an average of about 8 per cent. from the estates of insolvents; in England, they receive about 55 per cent.

Take care of your Highways.—The town of Westbrook, in Maine, has recently been obliged in due course of law, to pay $1,500 damages for injuries to Geo. W. Smith, in being thrown from a gig by a heap of gravel left on the wheel way of the road in the evening, for the repair of the road.

No punishment, or penalty could be more just; and the law applies to city streets as well as to country roads.

On the evening of the 11th ult., while Isaac Parrit and family, of Steuben, Me., were going to meeting, leaving none at home but his wife and an elderly lady, a young Bear, about half grown, came to the house, and finding the outside cellar door open, he entered, and seeing good accommodations, he began to help himself, and was particularly fond of some fish in the inner part of the cellar. Mrs. Parrit hearing the intruder, and wishing to learn his character and occupation, took her light and went down the inside door, and to her great surprise discovered the plunderer. When Mr. Parrit came home, Bruin paid the penalty of his impudence, with his life.

More Mormons.—The ship Emerald, from Liverpool, brought a batch of 148 Mormon emigrants to this city yesterday. We wish them a safe arrival at Nauvoo, and hope they may meet with no detention to prolong their stay in this region.—N. O. Picayune.

Rev. Robert Baird.—This gentleman who returned to the United States in the Britannia, was in this city yesterday, and last evening made some interesting statements before a Brooklynn audience, relative to the operations of the Foreign Evangelical Society in Europe. He did not go much into detail, but gave a general view of the progress of evangelical christianity in continental Europe, which is such as to afford much ground for encouragement, on the whole. Mr. B. stated that the society's operations were yet in their infancy there.—In France the reception of the news of a library of religious books being presented to the frigate Belle Poule, on the occasion of her visiting this country, had excited considerable attention, and had been noticed even by the political press. In Italy, protestant influence was introduced with difficulty. The news from Spain was as unexpected in its character as it was gratifying; and the society were receiving encouragement to prosecute their operations, openly and unmolested, from a quarter which could avail them much amid the anarchy that prevailed in that distracted country.

Turkey Hunters.—It is stated in the Hannibal (Mo.) Journal that Mr. Dickinson, of the Bay Mill, killed at a single shot, a few days ago, seven Turkeys out of a gang of nine, all of which were secured. He had baited a trench for them; and his gun was loaded with squirrel shot. When picked, the seven turkeys weighed one hundred and thirty-three pounds—an average of nineteen pounds each.

Distinction conferred on a Jew.—A Jewish banker (M. Cohn, of Antwerp.) has been nominated Knight of the Spanish Order of Isabella. O tempora! O mores! The country, in which a Jew, some scores of years back, could not set his foot without being burnt alive, now decorates a Jew with an order!—Voice of Jacob.

Sound Doctrine.—The printers will vociferously applaud the following from the Miller paper, the Midnight Cry. It speaks thus:—"We feel it a religious duty to pay our printers and paper makers daily, if possible, that Christ may not come and find us keeping back the hire of the laborer."

Nelson Hackett.—We have ascertained from one of the Senators of the State of Arkansass, through a friend at Washington, that Nelson Hackett, the fugitive slave who was given up by Sir Charles Bagot, the Governor General of Canada, was taken to Arkansass—there tried for stealing—publicly whipped—then delivered to his master, by whom he has since been sold to some body in Texas.—Anti-Slavery Rep.

The Newspaper Press.—The newspaper and periodical press was then the subject of investigation. In 1832 the political and miscellaneous newspapers of the country numbered about 1200. In 1836 there were about 1500. In the two States of New York and Massachusetts together, with a population of less than 3,000,000, there were published a greater number of newspapers than in Great Britain, with a population of more than 25,000,000.

The five New-England States, together with New York and Pennsylvania, embracing a population of less than 6,000,000, issued more than 750 newspapers, nearly as many as in all Great Britain and France united, with their population of 56,000,000. In the city of New York, 30 out of the 40 newspaper establishments circulated annually more than 30,000,000 of papers. And estimating the entire issues from that city they were found considerably greater than those in the whole United Kingdom of Great Britain.—Abbott's Report.

Extent of the Book Trade.—A memorial to our General Government, presented at the last Session, stated that the number of persons employed in all the various departments of the publishing business in the United States was more than 40,000, of whom 25,000 were operative printers of papers and books; that the amount of business annually done was more than $27,000,000; that there were 12,000,000 of volumes manufactured annually, besides 3,000,000 of numbers of periodicals and 300,000,000 of newspaper sheets, and that the capital invested in these operations was more than $15,000,000.—Ibid.

Not in the Bible.—A correspondent of the Banner and Pioneer writes that the Congregational church in Woodhuen, Ill., after an examination of the subject, have concluded "that infant sprinkling is not found in the Bible;" and have expunged the article relating to it from their articles of faith.—Bap. Reg.

Fire.—The Baptist meeting-house in Coventry, Chenango co., was destroyed by fire on Sunday evening, the 1st inst.—Ibid.

The Steamer Utica made her way up the Hudson last week on Thursday as far as Rhinebeck, but a change of weather put an end to any further experiment, and she returned immediately to Poughkeepsie, lest she should get frozen in.—Ibid.

The Recent Freshet raised the water quite high at Albany. It was 4 feet deep at the Eagle Tavern. Much damage was done in the vicinity of Ithaca, and elsewhere.—Ibid.

An Earthquake was experienced on the 4th inst., at Cincinnatti, which agitated buildings very sensibly. It was felt in North Carolina and Indiana.—Ibid.

The Capture of Monterey, a Mexican town on the coast of California, by Com. Jones, of the U. S. frigate Cayenne, is announced in the New York papers. He demanded the surrender of the place, under the apprehension that war had taken place between the United States and Mexico, from the war spirit of the proclamation issued by Santa Anna. Two days after the capture he learnt that the difficulties between the two countries had been settled, and the place was restored to the authorities in the same condition in which it was surrendered. The indignity will no doubt be forgiven with a proper apology.—Ibid.

The Postage of Letters.—By the last information from Washington, the Postmaster General has advised, in conjunction with the postmasters from N. York and other chief cities, to have the highest postage for any letter put at ten cents, and all letters from members of Congress and heads of department charged to Government.—Ibid.

A petition, addressed to the Common Council of this city, is in circulation, praying that the $1000 which was sent to the sheriff by some unknown person to induce him not to hang Colt, may be secured to the widow of Samuel Adams (who was killed by Colt,) and the infant child of the latter.—*Jour. IN CHANCERY, FIFTH CIRCUIT.

Joseph W. Sexton,
vs.
William R. Burdick,
Noah C. Worth, et. al.

Z. T. BENTLEY,
Comp't, Solicitor.

IN pursuance of a decretal order of the Court of Chancery, made in the above cause, will be sold under the direction of the subscriber at public auction at the Inn of William C. Gage, in De Ruyter, in the county of Madison, on the 8th day of March next, at 1 o'clock, P. M., all that certain piece or parcel of land, situate, lying and being in the village of De Ruyter, and bounded as follows, to wit: Beginning at the east line of the north and south road seventy-five feet north of lands owned by Joshua C. Curtis, formerly conveyed by James Nye, and sold to John March; thence north sixteen feet, thence easterly parallel with the other lots thirty-five feet, thence south eleven feet, thence east five feet to the well, thence south five feet to lands owned by Maxson & Burdick, thence west forty feet to the place of beginning, be the same more or less.—Dated, January 16, 1843.

JOHN FOOTE, Master in Chancery.

No Hoax.

THE SUBSCRIBER would respectfully inform the public generally, that he is manufacturing Cabinet Ware of all descriptions, wanted by the inhabitants in this section of the country, although he cannot boast of his great EXPERIENCE, he having carried on the business only 10 years; yet in that time he has learned that basswood, does not make as good and durable posts and draw fronts for Bureaus, as well seasoned cherry does; although there is in this section, pine and basswood in abundance, thrown together something in the shape of a Bureau, but it is not, and cannot be done in his shop, nor under his superintendence. The Subscriber intends that all Cabinet Wares sold by him, shall be made in a good workmanlike manner, and of thoroughly seasoned lumber, and will be sold on as good terms, as can be had at any well established shop in this, or any of the neighboring villages. His shop is in the east corner of LaFayette block, No. 3, Cortland street.

Ready Made Coffins.

THE SUBSCRIBER having long regretted the too high charges made for COFFINS and funeral services in this place, and at the request of many citizens, has made, and will keep on hand, a full assortment of Coffins, from the largest to the smallest size.

A HEARSE WILL BE IN READINESS

at all times, and he pledges himself that his charges shall be as low as in any of the neighboring villages.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

By virtue of a writ of Fi Fa, issued out of the Supreme Court of Judicature of the State of New York, and to me delivered, against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of Joseph Mitchell, in my bailiwick, I have levied on all that certain piece or parcel of land, being and lying in the town of De Ruyter, county of Madison, and State of New York, and bounded as follows, to wit:—On the north and north-east by the highway and lands owned by Miles T. Wooley, on the east by lands of William Russell, on the south by lands of Isaac DeLamater, and on the west by lands owned by George W. Case, containing 175 acres of land, be the same more or less: which I shall expose for sale as the law directs at the house now kept by John Beach, in the Quaker Basin Flats, two miles east of De Ruyter village, on Thursday, the 16th of February next, at 1 o'clock P. M. Dated, De Ruyter, January 2, 1843.

ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE.

BY virtue of an order of the Surrogate of the county of Madison, made and entered on the 30th day of November, 1842, the undersigned administratrix and administrator of the personal estate of Franklin Coon, late of Brookfield, in said county, deceased, will sell at public vendue, at the dwelling house of the deceased in Brookfield, aforesaid, on the 24th day of January, 1843, all the right and interest held by the deceased at the time of his death, in and to all that certain piece or parcel of land, situate in Brookfield aforesaid, in the 15th township, and bounded as follows: On the north by land owned by Samuel H. Coon, west by lands of Thomas York, and Elisha Randall, on the south by lands of John I. Morgan, and Dewit C. Coon, on the east by land of David Hinkley, containing one hundred and fifty-eight acres of land, more or less; on which there is one dwelling house, two barns and carriage house, and an apple orchard, of from fifty to one hundred trees, about one hundred and twenty-five acres of which is cleared, or improved land, and the residue timbered land. The premises will be sold subject to the payment of a mortgage or share of a mortgage, held by John I Morgan which covers about ninety acres of the south and east part of said premises and on which there is supposed to be due and chargable to said premises about nine hundred dollars. The sale will be made free and discharged of dower, and will commence at one o'clock in the afternoon. Terms of sale will be made known on the day of sale.—Dated Brookfield, December 2, 1842.

This institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

What is Economy!

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers, and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business, in the shop formerly occupied by S. M. House, over I. R. Cook's jewelry store, one door east of E. D. Jenck's store, in all its various branches, where they will be happy to wait on customers on the shortest notice. Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done up in a style not surpassed by any of the "Craft" in this "village or county;" and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

New and Great Invention

FRANCIS' HIGHLY IMPROVED MANIFOLD WRITER.—By this wonderful invention a letter and duplicate can be written in one operation, with more ease and greater facility than a single letter with an ordinary pen and ink.

To the mercantile, professional and traveling part of community, this truly great invention is of infinite value, as it is a great saving of time, trouble and expense. The principal advantage to be derived from the manifold writer is, that a copy of any document may be kept without any additional trouble to the inkstand or pen. The instrument used for writing is an agate point, consequently it never wears by use. For banks, insurance offices, merchants, men of business generally, lawyers, postmasters, editors, reporters, public officers, and all who are desirous of preserving copies of their letters, documents, &c., with an immense saving of time, and the satisfaction of having an exact copy of what they have written, this will be found invaluable.

Francis' manifold writer has now been in successful operation two years, during which time the proprietor has had the pleasure of receiving the unfeigned approbation of all whose observations it has come under. At the late fair of the American Institute, the merits of the article were examined into by three of the most able chemists in the country, who pronounced it to be a very ingenious and useful contrivance, and not liable to change color by exposure to air, moisture, or chemical agents.—Consequently a medal was awarded by the institute.

The proprietor has lately made great improvements in this article. The paper is of the best quality manufactured in the United States, being made for the manifold writer expressly to his order. The ruling of them, which has for some time been thought impossible, has at length been brought to perfection, for which a copy right has been secured. The copying books are bound in a variety of forms and sizes, varying in price from 50 cents and upwards.

Stationers and country merchants in general will find it to their advantage to procure the article, as they meet with a ready sale. A liberal deduction made to those who buy by the wholesale.

Newspapers or magazines throughout the country, copying the above entire, without abridgement, (including this notice,) and giving it twelve inside insertions, shall receive a copy subject to their order by sending a paper containing the advertisement to the office of the subscriber.

A BOOK FOR EVERY FAMILY IN THE UNITED STATES

AGENTS WANTED.

ONE Hundred Dollars given for every one hundred copies sold!—Agents—responsible men—wanted in every town and village throughout the United States and British Provinces, to sell 'Sears' Bible Biography,' the most splendidly illustrated and Cheapest work ever issued on the American Continent, containing several hundred Engravings, entirely new and original, designed and executed by the most eminent artists of England and America. Cost of preparing the work, $5000. This beautiful and important work contains upwards of 500 pages royal octavo, is printed from new stereotype plates, handsomely bound in gilt, and lettered, and retails readily at the low price of $2 50 per volume. The following extract is from a lengthy Review, written by the Rev. W. C. Brownlee, D. D., and is only one out of several hundred recommendations, from the clergy and the press, that the work has already received:

New-York, August 6, 1842.

"This splendid quarto, one of the most elegant books ever presented to our fellow citizens in this Republic. It ought to be in every Christian family for its innate value; and in every patriotic family as a splendid specimen of our progress in domestic manufactures, and the advancement of our artists and manufacturers in their rivalship with those of Europe. W. C. BROWNLEE."

A very liberal Offer!—One Hundred Dollars will be given by the Publisher to every Agent who will undertake and sell One Hundred Copies of the above Work. He believes that there is scarcely a town or village in the Union, but that numbers may easily be disposed of.

⁂ Persons enclosing money, will be careful to pay the whole postage; and in ordering books will state, explicitly, how the books shall be sent to them.

Also, in press, another important, valuable, and cheap work, in the course of publication, and will be ready for delivery early in October, 1842, complete in one volume royal octavo, containing about 600 pages of letter-press, and more than five hundred Engravings, elegantly bound in gilt; price only $2 50 per copy.

POETRY.

The Yankee Girl.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

She sings by her wheel, at that low cottage door,
Which the long evening shadow is stretching before,
With a music as sweet as a music which seems,
Breathed softly and faint in the ear of our dreams.

How brilliant and mirthful the light of her eye,
Like a star glancing out from the blue of the sky,
And lightly and freely her dark tresses play
O'er a brow and a bosom as lovely as they!

Who comes in his pride to that low cottage door;
The haughty and rich to the humble and poor?
'Tis the great southern planter; the master who waves
His whip of dominion o'er hundreds of slaves.

"Nay, Ellen—for shame! Let those Yankee fools spin,
Who would pass for our slaves with a change of their skin;
Let them toil as they will at the loom or the wheel,
Too stupid for shame, and too vulgar to feel!

But thou art too lovely and precious a gem
To be bound to their burdens and sullied by them—
For shame! Ellen, shame! cast thy bondage aside,
And away to the South, as my blessing and pride.

Oh, come where no winter thy footsteps can wrong,
But where flowers are blossoming all the year long,
Where the shade of the palm tree is over my home,
And the lemon and orange are white in their bloom!

Oh, come to my home, where my servants shall all
Depart at thy bidding and come at thy call;
They shall heed thee as mistress with trembling and awe,
And each wish of thy heart shall be felt as a law."

Oh, could ye have seen her—that pride of our girls;
Arise and cast back the dark wealth of her curls,
With a scorn in her eye which the gazer could feel,
And a glance like the sunshine that flashes on steel!

Go back, haughty Southron! thy treasures of gold
Are dim with the blood of the hearts thou hast sold;
Thy home may be lovely, but round it I hear
The crack of the whip and the footsteps of fear!

And the sky of the South may be brighter than ours,
And greener thy landscapes, and fairer thy flowers;
But, dearer the blast around our mountains which raves,
Than the sweet summer zephyrs which breathes over slaves!

Full low at thy bidding thy negroes may kneel,
With the iron of bondage on spirit and heel;
Yet know that the Yankee Girl sooner would be
In fetters with them, than in freedom with thee!"

ZELIMA OR THE MANIAC OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

I was in Constantinople during the feast called Benish. I had understood that on such occasions the Sultan was generally accompanied by a mad woman; the insane enjoying a sort of veneration with the Turks who consider them inspired by the prophet, and on that account never attempt to contradict them. But though prepared to see such an unfortunate person exhibiting her madness for the edification of the faithful, I was startled by the appearance of the poor creature herself, who came singing and dancing in the train of the ruler of the East.

She was in rags; yet even in them she affected a display of elegance which might have occasioned a smile, had not the moving cause been of so melancholy a nature. Her face was uncovered, contrary to the Mahomedan custom, and although disfigured by sorrow, age and filth, distorted by an affected mirth, and occasionally darkened by rage, her countenance still bore evident marks of former beauty. She seemed harmless to all around her, but whenever she saw a female in European or Greek dress, she became outrageous.—She foamed at the mouth, screamed and yelled; calling them, whether young or old 'old woman,' and unless they made a hasty retreat among the crowd or into some neighboring house, she would beat them unmercifully with a thick cudgel which she seemed to carry for no other purpose.

The latter circumstance particularly excited my attention. I suspected that to some European female she attributed her misfortunes, and my conjecture proved to be well founded.

I lodged in the house of a Greek priest, and on my return home I inquired of him whether he knew any particulars respecting the poor maniac who had accompanied the Sultan to the Benish.

'I do,' he replied. 'I know her history from beginning to the end; and although an unbeliever and an enemy to the christian name, I cannot help pitying her fate. She has suffered in the dearest relations of life; she has lost her country, her husband & her children. From wealth & rank she has sunk into misery the most abject. With less ardent passions, it is true,' continued the venerable old man, 'she would have avoided some of the calamities that have assailed her; and with a mind more tractable, and a heart open to conviction of truth, she might still have been a happy woman.' 'But,' added he, 'which of us is free from passion, pride and obstinacy. He who is the framer of all minds and hearts, alone knows the cause of this perverseness of man! But you are curious to learn her tale.

Zelima is a native of the Krimea, and the daughter of rich and powerful parents. Ali, a youth equal to her in rank and fortune, demanded her in marriage, and she became his. There could not be a happier couple. Contrary to Mahomedan custom, Ali, confined his affections to her exclusively; she was the sole and undivided mistress of his heart and his harem; and she rewarded his love by a warmth of attachment known only in our southern regions. But unmixed happiness is seldom of long duration.

Russia declared war against the Porte. Ali wished to share the glory of his country and fight for the independence of his province(then still under the Crescent) possession of which, he well knew was the aim of their Muscovite neighbors.—Zelima would not resist his noble desire; women delight in courage. He went, and left Zelima in mortal anguish respecting his safety; she became more composed when she heard of the wonders achieved by his bravery. At the expiration of some months his return is announced to her. A slave, with a countenance overcast by sorrow, informs her that Ali would soon be with his beloved Zelima. In her joy she does not perceive the gloominess of his aspect. At last she questions him; tears are his answer. 'What! is Ali free?' she exclaims. 'Yes;' replied the faithful servant, 'but at what a price!' At this moment the door is open, Ali appears, pale despair in his countenance. 'All is over,' he cries, 'the glory of our country is gone—the Sultan is no longer our master!'—'Then,' exclaimed Zelima, whose courage seemed to increase with increasing difficulties, 'then let us fly a land where the prophet is no longer acknowled. Let us go to Constantinople, and take our treasures with us. 'No!' said Ali; 'I am a prisoner on parole; I gave my word to the victorious general, who in an hour's time will be with us with his family.'—'What, and do you offer hospitality to the destroyer of our country? Rather let us meet a thousand deaths!' 'I gave my word.' 'And I cried Zelima relieve you of it!—I go with my sons—will you abandon us? Our love is more than all oaths'—'No I dare not go, and you also stay, I command it!' 'What strange language!' she exclaims, 'command!' is it thus that the man speaks who hitherto knew no wish but Zelima's?' From this moment her peace was destroyed, she refused the caresses of her spouse, and shut herself up to weep in solitude. In the mean time the foreign general arrived. Ali showed him every respect due to so illustrious a guest; and the friendly intercourse thus created between them, in some measure assuaged the grief that oppessed him.

In the meantime, however, he made attempts to appease Zelima, but he found her inexorable. Still he hoped to soften her asperity, whilst on the other hand every day increased her hatred. The man who could purchase his freedom by subserviency to the conqueror of his country, the enemy of his natural sovereign and his faith, she felt she could love no longer. And to be commanded by such a man, her pride could not forgive. However, she is a wife and mother; she curbs her fiery spirit and consents to be again his, if he will follow her; otherwise he must renounce her forever. He again repeats that honor admits of no subterfuge; and the following midnight she leaves her harem, rushes through the gardens, unlocks a back door that leads into the fields, and from that moment every trace of her is lost.—The following words were written on her table; 'He who cannot prefer his wife to every thing in the world, is undeserving of love. Ali farewell forever.'

She however fled to Constantinople, in hopes of meeting with redress from the Sultan; but she was told that it was impossible. Upon this she retired to Scutari, where attended only by her old nurse, who had never forsaken her, she secluded herself for the period of twelve months.

During this she found time to meditate on her situation; she began to perceive that she had acted contrary to every duty; she thought of her husband in the halcyon time of their love; she thought of her tender babes bereft of the cares of a mother—all her affections were rekindled—'Let us go back Fatima,' she cried with sobs; 'let me again clasp my babes to my breast, let me ambrace my Ali's knees—he will see the reality of my returning love, and will not spurn me.'

In a few days they were embarked; and with a brisk gale that seemed to favor Zelima's impatience, they flew through the Bosphorus. She again set her foot on her native land, and dreaming only of happiness, she again slipped through the postern which had favored her flight. Silently did she enter the room in which Ali had so often assured her of the eternity of his love. She saw him in company with a handsome Russian woman, who was teaching her own little ones to stammer the sweet name of mother. Zelima rushed upon them like a fury, snatched the innocent ones from the knees of their new mother, and drew forth a dagger to murder her. A slave who fell in her arms, received the blow destined for the heart of her rival. It was with some dificulty that she was secured; but madened with despair she seized a torch, and setting her harem on fire, fled a second time, more wretched than ever; for jealousy and remorse were now added to her woes.

Still however, bent on revenge, she again returned to Constantinople. This time she was more fortunate than before; she contrived to be seen by the Sultan; who struck by her beauty, ordered her to be brought for his harem. This was the object of her wishes, for she now felt assured that her wrongs would be avenged. But she soon discovered her error; the Sultan informed her that he had no longer any power over Ali, who, added he, by the laws of Mahomed is entitled to change wives. The hope of revenge was the only power which had yet sustained her ardent mind; and not prepared for such a blow, it sank under it. Her reason, so long under the control of passion, now entirely left her; her beauty and her health decayed with it; and all the art of the physician proved fruitless to restore her. Ali is still in the Krimea; he has adopted our faith and married a Russian lady, whose gentleness has healed his wounded heart, and left him no room to regret the loss of the violent Zelima, yet still he often thinks of the companion of his youth, and never without a sigh at her unhappy fate.

EFFECTS OF EXPANSION.

A cannon ball, when heated, cannot be made to enter an opening through which, when cold, it passes rapidly. A glass stopper sticking fast in the neck of a bottle, may be released by surrounding the neck with a cloth taken out of warm water, or by immersing the bottle up to the neck. The binding ring is thus heated, and expanded sooner than the stopper, and so becomes slack, or loose upon it. Pipes for conveying hot water, steam, hot air, &c., if of considerable length, must have joinings that allow a degree of shortening and lengthening, otherwise a change of temperature may destroy them. An incompetent person undertook to warm a large manufactory by steam from one boiler. He laid a rigid main pipe along a passage, and opened latteral branches through holes into the several apartments—but on his first admitting the steam, the expansion of the main pipe tore it away from all its branches. In an iron railway, a gate which, during a cold day, may be loose, and easily shut or opened in a warm day may stick, owing to there being greater expansion of it and of the neighboring railing than of the earth on which they are placed. Thus, also, the centre of the arch of an iron bridge is higher in warm than in cold weather; while on the contrary, in a suspension or chain bridge, the centre is lowered. The iron pillars now so much used to support the front walls of the houses, of which the ground stories serve as shops with spacious windows, in warm weather really lift up the wall which rests upon them, and in cold weather allow it again to sink or subside in a degree considerably greater than if the wall were brick from top to bottom. The pitch of a piano forte is lowered in a warm room, owing to the expansion of the strings being greater than the wooden framework; and in a cold day the reverse will happen. A harp or piano, which is well tuned in the morning drawing room, can not be perfectly in tune when the crowded evening party has heated the room. Bell wires, too slack in summer, may be of the proper length in winter.

There exists a most extraordinary exception, already mentioned, to the law of expansion by heat, and contraction by cold, producing unspeakable benefits in nature—namely, in the case of water. Water contracts, according to the same law, only down to the temperature of forty degrees, while from that to thirty-two degrees, which is the freezing point, it again dilates. A very curious consequence of this peculiarity is exhibited in the walls of the glaciers of Switzerland and elsewhere, that when once a pool or shallow well on the ice commences, it goes on quickly deepening itself until it penetrates to the earth beneath.—Supposing the surface of the water originally to have nearly the temperature of the melting ice, or thirty-two degrees, but to be afterwards heated by the air and sun, instead of the water being thereby dilated, or specially higher and detained at the surface, it becomes heavier the more nearly it is heated to forty degrees, and therefore sinks down to the bottom of the pit or well, but there, by dissolving some of the ice, and being consequently cooled, it is again rendered lighter, and raises, to be heated as before, again to descend; and this circulation and digging can not cease until the water has bored its way quite through.—Dr. Arnot.

Tuck in your Ruffles.—"Tuck in your ruffles, Thomas; we have a few nails to make," said a blacksmith to his son, as he came from school, at twelve o'clock.—Thomas tucked in his ruffles and took off his coat, and was a blacksmith until he earned his dinner, and then ate it with a good relish. "Pull out your ruffles, Thomas; it is school time now," said the father.—Thomas expected it, and felt as happy with his ruffles tucked in, as his playmates at their play.

It would be no bad action, "in these hard times," for many a young man to tuck in his ruffles, and swing an axe, or hold a plow, or make a nail—for many a young man, whose expectation of riches from the gains of trade, are sadly disappointed, to earn a living by some calling which the world honors less, but pays better—some humble occupation, which, while it holds out no delusive hope of immense wealth, by a single speculation, assures him of food and raiment.

We would here recommend agriculture, in a special manner. Not such farming as consists in first running in debt for lands, mortgaging them back for payment, then borrowing money to put up fine buildings, and then hiring men to put on the farm—no! this is not the way. But lay your own shoulder to the wheel—tuck in your ruffles, and earn your bread by the sweat of your brow. It will be the sweetest you ever ate.

Cheap Regeneration.—The following from the Sun, (says the Glasgow Post,) sounds profanely, but with whom does the profanity lie—with the church or the newspaper writer?—

'A Westbury correspondent of the Wilts Independent says: "One of our clergy the other day, when about to marry a couple, ascertained that they had not been baptized, and accordingly expressed his determination not to marry them unless they submitted to the ordnance, and further stated that his charge would be one shilling each. The man said he had only brought three pence with him, and this being the case, the clergyman consented to baptize, and thus regenerate him for that sum!"—There is a cool, business-like air about this transaction, anything but creditable to the clergyman engaged in it. Conceive a person first standing out for a shilling baptismal-fee, and then, finding he can not get it, lowering his terms, and administering three penn'orth of spiritual regeneration! Far better he had regenerated on tic, for then, at least, he would have avoided the the scandal of making the affair one of mere pounds, shillings and pence! By the bye, we trust that in his next tariff Sir Robert Peel will give the church a turn, as he has done the agriculturists, and lower the duties on all ecclesiastical matter. We have now got cheap turbot, why should we not get cheap regeneration?'

END OF THE APOSTLES.

Matthew.—This apostle and evangelist is supposed to have suffered martyrdom, or was slain with a sword at the city of Ethiopia.

Mark.—This evangelist was dragged through the streets of Alexandria, in Egypt, until he expired.

Luke.—This evangelist was hanged upon an olive tree, in Greece.

John.—This apostle and evangelist was put into a cauldron of boiling oil, at Rome, and escaped death. He afterwards died a natural death at Ephesus, in Asia.

Peter.—This apostle was crucified at Rome, with his head downwards, at his own request, thinking himself unworthy to die in the same posture and manner as his blessed Master.

James, the Great.—This apostle was beheaded at Jerusalem.

James, the Less.—This apostle was thrown from a pinnacle, or wing of the Temple, and then beaten to death with a fuller's club.

Philip.—This apostle was hanged up against a pillar at Hierapolis, a city of Phrygia.

Bartholomew.—This apostle was flayed alive, by the command of a barbarous king.

Andrew.—This apostle was bound to a cross, whence he preached to the people till he expired.

Thomas.—This apostle was run through the body with a lance, at Coromandel, in the East Indies.

Jude.—This apostle was shot to death with arrows.

Simon.—Zealot.—This apostle was crucified in Persia.

Matthias.—This apostle was first stoned, and then beheaded.

Barnabus.—This apostle of the Gentiles was stoned to death by the Jews, at Salania.

Paul.—This apostle was beheaded at Rome, by the tyrant Nero.—Exchange paper.

Power of Music.—Prince Cantmir, in his account of the transactions of the Ottomans, relates that Sultan Amurath having besieged Bagdad, and taken it, ordered 30,000 Persians to be put to death, though they had yielded and laid down their arms. Amongst these unfortunate victims was a musician, who besought the executioner to spare him one moment that he might speak to the Emperor. He appeared before the Sultan and was permitted to give a specimen of his art. He took up a kind of psaltery, which resembles a lyre, and has six sides, and accompanied the sounds of the Instrument with his voice. He sang the taking of Bagdad and the triumph of Amurath; its pathetic and exulting sounds melted even Amurath who suffered the musician to proceed, till, overpowered with harmony, tears of pity gushed from his eyes, and he revoked his cruel orders.—Influenced by the musician's powerful talent, he not only ordered the lives of the prisoners to be spared, but restored them to liberty. Stradella, the celebrated composer, was attacked by three desperadoes, who had been hired to assassinate him; but fortunately, they had ears sensible to harmony. While waiting for a favorable opportunity to execute their designs, they entered the church of St. John de Lateran, during the performance of an oratorio, composed by the very man whom they intended to destroy, and were so affected by the music that they abandoned their design, and even waited on the musician to apprise him of his danger. Stradella, however, was not always so fortunate; other assassins, who apparently had no ears for music stabbed him some time afterwards at Genoa, and thus afforded a practical illustration of Shakespear's observation, that.

"The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils:
The motions of his spirit are dull as night,
And his affections dark as Erebus!
Let no such man be trusted."

Small Beginning—Important Results.—In 1907 a gentleman gave a poor woman, in Western New York, a copy of Doddridge's Rise and Progress. It became the means of her conversion. This induced her to loan it to others, and they too were converted. This led to the formation of a church. This church is now prosperous, and may prove a rallying point for thousands of converts in coming generations. The persons who gave that volume learned the results already apparent, thirty years afterwards. How delightful must have been his surprise. Cast thy bread upon the waters—thou shalt find it after many days.

A pedlar sold a religious book. Baxter read it, and it proved the instrument of his conversion. Doddridge was converted by the writings of Baxter—Wilberforce by a work of Doddridge—Leigh Richmond by Wilberforce's Practical View, and thousands by the Dairyman's Daughter of Richmond. The whole fabric of society is interwoven with such claims of influence.—How little do we appreciate the good or harm we are doing.

Extracts From Carlow.

Mr. Ward would make the day to begin at midnight, and to end at midnight, according to the Roman account and not according to the scripture, and though I am not willing to contend about terms what is the natural and what the artificial day, yet I may not admit the days of the week to be any other than what God at first fixed in the scriptures, that is the evening and the morning. It is true the day as distinguished from the night, begins in the morning and ends in the evening, and the night or darkness as distinguished from the day, begins in the evening and ends in the morning, but the whole day consisted of evening and morning, that is, night and day; and we find in Gen. i. 3. That when light was created let there be light. Verse 4. God divided the light from the darkness.—Verse 5. And God called the light day, and the darkness he called night, and the evening and the morning were the first day. And so the light was the day and the darkness the night, as distinguished from one another; but one day, or the first day of the week consisted of evening and morning, that is, of darkness and light, which was the first day; and so, verse 8, the evening and the morning were the second day, and verse 13, the evening and the morning were the third day, and verse 19, the evening and the morning were the fourth day, and verse 23, the evening and the morning were the fifth day, and verse 31, the evening and the morning were the sixth day, and the seventh day God rested or sabbatized, Gen. ii. 2, 3, where the seventh day is thrice mentioned, and God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, or made it holy, which making it holy, I think, resolves the main question, which day of the week should be kept for the Sabbath, consisting of evening and morning, that is, of darkness and light, and so beginning in the evening and ending the evening after, is the plain appointed and fixed time for the Sabbath, and our reckoning of days here is according to scripture as Mr. Ward acknowledges.

And as to the time when the Sabbath doth begin, I conceive it is not to be at midnight, nor to end at midnight after, as Mr. Ward says, when we generally are asleep, according to the reckoning of this Kingdom and the Papist, or at noon as the Gipsies count, nor in the morning when we usually rise, as upon other days, and so ends at night when we go to bed, as upon other days as others reckon, but upon the evening before, and so to the evening after, as the Lord reckons the day to begin and end, Gen. i. 5, 8, 13, 19, 23, 31, and Gen. ii. 1, 2, 3, and I do no where find that first distribution of day altered, or distributed by God, wherein Mr. Shephard in the latter end of his book, about the beginning and ending of the Sabbath, has done very well; I refer the reader who makes any doubt thereof.

But whilst they are confounded in their languages like Babel's builders, laboring with much difficulty to find some beginning of man's Sabbath, behold the lively oracle of God's unchangeable seventh day Sabbath, opening all prison doors, breaking all bars, untying all knots, so that manifest its night was the beginning of time before any light appeared, and this darkness with the ensuing light compleated the first day, and the second day, third, fourth, fifth and sixth days, wherein the Almighty finished the whole fabrick of Heaven and Earth, and no sooner did the sixth day's sun cease, but ELOHIM ceased to shew his power in creation, and withdrawing himself, he immediately sanctified the seventh day for the Sabbath, in delighting himself with full satisfaction in the pure and spotless works of his hands, for as yet sin had not spoiled the creature; but whilst Jehovah celebrated his Sabbath with man, for whom it was made, Mark ii. 27, 28. Lo the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy, Job xxxviii. 7. So that here the Lord's Sabbath without the least loss of time exactly begins when the sixth day's sun, the world's creation ends.

And therefore such as desire to be holy, as God is holy, 1 Pet. i. 15, must not only observe the seventh day Sabbath, but begin this holy rest as God commands, that is, when the sixth day's circuit of the sun shews us its time to cease from earthly labors, as Jehovah in his royal law hath proposed himself for our example; this hath been the course of believers, I suppose it will scarcely be questioned in Moses's time, since even the ceremonial Sabbaths, because honored as Sabbaths, were to be observed from even unto even shall ye celebrate the Sabbath. So after the Jews were carried to Babylon for slighting the Sabbath, did honest Nehemiah set to the exact observance of this day, by causing Jerusalem's gates to be shut before the Sabbath even whilst the declining sixth day sun, by descending on the mountains surrounding Jerusalem, cast some obscurity upon the city gates, a good example for earthly minds, who will not leave their servile labor till the last minute, but perhaps allow themselves liberty to do some household business after the Sabbath's beginning; we lie under equal engagements at least with ancient Israel, which should oblige us to such evening sacrifice, as appears to be their custom by that Psalm designed for the Sabbath, It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord, and to praise thy name O most high, to shew forth thy loving kindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night, Psalm xcii. 1, 2. This sacrifice very well becomes Christians, and so the disciples of Christ began the Sabbath, and so the Lord's ancient people celebrate the Sabbath, so that it is abundantly manifest that from even to even is to be kept, thus the Jews constantly observe it, and thus all faithful Christians ought to sanctify it, who by scripture authority are set free from all that confusion and contention, which as a scourge from God perplexeth the observers of their supposed first day Sabbath, who know not when to begin, nor when to make an end; thus you may see what confusion they are in who say the Sabbath is changed from the seventh day to the first, and yet observe neither, but part of the first day and part of the second, for they say their Sabbath begins at midnight, and some say it begins in the morning, when a part of the first day is spent, and they end at midnight or in the morning, when part of the second day is spent, and yet they will have this to be a Sabbath, yea, and a first day Sabbath.

From the American Messenger.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE PRESS IN THE REFORMATION.

Just three centuries and a quarter ago, an obscure mendicant monk approached the Castle of Wittemberg, and nailed to the church-door a paper containing ninety-five theological propositions. They would only have served, perhaps, as the death-warrant of their bold author, but for the wonderful Providence that gave wings to the seeds of truth they contained, by which they were scattered over the whole field of the Church. The press spread these with the rapidity of lightning. "In the space of a fortnight," says a contemporary historian, "they had spread over Germany, and within a month they had ran through all christendom, as if angels themselves had been the bearers of them to all men."

Wherever this Tract of Luther's went, "it shook the very foundations of proud Rome; threatened with instant ruin the walls, gates, and pillars of the Papacy; stunned and terrified its champions, and at the same time awakened from the slumber of error many thousands of men." It was one of a wide series of triumphs achieved by the truth of God, apprehended by a master mind, and proclaimed through the only channel by which the world could have been aroused from the death-like sleep of centuries.

It is a fact worthy of notice, in passing, that three Reformations are linked together by the mysterious art of writing and printing. An eminent historian (Turner.) informs us that "as the writings of Wickliffe made John Huss the Reformer of Bohemia, so the writings of John Huss led Martin Luther to be the Reformer of Germany: so extensive and so incalculable are the consequences which sometime follow from human actions."

Tracing the Reformation beyond these first beginnings, D'Aubigne says, "If we except Switzerland, where the preaching of the Gospel had been already heard, the arrival of the Doctor of Wittemberg's writings every where forms the first page in the History of the Reformation. A printer at Basle scattered the first germs of truth.—At the moment when the Roman Pontiff thought to stifle the work in Germany, it began to manifest itself in France, the Low Countries, Italy, Spain, England and Switzerland. Even though the power of Rome should fell the parent stem, the seeds of truth are henceforth spread abroad in all lands."

When the conflict thickened, Luther's voice resounded far and wide. "Three printing-presses were incessantly employed in multiplying copies of his various writings. His discourses passed from hand to hand, through the whole nation, supporting the aged penitent in the confessional—giving courage to the faltering convert in the cloister—and asserting the claims of evangelical truth, even in the abodes of princes."

"The voice of God was now to be heard. The New Testament, in German, was given to the world, and ten thousand sheets a day, from three presses, were issued. In about ten years, previous to 1553, fifty-eight editions were printed and circulated: and the Old Testament soon followed, issued in Tracts or parts, as the Bible originally was, "to make the purchase easy to the poor, who caught at the sheets given to the world as a letter coming to them from heaven."

In 1521 Melancthon issued his Tract, Loci Communes, the design of which was "to present theology as a system of devotion;" and it passed through 67 editions in 74 years, without including translations.—"Next to the Bible, this work may have mainly contributed to the establishment of the evangelical doctrine."

The impulse which the Reformation gave to popular literature in Germany was prodigious. Whilst in 1517 only 37 publications were issued, in 1523, but six years after, 408 were published, 183 of which were from the pen of Luther alone, incredible as it may seem. "Whatever Luther and his friends composed, others disseminated far and wide. Monks, who were too ignorant to be able themselves to proclaim the word of God, traversed the provinces, and visiting the hamlets and cottages, sold them to the people. Germany was ere long overrun with these enterprising colporteurs. The efforts to suppress these writings increased the eagerness of the people to possess them; and when bought they were read with redoubled ardor. By similar means, translations of Luther's works were circulated in France, Spain, England and Italy."

The Swiss Reformers were not slow in learning the power of the press. At an early date, a colporteur named Lucian was employed by Zwingle, on the recommendation of a scholar at Basle, himself "an unwearied propogator of Luther's writings," "to go from city to city, from town to town, from village to village, nay, from house to house, all over Switzerland, carrying with him the writings of Luther. To this expedient was many a Swiss family indebted for the gleam of light that found entrance into their humble dwelling."

If we turn a moment to France, we find the principal Reformer giving her the New Testament in 1521; and when the faithful few were driven from the kingdom, we see them on the borders, consulting on "the importance of scattering the Scriptures and pious writings in their country." "Oh," exclaimed these refugees, "would to God that France were so supplied with Gospel writings, that in cottages and in palaces, in cloisters and in presbyteries, and in the inner sanctuary of all hearts, a powerful witness might be borne for the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ." The presses stationed at Basle were incessantly employed in multiplying French works, which were forwarded to Farel, and by him introduced into France, through colporteurs—"poor men, of good character for piety, who, bearing their precious burden, went through towns and villages, from house to house, knocking at every door." Thus as early as 1524, there existed in Basle, and having France for the field of their operations, a Bible Society, an Association of Colporteurs, and a Religious Tract Society.

This brief review is sufficient to show the estimate in which the press was held by the Reformers; and it furnishes some insight into the means by which that amazing Reformation was achieved, in the blessings of which ten generations of men have rejoiced, and which will be the joy and wonder of all succeeding ages.

There is, however, another mode of illustrating the power of this agency as a means of reformation, by a glance at the efforts made on the part of its enemies to resist and suppress it.

Tetzel, concerned for the fate of the traffic in indulgences, denounced "punishment and disgrace in this world, and condemnation at the great day, to those who scribble so many books and Tracts," as well as to those who "took pleasure in their writings, and circulated them among the people and in society." The Emperor Charles V. issued a decree, ratified by the imperial Diet, that the writings of the Reformers should "not merely be rejected, but destroyed." "You will, therefore," said this mandate to all princes and prelates, "burn, or in other ways utterly destroy them." The Pope issued a bull, approved by the Sacred College, enjoining upon the "bishops to search diligently for the writings of Martin Luther, and to burn them publicly and solemnly, in the presence of the clergy and of the laity." Even Henry VIII. attempting in vain to put down the influence of Luther's writings by his own royal pen, thought the flames a more effective extinguisher, and proceeded in solemn procession, with Cardinal Woolsey and the dignitaries of England and Rome, to St. Paul's Church, to burn the writings of the poor monk of Wittemberg—and, though "his heart did not mean so," to kindle the fires of the Reformation throughout England! In France, the government of Lous XIV. after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, sent dragoons through the kingdom to destroy all the evangelical writings to be found; and so successfully did they prosecute their mission, that they extirpated the christian literature of the French, and with it almost the last vestige of vital piety.

We pause here, without pursuing this mode of illustration through the more familiar history of the Puritan age, when the press came again to the aid of evangelical religion in a period of persecution and oppression, and scattered abroad those spiritual classes which Baxter, Bunyan, Flavel, and their coteemporaries wrote for the common mind, and for universal man.

Has the agency that in the 16th century could wake to life the energies of dormant mind in all the kingdoms of Europe; that excited the alarm and provoked the indignation of Emperors, Popes, and Kings, lest it should end their domination over the consciences of men; that, a century after, enabled a few persecuted men to break again the yoke of semi-papal oppression, give liberty of conscience to England, and bring down the Gospel to the masses of the people; that has ever been the defense of the Church from the assaults of infidelity; has this wonderful engine of light lost its power, now that the trammels of superstition no longer bind its arms, and its arrows, unlike those of a rude age, rough and hastily made, may be the polished shafts chosen from the armories of all ages? In other words, if such wonders were wrought by the press in the infancy of its power, at the darkest period of the dark ages, with only the productions of a few poor monks, and when every thing conspired to diminish its influence, what may not be accomplished by it under God, with all its improvements, with the productions of the best minds of centuries, with a hundred-fold increase in the number of readers, with nothing to oppose but every thing to encourage the fullest employment of all its influence for the extension and up-building of the kingdom of Christ? Shame, shame on the man who would place his hand on the mouth by which the Church may now speak in many more languages than are recorded of the miraculous gift of tongues, and, with more than Reformation power, the words of eternal life, which shall be like the "leaves from the tree of life, for the healing of the nations!"

SHORT METHOD WITH THE UNIVERSALIST.

Mr. Editor:—Universalism takes all the atheists, deists, drunkards, liars, swearers, sabbath-breakers, adulterers, rogues, murderers and every other kind of sinners to Heaven, and if any man deny this, he is not a Universalist. They make the way broad and the gate wide, that leadeth to Heaven, and say all will find it. And fearing our Lord, peradventure, might be right (when he says the gate is straight, and the way narrow that leadeth to Heaven, and few there be that find it,) and they wrong, they deny the existence of a Devil, and have blotted out hell. If they had not done this, Mr. Editor, some of those who die drunkards and cut-throats, by chance, might have staggered out of the way; or through mistake, took the wrong road, the road that leads to hell, and would not be in heaven to annoy those christians that get there.—But if Universalism be true, they will all be there; and if so, I had rather stay on earth (the Universalist's hell,) than to go to such a heaven; because, such a place would be hell itself. And I do not blame those who believe Universalism to be true, for being loth to go to heaven! Who would not dread such a heaven? We will now prove from the word of God that the doctrine of Universalism is false. In doing this we will first prove that some men are sinners. Secondly, that some die sinners. Thirdly, that some have a resurrection unto damnation. Fourthly, that their sins are never forgiven. 1. Some men are sinners. This is clear from 1 John, i. 8—10 v. "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." Again, "If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar." But as the Universalists acknowledge this proposition we proceed:

2. Some men die in their sins; see John 8 ch. 21—31 verses: "Then said Jesus again unto them, I go my way, and ye shall seek me, and shall die in your sins; whither I go, ye cannot come. I said, therefore, unto you, that ye shall die in your sins; for if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins."

3. Some will have a resurrection unto damnation. See John 5th ch. 28, 29th verses: "Marvel not at this" (what I have stated, verse 25, "That the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live; for this is morally and literally true, Lazarus heard his voice and came forth, and all that believe on me though they be morally dead yet shall they live,) for the hour is coming, (he does not add now is) in the which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have evil to the resurrection of damnation." See also Daniel 12 ch. 2d verse: "Some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt."

4. Their sins are never forgiven. See Matt. 12th ch. 32 v. "And whosoever speaketh against the son of man it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaks against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come. See also Mark iii. 29. "But he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost, hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation. Matt. xxv. 46; It is said, "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment." The Apostle Paul has it "banished from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power." It is called by John, the second death. He says the smoke of their torment shall ascend up forever and ever. It is said in God's book that the wicked are to be punished in the lake of fire and brimstone, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. Reader, are you a sinner? if so, be alarmed! death is near, and if you die in your sins, hell will be your eternal doom. May the Lord grant you his Spirit to enable you to flee the wrath to come. JAS. SHANKS.

From the New-York Evangelist.

ORDER IN DIVINE WORSHIP.

There are many reasons which justify and enforce the simplicity of religious worship, as practised by the mass of the population of this country. The Roman and English Episcopalians are left almost alone to the use of burdensome and artificial forms, while Presbyterians and Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists, Reformed Dutch, and Lutherans, retain and preserve a goodly simplicity of worship.—Let us keep that simplicity untarnished.

There is one subject, however, which is important for Christians of every sect and name—we mean a decent reverence and attention in the services of family and public worship. In this, much depends on the pastor. That a people should be accustomed to attend punctually; that they should take as much as possible a uniformity of attitude in singing and prayer; that families should arrange to have all their members seated together; that every pew should be well provided with Bibles and hymn books; that they should learn to restrain their eyes from wandering during the sermon, and especially during the prayer; that they should give to the speaker that polite attention which is necessary to the propriety of private intercourse; that they should deliberately wait until the benediction be pronounced, before they appear in haste to depart—these are such obviously important duties that it would seem every one would perceive and practice them instinctively. Such, however, is not the case. In some instances the neglect of these plain proprieties is truly painful. The results of such neglect extend to the domestic circle, and to the private character.

When a regular order, and habitual sense of propriety pervades a congregation, the manners of society in general are favorably affected. The family, who, in public worship, have been taught to have all things done decently and in order, will naturally feel the importance of it in the domestic circle. Order is entirely distinct from formality. A neat and elegant arrangement of dress is always easier in a simple, than in a gorgeous attire. So also in religious worship, where the mode is plain and simple, order can be more easily and beautifully preserved.

It is true that these suggestions are not so important as remarks directly bearing upon spiritual religion. Yet the faults so often seen where these rules are disregarded, generally very much impair the spirituality of worship. In order that divine truth may be effectual, it must have the attention; but these evil habits interrupt and divert attention. A family who are in the habit of late attendance, become a regular nuisance in a congregation. They disturb the minister and the people. Especially is this the case, if the said family be somewhat prominent in society by reason of wealth, or of fashionable connections. Then the practice leads the congregation to conclude either that their object in coming late is the display of dress or person, or that their negligence arises from an habitual contempt for sacred things, and disregard of the feelings of their fellow-citizens.

The propriety of these suggestions is so manifest, that we think any minister urging these duties from the pulpit will meet with general approbation. By establishing a proper habit in these matters, it will save him the unpleasant task of personal rebuke, as the influence of public opinion once fully understood, will generally regulate individual conduct. We are not in favor of public personal rebuke until all other means are tried, as it often results in driving the offenders to an irreclaimable distance from the stated ordinances of religion.

In family worship, much depends upon an orderly and reverent attendance. It should be held at such hours both morning and evening, as will secure the presence of every member. We do not think sufficient care is exercised in this respect.—Perhaps these brief remarks will serve to remind some negligent persons of their duty. Every thing which concerns the right worship of our heavenly Father, deserves serious reflection.

"SPAKE OFTEN ONE TO ANOTHER."—I have often been struck with the beauty and simplicity with which the conduct of those who feared the Lord in olden time, is spoken of in the passage above quoted. How fit an example does it present for the imitation of those who in later days meet together for the purpose of calling on his name, and encouraging and strengthening one another! To my mind there is something very precious in the expression, "and the Lord hearkened and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name." Do those professing Christians, whose voices are seldom if ever heard, (except when called upon to lead in prayer,) in the meetings for prayer and conference, know how much they are wronging themselves by throwing all the burden of making those meetings interesting upon others?

It seems to me unjust, that a very few members of the church are obliged to take upon themselves the responsibility of sustaining such meetings, because other members of the church are not willing to share it with them. For one, I have been faulty in this matter and am satisfied that I have greatly wronged my own soul, and perhaps have in a measure discouraged those with whom it has been my privilege to associate. Let us, fellow-Christians, plead no excuse for neglecting this duty, which we shall be ashamed to offer when called before our final Judge.

Reader! have you too neglected your duty? Neglect it no longer, and I am persuaded you will find that there is a pleasure to be found in its performance which will more than pay you for the sacrifice it will cost, and besides this, you may speak a word which shall encourage some brother or sister, or lead some wanderer to the Lamb of God. Is not the experiment worth trying? Think of it, and act wisely. H. W. A.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO PRAY.—About sixty years since, three pious brothers covenanted together to observe a particular day of every week to offer special prayer for the conversion of their aged father. The old gentleman was a strict moralist, and one who deemed conversion unnecessary, and consequently would resist every appeal to repent and yield, to be saved by grace alone. Thus he lived till eighty years of age. But his faithful sons would not give him up for lost; they continued for fifteen years to offer their prayers before perceiving any visible token of good. At length, however, to their unspeakable joy, their aged father, during the past year, became the subject of God's converting grace. He publicly professed his faith in Christ by uniting with a Christian church. A few weeks after this, the old gentleman sickened and died; but he left behind him an evidence of God's power and willingness to save to the uttermost all who came unto him through our Lord Jesus Christ.

In view of facts like the above, let praying souls take courage, and hold on in well doing, for in due season ye shall reap if ye faint not.—Zion's Herald.

Children's Department.

From the Zion's (Portland) Advocate.

We have been much interested in a book written by Henry Wright, entitled, "A Kiss for a Blow." The stories are short, happily told, and well illustrate the subject of the book, which is "The Proper Treatment of Enemies." We take from it the following story, hoping that it will interest and profit the younger portion of our readers.

THE BOY, THE WOODCHUCK, AND THE RABBIT.

"Father," said Eustace, "I do not like to kill rabbits, as well as I do woodchucks."

"Why, my son?" asked the father.

"Because," replied Eustace, "rabbits will not fight back again. They will not get angry and bite, but they will lie right down and die, and look so pitiful and beseeching, and seem to say, 'I forgive you.' It always makes me feel bad to kill rabbits."

"How do you feel, my son," asked the father, "when you kill woodchucks?"

"O, I love to kill them," said Eustace, "for they get angry, and bite, and fight back again. They look fierce and savage, and try to keep me from killing them—That makes me angry, and then I can kill them with a relish. I never feel bad for killing woodchucks."

This tells the whole story. Children are cut to the heart when they get angry with others and try to quarrel, and find that they will not get angry, nor fight. "Never fight back, is the way to conquer."

Let the youthful reader ask himself the question, whether it was right for Eustace to kill woodchucks, any more than rabbits, through passion or self-gratification.—Is it right for one to kill any animal, however insignificant and apparently useless, to gratify himself? A course of this kind in childhood, fosters some of the worst passions of the human breast, and is decidedly hostile to the pure principles of the Gospel.

THE FOX AND SPANIEL.—A fox and a spaniel became acquainted, and took various walks together. The fox sometimes popped his head into a farm-yard, and stole a fowl or a goose. One day he had made free with a fine goose, where he and the spaniel had often been seen together, when all the other geese set up so great a cackling that the farmer went out to see what was the matter, and took his gun with him, which was well loaded with shot, when he saw the fox just clearing the gate and running off, with the spaniel close to his side. The farmer fired, and the shots lodged in them both, so that he caught them. "Thou shalt die, rogue as thou art!" said he to the fox, as he knocked him on the head with the butt-end of his gun; "and so shalt thou!" said he to the spaniel, as he turned to him. "Stay, I entreat you," pleaded the spaniel, "I never stole a goose in my life." "What, then, could be thy business to keep company with such a rogue? I will not believe thee!" said the farmer; and so he killed the dog also.

Moral.—Those who keep bad company are, in the end, likely to suffer the same disgrace and ruin which usually falls on their wicked companions. So avoid wicked children if you would wish not to be thought as bad as they are, and come to the same miserable end which often happens to them.

De Ruyter, February 1, 1843.

Readiness to Meet Christ.

A very fair test of readiness for the judgment seat of Christ is offered in Miller's views that the end of the world will take place in the present year, 1843.—Whether his views are true or false, they have assumed an importance in the public mind scarcely equalled by any excitement in modern times. Multitudes are embracing the doctrine in different parts, and are making preparations for the event. But the greater part of community reject the doctrine as fabulous, and treat it with ridicule or contempt. Among the many we have heard speak of it, there has been scarcely an individual who has presented a scripture reason for his belief. The near approach of the time must necessarily create intensity of feeling with those who have not had their minds established from the scriptures, and who are unprepared to meet God.

In this article we ask no one to believe the doctrine or to disbelieve it. It may be true or it may not. But this one thing is certain, those who are unprepared now for the second advent, are also unprepared to die, and give an account to God of their conduct. The soul that is in communion with God, that is looking for his blessed appearance, and is ardently desiring entire freedom from sin, is not, neither can be disturbed at the thought that two months will bring him to judgment. But the sinner, unreconciled to God, and the professor of religion whose heart is engrossed with the things of this life, and they who have the name but not the character and feelings of the Christian, are troubled at the thought, and quite willing to disbelieve the doctrine of Miller and put far away the judgment day, and calculate on many years of worldly prosperity. Their minds at once refer to their worldly affairs, and the tenacity with which they cling to them shows how unprepared they are for the 2d advent, and it is believed that one prominent reason why this doctrine is opposed, is because of the unpreparedness for the event. Why should those who have renounced the world and put on Christ, wish his second coming delayed? In him is centered all their hopes, and from his hands do they hope to receive an unfading treasure in heaven.

Every one by referring to his own emotions at the idea of a near approach to the judgment, can ascertain very nearly his preparedness or unpreparedness for the scene. We ask our readers to judge of themselves in this light, not so much to prepare themselves for the end of the world as predicted by Miller, but so as to be sure of reconciliation with God whether he may call them to his bar this year or next. If the religion of the Bible is valuable at the second advent, or at the end of the world, it is also valuable at all times, for every person may be sealed for the judgment, long ere these scenes shall take place. There is no wisdom in being concerned relative to the destruction of the earth, and the termination of all its pleasant scenes at any specified time, while there is perfect unconcern relative to the fact that a few days or hours may terminate one's earthly existence, and fix their unalterable destiny.

REVIVAL.—A very interesting state of feeling exists in the 3rd S. D. Baptist Church in Brookfield. A series of evening meetings have been held by Eld. E. S. Bailey, which has resulted in the increased spirituality of Christians, and in the awakening of sinners, several of whom have found the pearl of great price, Jesus Christ the Savior of sinners.

Tracts--Tract Society.

The General Agent of the Tract Society, believing that there exists some misapprehension as to the performance of the task he pledged himself to perform in his circular of Jan. 2, 1842, the proceedings of the Society at Conference not having been published, is desirous to explain to the Directors, and to such friends of the Society as have assisted it with their contributions as desired in that circular, and to the friends of the Sabbath generally, the reasons why he has not performed all that was set forth in that circular.

Your Agent in assuming the duties of the office, felt it his duty, in consequence of the growing attention to the Sabbath question in some parts of the country, and from the paucity of books, tracts, or papers, which contain what we believe to be the truth in relation to it, to ask of you a sum sufficient to put a plain, brief statement of the truth before the public in a small series of tracts, a sum sufficient not only for the printing of the small series, but for giving them an extensive publication, to put a copy of each, if possible, into the hand of every clergyman, religious editor, and leading officer of religious societies, and as far as possible to put them for sale in the bookstores, as well as to supply the several churches of our faith with a supply for distribution as they might see fit.

The advantages of such publication it was thought was too apparent to need more than a passing notice—especially when it is recollected that hitherto all our efforts at publication were confined almost entirely within our own societies; so much so, that perhaps not one of every 100,000 of our fellow Christians have had the means, within reasonable access, of knowing the reasons of our dissent from the general practice of making void God's Holy Law at the shrine of tradition. To effect this object, and to pay off an outstanding claim, contracted for printing by the publishing committee in '37 or '38, I felt called upon to ask of you a small sum—a sum quite as small as you would wish to have known as the extent of your liberality, or ability, to give for a cause so clearly God's own, and which I hoped to see promptly advanced. After a delay of some months I came to the conclusion that our brethren and friends had generally become discouraged with the hopes of even effecting any thing advantageous to the truth or themselves by means of tracts or other publications, and that without aid from some other source I should fail in the undertaking, and retard rather than advance the objects of the Society.—Under these circumstances, and unwilling to involve myself in pecuniary liabilities, I presented the case to our brethren in N. York—the Society, from its imperfect organization being inaccessible for advice.—In view of our obligations, and that the time had fully come when we should make a stand for the truth committed to us, our brethren generously offered me the requisite aid on condition that the contributions of the Society should be devoted to the remuneration of the funds so expended—the Gen. Agent to have tracts to the amount of funds so contributed at cost of publication—the tracts to be published under the supervision and imprint of the Society to be organized for that purpose, and for the more effectual propagation of the truth in this city. A Society was subsequently organized under the title of the Sabbath Tract Society of the city of N. York. T. B. STILLMAN, Pres't., G. B. UTTER & PAUL STILLMAN, Secretaries, and F. W. STILLMAN, Treas, under whose name all its liabilities are incurred and property held.—Under its responsibility three of the four tracts named have been issued—the fourth from circumstances unnecessary to mention, its author has been but just unable to complete. That may now be soon expected.—In addition to these the Soc. at its last meeting authorized me to procure additional manuscripts for tracts upon the same subject, so as to make the series a complete defense of the Lord's Sabbath. Under these circumstances it could not be expected that I should seek opportunities, and perhaps at a great loss of time, to forward tracts to all our churches, not one-sixth of them having contributed as yet to their publication, nor a greater proportion of the funds asked been paid in—probably but a little more than to pay for the samples (about 200 of each No.) sent to brethren in the different churches or to individuals at their request. Such brethren, therefore, as have not received tracts as they were led to expect, I trust will not lay it to my charge, for I have omitted no opportunity to present the claims of the Soc., whose agent I am, to the immediate aid of the brethren, and where I have failed in the performance of duty, it has been for want of that advice and direction, which, as agent of a Society, it should be, but is not, my privilege to claim.

The tracts will continue to be published by the N. Y. S. Tract Soc. Monthly, or nearly as manuscripts can be provided until the series is complete, and brethren wishing them will please send their orders; and where requested gratuitously for gratuitous distribution, they must be directed to me, accompanied by a statement of the circumstances under which they are desired, (and a report of all interesting circumstances connected with the distribution of all such tracts will be expected; likewise all orders for tracts to be sent by private conveyance if not by the bearer of the order,) or by mail, may be directed to me; but orders, if accompanied with the money, and to be delivered to the bearer, may be addressed to WM. BURBECK, 138 Fulton-st., whose proximity to the business part of the city, will save them much trouble.

Capital Punishment.

BR. BAILEY,—I have noticed in your paper, bearing date Jan 11, an article over the signature of "Friend," towards which I am by no means favorably impressed.—The labor of the Friend, was spent to show that Capital Punishment was wrong. He says it was not his design to show much labor on this point. As to that, I must say, I am not a little sorry that my friend found it in his way to appear the second time before the public on this point; but since he has, I thought to oppose a few objections to his sentiments; and in doing this, I will be brief, noticing only such as I understand to be offered as proof by the Friend.

As this is a biblical question, we will only rest on that for a decision in this matter. All that the friend has done is to give his opinion, and tell what might be done, and attempt to dispose of two passages of scripture which stood in his way. These two passages he acknowledges seem to be parallel, and significant of the same thing.—To this I fully agree, and would only object to his disposition of the passages. He thinks they were simply a prediction that they who contend with the sword are liable to fall by the sword.

The first of these passages may be found, Gen. ix. 6. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" Now all that is necessary for me to do is to show that this has the form of a law, and not a prediction. First, we would say, there is nothing like a prediction here; the chapter is introduced first, by "a grant of lands, and a promise of a numerous race of men to inhabit them." Second, a grant of power over creatures. Third, a grant of subsistence. Fourth, he proceeds to give laws, first, in relation to food; second, man must not take away his own life; third, the beast must not be allowed to destroy the life of man; fourth, willful murderers must be put to death. If this is a prediction, then the above is such, or it is strangely introduced. But the fifth verse plainly shows it to be a law of the highest authority. God says, I will require it at the hand of every man; and at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man. Here it is made to appear at once that it is the law of God, and that man that refuses to aid in bringing to justice the criminal refuses to obey God.—We, then, are the executive power, set "to execute" the sentence of a just and all-wise God. To this the Apostle says; "The powers that be are ordained of God." Again, he says, "For he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil." Again, "Whomsoever, therefore, resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation." We then would advise care upon the part of all how we attempt an infringment on God's law. Again, every proper law arises from some cause which justifies the law itself; and whilst that cause or reason exists without the law there will be a defect in the government, and farther whilst the reason justifying said law remain, that law should exist. Now, to the law before us, God has here rendered the reason why Capital Punishment should be inflicted, and that was because man bore the image of his God.

From the above it certainly follows, that willful murder, in all communities ought to be punished with death, it is a matter for serious consideration, to all who are cordially affected to the welfare of nations; for national guilt is accumulated to a fearful extent when murder of different casts is winked at—such as duelling, willful and deliberate murder, and the sacrificing of human victims to idols.

It is true that the moral image of God, in which man was first created, is much polluted by sin, his natural image remains; consequently, it is a most daring act of rebellion against God, to insult his image on earth, and destroy the life he gave. Let it be remembered that the reason for Capital Punishment, arises from his insult to God, and not for the injury done to man. Having thus noticed this passage, it is only necessary for me to say in conclusion, as my Friend and myself agree as to the parallel meaning of the two passages above alluded to, that it would appear from my view of the subject, that law was instituted in an early age of the world, under the sanction of God, and introduced into the gospel edition of the law by Jesus Christ. "He that taketh the sword, shall also perish with the sword."

With these few remarks, I will forbear at present, hoping that my Friend, with his friends, will let the question rest where it is without further agitating it. The question in this place has assumed something of a sectarian form. This is plain from the fact, that those religionists who hold that all punishment is designed for the reformation of the criminal, are the strongest opponents of Capital Punishment. There is already a considerable excitement on the question, and if crowded into the public print, may occupy more space than will be proper for it to. This from one who wishes to be a

CONSISTENT FRIEND.

Correspondence of the Jour. of Com.

WASHINGTON, Wednesday, Jan. 18.

Oregon Occupation Bill.—This bill was again taken up, and Mr. Choate spoke in opposition to it, and in reply to Mr. Benton.

Mr. Choate remarked upon the predictions made by Mr. Benton, of a speedy war between the United States and England. If war was inevitable, as the Senator supposed, if we were to revolutionize Ireland and stir up her starving working population to rebellion, he hoped we should not commence the war in the way now proposed. He trusted we should not begin it by the violation of our own engagements, as the bill evidently proposed. The only shadow of excuse that had been offered for a violation of the convention on our part, was an alleged violation of it by England. The convention provides that, for ten years, the country shall be open to the hunters and traders of both nations. If England has violated the engagement, I have only to say that I will follow her as far as he who goes farthest. I have no idea that she shall be permitted to break or evade it. Show me that she has broken it, as we apparently do, in this bill, and I will agree to any course that may be proposed for the assertion of our rights. But I do not think, said Mr. Choate, that she has broken it. I see that she enjoys great advantages through the means of her powerful fur-trading company, who take up every advantageous port, and convert every beautiful stream to their own purposes.—This may be a good reason for giving her the twelve months' notice of our determination to abandon the agreement and take the consequences.

What matters it that her hands are red in the blood of China—that she has lines of steamers on our coast—that she is averse to our slave institutions—that her general attitude betokens, as is said, hostility towards us? This does not show that she has broken the treaty. We may find in all this a reason to go to war, if you please; and abundant reason to give her the notice that the treaty requires; but no reason for breaking our word. It signifies nothing that England builds forts in the territory. We can build them too, and ought to build them. We must protect our people and their property, as she does. All that comes in aid of the treaty, instead of violating it. If England sends her laws for the government of the people there, we must send our jurisprudence, too, for our citizens. But let us be just to England.—She has not extended her laws over any but Englishmen, her own subj[illegible]

The Oregon boundary is [illegible] negotiation at this time. [illegible] says it is. Mr. Choate w[illegible] decorum of the Senate w[illegible] negotiation was going on [illegible] call for informal co[illegible] had been made, and [illegible] pondence. One reas[illegible] tiation should be cond[illegible] lence, was that the wh[illegible] ty to it, and intereste[illegible] as the United States [illegible] England claims in the [illegible] all nations, except Russ[illegible] Spain, who may be consi[illegible] sold out their claims upon th[illegible] The ultimate settlement of the [illegible] ownership involves the question of the extent to which the discovery gives a title; and the extent to which contiguity which was so ably pressed by Mr. Linn, gives a title. The world is concerned in the adjustment of this question.

But the Senator from Missouri, Mr. Benton, intimated that the Secretary of State had made an overture to the British Government which it would disgrace him to avow—that he had offered to bring the line south of the forty-third degree. Mr. Choate was enabled positively to deny this, and to state that the Secretary of State had made no such proposition, nor meditated it.

Mr. Benton. I am happy to hear it.—But, continued Mr. Choate, the Senator complains that this Oregon question was not settled when the northeastern boundary was settled—that the negotiation was left incomplete.

I am not about to enter into a defense of that treaty, with Mr. C., but I may have something to say when the bill for paying Maine and Massachusetts shall come before us. It is enough for me to say at present that this body ratified it, by a vote of 39 to 9. But why should this argument be urged against the late treaty any more than against any other treaty for the last 30 years? Indeed, this has been in some measure an open question since 1783.—There have been half a dozen treaties with England since. We thought it wise to keep every other question open till that one was settled. We have had other open questions. The right of impressment was still open. Why should we keep this question of the northeastern boundary open until the Oregon boundary was settled? The northeastern boundary line ran for thousands of miles. The whole line was on fire. In Maine, the two nations stood within thirty yards of each other, and the first flash of a gun would kindle flagrant war on the whole extent of the line. The Senator intimates that the Oregon question was neglected, because it was a western question. How come it, Sir, to be a western question. We of the east discovered it. Capt. Gray, of Boston, and Capt Wyeth discovered it, and eastern capitalists settled it. It is the place that our whalemen went while in the pursuit of their gigantic game. If it is hereafter to be peopled and defended it will be by the eastern people—by the universal Yankee nation. Sir, it is an eastern question—a national question.

But granting that the Oregon question may lead to a war, will it be a war of the west alone? Will it not of necessity draw the whole nation into hostilities? Will not the flame of war be immediately hurdled on the whole line of the northeastern boundary? The treaty line will then be no more regarded by Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Vermont, and Maine than if it had never been settled. Why should we not settle one question at a time? I ask whether President Jackson, when he stood ready to offer Maine a million and a half of dollars to relinquish a part of the disputed territory, would not have replied to his suggestion by saying—"shall we refuse to extirpate the small pox, because we can not find a specific for the cholera?"

Again, said Mr. C. if England is so ready to go to war with us for the Oregon territory, what does she gain by the settlement of the northeastern boundary? What object could she have had in making the treaty? Mr. C. went on to argue the necessity and propriety of the late treaty—as a means of preventing war, which, when avoidable, was, he said, not only a great crime, but an egregious blunder.

Mr. Benton made a few remarks in reply, and the Senate adjourned.

During the morning hour, the red line dispute was again opened, and finally settled—Mr. Benton declaring that he was the first one who drew the attention of the Senate to the red lines of the map.

Capture of Monteray.—In the House of Representatives this morning, among other resolutions of inquiry, was one submitted by Mr. Gwin, calling upon the President of the United States for information in relation to the capture of Monteray, in California, by Com. Thos. Ap. Catesby Jones, and also desiring to be informed whether any despatches had been transmitted to him authorizing his proceedings in this particular. But objection was made to the resolution, and it was not received.

Body Servant of Gen. Washington.—On motion of Mr. Briggs a resolution was adopted, instructing the Committee on revolutionary pensions to inquire into the expediency of allowing a pension to John Cary, who says he was the body servant of Gen. Washington, and was present with him at the defeat of Braddock and the surrender of Cornwallis, and that he is 112 years old.

Mediterranean Squadron.—On motion of Mr. Gwin, it was resolved that the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House all the information in possession of the Navy department with regard to the Naval depot of the United States at Port Mahon, and especially whether any vessels of the United States Mediterranean squadron have been kept [illegible] length of time inactive.

Receipt for the First Quarter of 1842.—Mr. Fillmore presented a letter which had been addressed to him by the Secretary of the Treasury, and from which it appears that, as to the amount of revenue for the fourth quarter of the year 1842, complete returns had not yet reached the department from which the entire receipts for customs and the public lands for the period mentioned can be exhibited. Statements, however, of these several branches of revenue have been completed as far as received; from which it would appear that the cash receipts accruing at the several ports from which returns have been received, amount to $3,116,370 73

The duties received on bonds previously taken, amount to 1,436,565 24

Making an aggregate and gross of $4,552,935 97

And the nett sum received at the treasury, (after deducting the payment of debentures, expenses of collection, etc., to be accounted for in the collector's accounts,) is $31,950 00. As it respects the sales of public lands, it would appear that the sum actually received from public lands sold in the last quarter of 1842, as shown by returns received, is, in gross $254,513 97

And the estimated amount from sales at the Treasury department from which returns for December, 1842, have not been received, taking the receipts of December, 1841, as the basis of estimates, is 110,426 38

Making altogether in gross $361,940 35

The letter was ordered to be printed, and the House adjourned.

News of the Day.

Christian Watchman.—Mr. E. Thresher has recently purchased the Watchman, and has become, alike, proprietor and editor.—We hope that our brother's course as an editor is not indicated by his name; should he, however, prove to be editorially as nominally, a Thresher, we trust he will deal his blows out on the enemies, not the friends of truth.—Pioneer and Banner.

M. Arago is of the opinion that the newly discovered comet in Draco will in a few days become more and more visible. Its tail has already become more luminous, but there is reason to fear, from the variations in its light, that it is rapidly approaching perihelium.

Parisian Diamonds.—It may be interesting to our readers to know that those beautiful imitations of the "priceless gem," which have lately attracted so much attention, are made by a chemist in Paris, and are only the oxide of tin. It is to be regretted that the brilliancy which has rendered this imitation so famous can not be depended upon, as, after exposure for some time, they become as dull as common glass.—Mining Jour.

It is a remarkable circumstance that of a Committee of the House of Representatives, (to revise the rules of the House,) consisting of nine members, appointed at the first session of the present Congress, five already sleep in the tomb, viz: Lewis Williams, Linn Banks, Joseph Lawrence, James W. Williams, and R. W. Habersham. Such a fatality is certainly of rare occurrence.—Nat. Intel.

Caution to Millers.—Recently a miller near Mobile, for some purpose or other, poured several pounds of melted lead in the eye of the runner-stone. The lead becoming loose and working between the stones, was ground up with the corn. The meal was consumed on the platform of Mr. James G. Lyon, and a number of his negroes were poisoned by it, some of whom died while others were palsied and altogether helpless. It is said to be a common thing for millers to use lead in this way, and the misfortune just related ought to be a sufficient warning against it. A similar accident occurred recently in Europe.

Munificent Gift.—John Jacob Astor, of New York, purposes giving to that city a public library and building. The amount to be devoted to this object is said to be $300,000. The building is to be located on Lafayette and Astor Places, and its construction commenced as soon as possible.

Pantaloon Straps.—The editor of the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal calls the attention of the public to the injurious effects of wearing pantaloons tightly strapped. He says he has known instances in which lameness of the knees has been produced by the pressure on the knee-pan, forcing it into the knee-joint, which could be relieved only by removing the exciting cause. The great muscles which extend through the leg on the thigh, are connected with the knee-pan, and require freedom of motion for the proper and easy performance of their functions. Freedom is essential to grace, and fashion ought to give way to utility and health. Besides, the fashion has lasted long enough, and having had its day, let it retire, and be numbered with the things that were.

Last week the following extraordinary change of fortune occurred to Mr. Biddulph, 68 years of age, formerly master butcher in Clare Market, but from adversities he unfortunately became so reduced in circumstances as to be obliged to become an inmate of the Union Workhouse, in Cleaveland-street, Fitzroy Square. After remaining there some time, a lawsuit terminated in his favor, by which he has become possessed of funded property and estates to the amount of £30,000. Yesterday he quitted the workhouse in company with his attorney to take possession of his unexpected wealth.

From the N. O. Bulletin, of Jan 12.

TEXAS.

By the steam packet New York, Capt. Wright, 31 hours from Galveston, arrived yesterday, we have dates to the 8th inst. The commercial treaty concluded by Major Reilly with our Government has been ratified by the Texas Senate, and is so far as that Republic is concerned, the law of the land. This is an important treaty for Texas and promises good to the merchants and shippers of this city. It allows (as we stated several weeks ago,) the introduction of Texas cotton into the United States, free of duty. We shall therefore ship a large portion of the crop of Texas, and furnish its planters abundantly with the ordinary farm supplies.

William Bryan, Esq., has been confirmed by the Senate as Texian Consul at this port.

Much doubt still exists in relation to the location of the seat of Government. The general opinion among the people seems to be, that it will be located temporarily either at Washington, San Felipe, or some point between the two places.

Gen. Somervell, with an army of 800 men, captured the Mexican town of Loredo on the 8th of December. The few Mexican troops who occupied the place, made a hasty retreat without firing a gun. Being notified of this, the army sent a messenger to the Alcolde to make requisitions for the necessaries, which were promptly furnished. After taking the town, a few of the troops crossed the Rio Grande, and planted the banner of the Single Star on the West bank.

It is further stated that about 600 of the troops crossed the river on the 19th, and took up the line of march for Guerrero, about 70 miles from Loredo, the balance, 140, returning home.

From Guerrero it is presumed they will proceed rapidly onward and take Mier, Comargo, and Rhinosa. By which time it is to be hoped that sufficient reinforcements will join them to encourage a descent on Matamoras.

It is reported that the Apache Indians are committing fresh depredations in Chihuahua, and thought that nearly all the Mexican troops under Woll have been ordered there to drive them back. It is even rumored that Texas has a secret agent among these Indians to control their operations, and that the object of the various tribes now gathered together at Waco village is to enter into treaties with the Government defensive and offensive against Mexico. If this prove true, the army will have to encounter little opposition in recapturing all the towns and villages between Laredo and Metamoras, if they march with proper speed.

Great numbers of runaway negroes from Texas, Arkansas, and Louisiana have escaped to the bordering States of Mexico; and if the invading army be promptly reinforced, much valuable property of this kind will be received. Were the sufferers alone to unite and speed to the rescue, a considerable force would thereby be marshalled together.

It is rumored that the President will recommend to Congress the passage of a bill providing for the sales of all the vessels of war and every thing appertaining to the Navy.

The Texas Times says: "We fear that we shall be reluctantly compelled to believe the rumors of his co-operation with Mexico."

At Galveston, the ship Ebro had arrived in 53 days from Havre, France, with 117 emigrants. Another vessel from the same place, which left previously, was expected every day. Two others were up for that port when the Ebro left. Mons. Castro will despatch a vessel each month during the season, with emigrants. His colony is to be located in Bexar county.

A reward of $100 has been offered by the citizens of Houston for the apprehension of the murderer of the young Frenchman who was killed near that city on the 26th ult.

The name of the villain is Pouvais, a Frenchman. He is described as being about 5 feet 10 inches high, black hair and eyes, heavy eyebrows, and a mole on the right side of his nose, between the eyebrows. It is stated that he was recently employed as overseer on a plantation in Plaquemine, Louisiana.

The citizens of Marion county, [Mo.] have held a meeting, and resolved that no property belonging to a citizen of that county should be exposed to public sale.

Van Ness, Fitzgeral and Hancock, who belonged to the Santa Fe expedition, and after being released by the Mexicans, were again captured by Gen. Wall during his recent invasion of Texas, have been sentenced to ten years imprisonment in the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa, at Vera Cruz; a period longer than they will be likely to live, in that unhealthy place.

The Richmond Star says that on the 16th inst. five persons, Lucy Smith, Ann Hansbury, Clara Turner, Jane Ripley, and a colored servant woman, were poisoned at breakfast, by some arsenic being put in their coffee. A white girl is suspected of having done the act. None of those poisoned have died, and it is believed they are out of danger.

A Mobile paper states that the captain of a Northern ship recently at New-Orleans, was fined $3,000 for attempting to pass off as free negroes, three slaves. His excuse was, that he wanted to keep the men out of jail.

Gen. M'Dougald, who shot Col. Hepburn a few days since at Columbus, Geo., has been bailed in the sum of $20,000. It is supposed he will be acquitted.

The heaviest fall of snow which has been known in Tennessee for the last 20 years, fell at Nashville and its vicinity on the 7th and 8th instant. Its depth was twelve to fourteen inches. There was six inches of snow on the ground at St. Louis on the 10th.

According to the table in the Baptist Almanac for 1843, there are in the United States, and British Provinces 611,522 members of the Baptist church—5,398 ministers—and 8,383 churches. Adding the more recent accessions, the whole number of communicants is estimated at 700,000.

It is a fact highly honorable to the merchants of Charleston, South Carolina, (as stated in the Courier,) that, at the close of the year on Saturday last, every bond due at the custom-house (for a period of 22 years past) was paid in full; and also that not a single officer of the custom-house was, on that day, indebted to the Government.

Earthquake.—The shock of an earthquake, which many of our citizens observed about 12 minutes past nine o'clock on Wednesday, the 4th inst., is mentioned in many of the western and south western papers.—Zanes. Gaz.

A severe shock of an earthquake was felt in this city, last night about 15 minutes past nine. It lasted 5 or 6 minutes, and shook furniture, looking glasses, &c., in an extraordinary manner.—Cincinnati Gaz.

Practical Influence of Mormonism.—For some time Joseph Beebee, a disciple of Joe Smith in the Mormon faith, resided with his wife, having no children, at No. 77 Goerick street, New York; a Mr. Irwin, his wife, and two children, son and daughter, occupying the first floor of the house.—Beebee having converted Mrs. Irwin to the Mormon religion, such as it is, on the 31st of December, when her husband was absent at his work, carried Mrs. Irwin, her two children, and all their furniture, off to house No. 166 Essex street, where they lived as husband and wife, and where Beebee disposed of the furniture, piece by piece, for their support, leaving his own wife to grieve alone at No. 77 Goerick street. Mr. Irwin having discovered the place of their domicil, applied to Justice Gilbert, of the Upper Police, for redress against Beebee, but the criminal law afforded none for stealing a wife and children.—Mr. Beebee, however, had abused and beaten Irwin's children. The Justice got the little boy of Mr. Irwin to come to the Upper Police office, where he made complaint against Beebee, for assault and battery on the boy and sister, and he then ordered Beebee to find bail in $600 to answer, and in default was committed to prison.—Jour. Com.

John Ross in Difficulty.—The Cherokee Council have passed a resolution calling upon John Ross for a settlement of his accounts with the Nation. He is accused of having defrauded the Nation of an immense sum of money, and great excitement is expected to grow out of this proceeding. This is probably nothing more than the old troubles revived.

Burglary.—The Pontoosac factory in this village, says the Lenox (Mass.) Eagle, was entered on Monday morning last, and 12 pieces of broad cloth, worth about $600 stolen. The agent of the company having accidentally discovered two men near the factory engaged in carrying away pieces of cloth, aroused several persons, who started in pursuit. The burglars were arrested, brought before Calvin Martin, Esq. and on Wednesday committed to await their trial at the next February Court.—Their names are John Miller (formerly employed by the Pontoosac Co.) and Benjamin Gleedhill.

Boston and Cincinnati.—The Cincinnati Philanthropist says: "When the Sandusky Railroad is finished, Cincinnati will be within three days of Boston. From Cincinnatti to the lake, the distance may be easily accomplished in sixteen hours; a magnificent steam packet will then receive the passengers and transport them to Buffalo in twenty hours; and from Buffalo to Boston they will go by railroad, say in thirty-two hours, the whole distance from Cincinnatti to Boston requiring only seventy hours."

Street Robbery.—Yesterday forenoon as a young lad in the employ of Scudder & Cordis, was passing through Kilby street with a bank check in his hand, a larger boy stepped up to him, snatched the check away from him and escaped with it. Payment of the check, which was for $295, was instantly stopped. Up to the close of bank hours the check had not been presented, nor had the thief been arrested.—Boston Post.

Fire—Two persons burned to death.—A correspondence in the Sun this morning dated Reisterstown, Baltimore county, Md., 18th inst. states the melancholy fact that the dwelling house of Miss Henrietta Israel, situate about 3 miles southwest of that place, in the district of "Soldier's Delight," was consumed by fire on the previous morning, after the hour of midnight, and horrible to relate, herself and a little boy—the only inmates of the house—perished in the flames, before any assistance could be rendered.—Baltimore Pat.

The Washington correspondent of the Journal of Commerce says that Mr. Spencer, the Secretary of War, is making preparations for an extensive official survey of the military posts on the western and other frontiers, during the recess of Congress.

Naval Court Martial.—It is said from Washington that a Court Martial, to consist of ten Captains and three Commanders had been ordered in the case of Commander Mackenzie. We presume the order will be made public soon. This step has been taken, we presume, at the earnest request of Commander Mackenzie.

Colored Seamen.—For several years past the authorities of Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, and other Southern ports, have taken it upon themselves to arrest and imprison all free colored seamen found on board any vessel coming into their harbors and to keep them in confinement until such vessel was ready to sail again. If the Captain was willing to pay jail charges, the seamen were then released and suffered to depart. But if the Captain declined submitting to these exactions, the men detained in custody until after their vessel had sailed, were then sold into slavery.—This outrage upon human rights has been made the subject of frequent applications by Northern shipping merchants, to Congress for redress. But session after session passed away without any step being taken to prevent a repetition of such unwarrantable proceedings. At length, however, the matter has been brought before the National Legislature. On Friday last Mr. Winthrop, from the committee on commerce, to whom had been referred the complaints and remonstrances against these oppressive and unconstitutional enactments of the Southern States, made a report concluding with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the seizure and imprisonment, in any port of this Union, of free colored seamen, citizens of any of the States, and against whom there is no charge but that of entering said port in the prosecution of their rightful business, is a violation of the privileges of the citizenship guarantied by the 2d section of the 4th article of the Constitution of the U. States.

Resolved, That on the seizure and imprisonment in any port of this Union of free colored seamen on board of foreign vessels, against whom there is no charge but that of entering said port in the course of their lawful business, is a breach of the comity of nations, is incompatible with the rights of all nations in amity with the United States having relation to nations with whom the United States have formed commercial conventions, is a violation of the 6th article of the Federal Constitution, which declares that treaties are a part of the supreme law of the land.

Resolved, That State laws, by which certain classes of seamen are prohibited from entering certain ports in this Union in the prosecution of their rightful business, are in contravention of the paramount and exclusive power of the General Government to regulate commerce.

Resolved, That the police power of the State can justify no enactments of regulations which are in direct, positive and permanent conflict with express provisions or functionary principles of the national compact.

A motion to lay on the table the question of printing the report and resolutions, was defeated by the strong vote of 114 to 72. It is to be hoped that the resolutions themselves will be adopted by at least as decisive a vote.

It appears that there are upwards of 600 paper mills in operation in the United States, and that the paper manufacturers pay annually for rags, old canvas, rope, &c., out of which paper is manufactured, six millions eight hundred dollars.

The Louisville Journal says it was reported that the earth sunk in several places at New Madrid, on the Mississippi, during the earthquake of the 4th inst.

Mr. Botts has presented formal articles of impeachment in the House of Congress, against President Tyler, but they were properly rejected by a large majority.—Bap. Reg.

The recent earthquake was sensibly felt at Burlington, Iowa, and many of the inhabitants were much frightened.

BY virtue of an order of the Surrogate of the county of Madison, made and entered on the 30th day of November, 1842, the undersigned administratrix and administrator of the personal estate of Franklin Coon, late of Brookfield, in said county, deceased, will sell at public vendue, at the dwelling house of the deceased in Brookfield, aforesaid, on the 24th day of January, 1843, all the right and interest held by the deceased at the time of his death, in and to all that certain piece or parcel of land, situate in Brookfield aforesaid, in the 18th township, and bounded as follows: On the north by land owned by Samuel H. Coon, west by lands of Thomas York, and Elisha Randall, on the south by lands of John I. Morgan, and Dewit C. Coon, on the east by land of David Hinkley, containing one hundred and fifty-eight acres of land, more or less; on which there is one dwelling house, two barns and carriage house, and an apple orchard, of from fifty to one hundred trees, about one hundred and twenty-five acres of which is cleared, or improved land, and the residue timbered land. The premises will be sold subject to the payment of a mortgage or share of a mortgage, held by John I. Morgan which covers about ninety acres of the south and east part of said premises and on which there is supposed to be due and chargable to said premises about nine hundred dollars. The sale will be made free and discharged of dower, and will commence at one o'clock in the afternoon. Terms of sale will be made known on the day of sale.—Dated Brookfield, December 2, 1842.

ALICE COON, Administratrix,
WILLIAM H H COON, Administrator

The above Sale is postponed to February 7, at the same place and time of day.—Brookfield, Jan 24th, 1842.

ALICE COON, Administratrix.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

By virtue of a writ of Fi Fa, issued out of the Supreme Court of Judicature of the State of New York, and to me delivered, against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of Joseph Mitchell, in my bailiwick, I have levied on all that certain piece or parcel of land, being and lying in the town of De Ruyter, county of Madison, and State of New York, and bounded as follows, to wit:—On the north and north-east by the highway and lands owned by Miles T. Wooley, on the east by lands of William Russell, on the south by lands of Isaac DeLamater, and on the west by lands owned by George W. Case, containing 175 acres of land, be the same more or less; which I shall expose for sale as the law directs at the house now kept by John Beach, in the Quaker Basin Flats, two miles east of De Ruyter village, on Thursday, the 16th of February next, at 1 o'clock P. M. Dated, De Ruyter, January 2, 1843.

No Hoax.

THE SUBSCRIBER would respectfully inform the public generally, that he is manufacturing Cabinet Ware of all descriptions, wanted by the inhabitants in this section of the country, although he cannot boast of his great EXPERIENCE, he having carried on the business only 10 years; yet in that time he has learned that basswood, does not make as good and durable posts and draw fronts for Bureaus, as well seasoned cherry does; although there is in this section, pine and basswood in abundance, thrown together something in the shape of a Bureau, but it is not, and cannot be done in his shop, nor under his superintendence. The Subscriber intends that all Cabinet Wares sold by him shall be made in a good workmanlike manner, and of thoroughly seasoned lumber, and will be sold on as good terms, as can be had at any well established shop in this, or any of the neighboring villages. His shop is in the east corner of LaFayette Block, No 3, Cortland street.

Ready Made Coffins.

THE SUBSCRIBER having long regretted the too high charges made for COFFINS and funeral services in this place, and at the request of many citizens, has made, and will keep on hand, a full assortment of Coffins, from the largest to the smallest size.

A HEARSE WILL BE IN READINESS

at all times, and he pledges himself that his charges shall be as low as in any of the neighboring villages.

THE Natural, Intellectual and Moral Sciences, are taught by the different Instructors, as best suits the circumstances accompanying the formation of classes, except those mentioned above, which are always taught by the same Teacher.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral elevation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 1st of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

POETRY.

'The Land which no Mortal may know.'

BY BERNARD BARTON.

Though Earth has full many a beautiful spot,
As a poet or painter might show;
Yet more lovely and beautiful, holy and bright,
To the hopes of the heart, and spirit's glad sight,
Is the land that no mortal may know.

There the crystaline stream, bursting forth from the Throne,
Flows on, and forever will flow;
Its waves, as they roll, are with melody rife,
And its waters are sparkling with beauty and life,
In the land which no mortal may know.

And there, on its margin, with leaves ever green,
With its fruits healing sickness and wo,
The fair tree of life! in its glory and pride,
Is fed by the deep, inexhaustible tide
On the land which no mortal may know.

There, too, are the lost! whom we lov'd on this earth,
With those mem'ries our bosoms yet glow;
Their reliques we gave to the place of the dead,
But their glorified spirits before us have fled
To the land which no mortal may know.

There the pale orb of Night, and the fountain of Day,
Nor beauty nor splendor bestow;
But the presence of Him, the unchanging I AM!
And the holy, the pure, the immaculate Lamb
Light the land which no mortal may know.

Oh! who but must pine in this dark vale of tears,
From its clouds and its shadows to go,
To walk in the light of the glory above,
And to share in the peace, and the joy, and the love
Of the land which no mortal may know.

TAKING THE VEIL.

The following account of the ceremony of taking the veil, in a convent in Mexico, is from a work which has just issued from the press of Messrs. Little and Brown of this city, entitled "Life in Mexico, during a residence of two years in that country, by Madame C— de la B—." The author is known to be the wife of Chevalier Calderon de la Barca, formerly Spanish Minister to this country, and subsequently Spanish Envoy to Mexico, after the recognition of the independence of that republic by the mother country. Madame Calderon's position secured to her opportunities of observation which would be denied to most persons. The ceremony of taking the veil has been often described, but never perhaps has the parting of friends, which the act involves, been depicted with more thrilling interest, than in the following passages from Madame Calderon's work. She received an invitation as follows:

On Wednesday, the—of this month, at six o'clock in the evening, my Donna Maria de la Conception, P——c—— will assume the habit of a Nun in the choir and the black veil in the Convent of Our Lady of the Incarnation. I have the honor to inform you of this, entreating you to cooperate with your presence in the solemnity of this act, a favor which will be highly esteemed by your affectionate servant, who kisses your hand.

MARIA JOSEFA D——."

The girl being of distinguished family, the ceremony was expected to be peculiarly magnificent. Madame C., having called at the house in the morning, to make arrangements for attending the ceremony with the family, assembled, found about a hundred persons, relations of the family, assembled, at a sort of fete, given on the occasion. The young lady who was about to be entombed alive, was dressed in purple velvet, with diamonds and pearls, and a crown of flowers; the corsage of her gown being entirely covered with bows of ribbon of different colors, which her friends had given her. She had short sleeves with white satin shoes. She was handsome, and only eighteen years of age. Madame Calderon having arranged for her attendance upon the ceremony, took her departure from the house to return again in the evening. She says—

"I arrived at the hour appointed, and being led up stairs by the Senator Don —— ——, found the morning party with many additions, lingering over the dessert. There was some gayety, but evidently forced. It reminded me of a marriage feast, previous to the departure of the bride, who is about to be separated from her family for the first time. Yet how different in fact this banquet, where the mother and daughter met together for the last time on earth!

"At stated periods, indeed, the mother may hear her daughter's voice, speaking to her as from the depths of the tomb, but she may never more fold her in her arms, never more share in her joys or in her sorrows, or nurse her in sickness; and when her own last hour arrives, though but a few streets divide them, she may not give her dying blessing to the child, who has been for so many years, the pride of her eyes and heart.

"I have seen no countries where families are so knit together as in Mexico, where the affections are so concentrated, or where such devoted respect and obedience are shown by the married sons and daughters to their parents. In that respect, they always remain as little children. I know many families, of which the married branches continue to live in their father's house, forming a sort of small colony, and living in the most perfect harmony. They cannot bear the idea of being separated, and nothing but dire necessity ever forces them to leave their fatherland. To all the accounts, which travelers give them, of the pleasures to be met with in European capitals, they turn a deaf ear. Their families are in Mexico, their parents, and sisters and relatives, and there is no happiness for them elsewhere. The greater, therefore, is the sacrifice, which those parents make, who from religious motives, devote their daughters to a conventional life.

"———, however, was furious at the whole affair, which, he said, was entirely against the mother's consent, though that of the father had been obtained; and pointed out to me the confessor, whose influence had brought it about. The girl, herself was now very pale, but evidently resolved to conceal her agitation, and the mother seemed as if she could shed no more tears—quite exhausted with weeping. As the hour for the ceremony drew near, the whole party became more grave and sad, all but the priests, who were smiling and talking together in groups. The girl was not still a moment. She kept walking hastily through the house, taking leave of the servants, and naming, probably, her last wishes about everything. She was followed by her younger sister, all of them in tears.

"But it struck six, and the priests intimated that it was time to move. She and her mother went down stairs alone, and entered the carriage, which was to drive them through the principal streets to show the nun to the public, according to custom, and to let them take their last look, they of her, and she of them. As they got in, we all crowded to the balconies to see her take leave of her house, her aunts saying, "Yes, child, despidete de tu casa, take leave of your house, for you will never see it again!" Then came sobs from the sisters, and many of the gentlemen, ashamed of their emotion, hastily quitted the room. I hope, for the sake of humanity, I did not rightly interpret the look of constrained anguish, which the poor girl threw from the window of the carriage at the home of her childhood.

"They drove off, and the relation prepared to walk in procession to the church. I walked with Count S———o, the others followed in pairs. The church was very brilliantly illuminated, and, as we entered, the band was playing one of Strauss' Waltzes! The crowd was so tremendous, that we were nearly squeezed to a jelly in getting to our places. I was carried off my feet by two fat Senoras in mantillas and shaking diamond pendants, exactly as if I had been packed between two movable feather beds.

"They gave me, however, an excellent place, quite close to the grating, beside the Countess de S———o, that is to say a place to kneel on. A great bustle and much preparation, seemed to be going on within the convent, and veiled figures were flitting about, whispering, arranging, &c. Sometimes a skinny old dame would come close to the grating, and lifting up her veil, bestow upon the pensive public a generous view of a very haughty and very wrinkled visage of some seventy years standing, and beckon into the church for the major-domo of the convent, (an excellent and profitable situation by the way) or for Padre this or that. Some of the holy ladies recognized and spoke to me through the grating.

"But at the discharge of fire works outside the church, the curtain was dropped, for this was the signal that the nun and her mother had arrived. An opening was made in the crowd, as they passed into the church, and the girl, kneeling down, was questioned by the Bishop, but I could not make out the dialogue which was carried on in a low voice. She then passed into the convent by a side door, and her mother, quite exhausted, and nearly in hysterics, was supported through the crowd to a place beside us in front of the grating. The scene was as striking here, as in the convent of Santa Teresa, but not so lugubrious. The nuns all ranged around and carrying lighted tapers in their hands, were dressed in mantles of bright blue, with a gold plate on the left shoulder. Their faces however, were covered with deep black veils. The girl kneeling in front, and also bearing a heavy lighted taper, looked beautiful, with her dark hair and rich dress, and the long black eye-lashes resting on her glowing face. The churchmen near the illuminated and magnificently dressed altar, formed, as usual, a brilliant background to the picture. The ceremony was the same, as on the former occasion, but there was no sermon.

"The most terrible thing to witness was the last straining, anxious look which the mother gave her daughter through the grating. She had seen her child pressed to the arms of strangers, and welcomed to her new home. She was no longer hers. All the sweet ties of nature had been rudely severed, and she had been forced to consign her, in the very bloom of youth and beauty, at the very age in which she most required a mother's care, and when she had but just fulfilled the promise of her childhood, to a living tomb. Still, as long as the curtain had not fallen, she could gaze upon her, as upon one, on whom, though dead, the coffin lid is not yet closed.

"But while the new-made nun was in a blaze of light, and distinct on the foreground, so that we could mark each varying expression of her face, the crowd in the church, and the comparative faintness of the light, probably made it difficult for her to distinguish her mother; for knowing that the end was at hand, she looked anxiously and hurriedly into the church, without seeming able to fix her eyes on any particular object; while her mother seemed as if her eyes were glazed, so intently were they fixed upon her daughter.

"Suddenly, and without preparation, the black curtain, like a pall, and the sobs and tears of the family broke forth. One beautiful little child was carried out almost in fits. Water was brought to the poor mother; and at last, making our way with difficulty through the dense crowd, we got into the sacristy. "I declare," said the Countess———to me, wiping her eyes, "It is worse than a marriage!" I expressed my horror at the sacrifice of a girl so young, that she could not possibly have known her own mind. Almost all the ladies agreed with me, especially all who had daughters, but many of the old gentlemen were of a different opinion. The young men were decidedly of my way of thinking, but many young girls, who were conversing together, seemed rather to envy their friend, who had looked so pretty and graceful, and "so happy," and whose dress "suited so well," and to have no objection to "go and do likewise."

TIME'S SOLILOQUY.

Old! call you me? Ay! when the Almighty spoke creation into birth, I was there. Then was I born. Mid the bloom and verdure of Paradise, I gazed upon the young world, radiant with celestial smiles. I rose upon the pinions of the first morn, and caught the sweet dew drops as they fell, and sparkled on the boughs of the garden. Ere the foot of man was heard sounding in this wilderness, I gazed out upon its thousand rivers, flashing in light and reflecting the broad sun, like a thousand jewels upon their bosoms. The cataracts sent up their anthems in these solitudes, and none was here to listen to the new-born melody, but I! The fawns bounded over the hills, and drank at the limpid streams, ages before an arm was raised to injure or make them afraid. For thousands of years the Morning Star rose in beauty upon these unpeopled shores, and its twin-sister of the Eve flamed in the forehead of the sky, with no eye to admire their rays but mine. Ay! call me old! Babylon and Assyria, Palmyra and Thebes, rose, flourished and fell, and I beheld them in their glory and decline.—Scarce a melancholy ruin marks the place of their existence; but when their first stones were laid in the earth, I was in their busy streets, and crumbling their magnificent palaces to the earth. My books will show a long and fearful account against them. I give them their period of glory and splendor; but at their birth, I conceal in them the seeds of death and decay—They must go down and be humbled in the dust—their heads bowed down before the rising glories of young nations, to whose prosperity there will also come a date, and a day of decline. I poise my wings over the earth, and watch the course and doings of its inhabitants. I call up the violets upon the hill, and crumble the gray ruins to the ground. I am the agent of a Higher Power, to give life and take it away. I spread silken tresses upon the brow of the young, and plant gray hair on the head of the aged man. Dimples and smiles, at my bidding, lurk around the lips of the innocent child, and I furrow the brow of age with wrinkles. Old, do you call me? ay, but when will my days be numbered?—When will Time end, and Eternity begin? When will the earth and its waters—and the universe be rolled, and a new world commence its revolutions? Not till He, who first bid me begin my flight, so orders it. When his purposes, who called me into being, are accomplished, then, and not till then—and no one can proclaim the hour—I too, shall go to the place of all the living.

MEMORY.—Whatever has once given us pain or pleasure is remembered long, and recurred to us often, as we pass down the journey of life to gray hairs and solitudes of our last years. Love has been to every one the cause of both. Every one has treasured away on the sacred pages of memory a thousand little incidents, never to be revealed in time, to which, as to some fascinating fiction, it returns, whenever a gloomy or an idle, unsocial hour calls up the musing spirit—and turns the mind upon the past. Life, reviewed through the mists of by-gone years, seems rather a curious wrought fiction, or a feverish dream, than a stern reality. We are surrounded by mementoes of the affection of friends, but these friends themselves, are gone—we remember the councils of wisdom, the sage instructions of experience, by which our minds were formed, and a direction given to the current of our thoughts and habits, but the lips from whence they flowed, have long been mute as the still valley where they lie mouldering. We have danced with the gay and giddy, and been enraptured at the thrilling voice and bright eyes of beauty, but we are alone. The visions have passed from us. In one grave-yard and another, there are little hillocks, and white stones bearing remembered names, and this is all, all that is left to us. But it is among the melancholy ruins of the past, that we gather the richest stores for the future. It is there we learn how very frail are even the strongest cords of affection. It is there we learn to prepare for another state of being.—Trenton Emporium.

A MODEL OF THE INQUISITION AT COIMBRA.—A very curious model of the Inquisition of Coimbra is now being exhibited at No. 20 Waterloo place. It is a perfect miniature representation of the horrible prison which was destroyed by the populace in August, 1820. The model is on a scale of half an inch to a foot, and conveys at once the most perfect notion of the plan and elevation of the building. Mr. Young, by whom it was constructed was at Coimbra, at the time the Portugese mob destroyed the place, and had the best opportunities of making a correct model. He was an eye-witness of the horrors which were discovered when the roof and walls were pulled down, and the numerous dungeons, torture-rooms, corridores, council-rooms, secret passages, &c., were disclosed. The place appears to have been contrived by the most ingenious architects of prison tortures. It abounds with wells for dipping or drowning refractory prisoners, with stoves for baking heretics! (Protestants)—and in short, with such an abundance of contrivances for the annoyance and discomfort or destruction of human existence, that even the malevolence of a fiend or an inquisitor must have been exhausted in discovering them. The model is so constructed, that it can be taken entirely to pieces, and every portion of the interior surveyed. Every protestant should see this model; it will confirm him in his adherence to his mode of faith; and every papist should also indulge in a look at it, as it will show him by what means his religious opinions and tenets have been supported for ages on the great continent of Southern Europe.—London Times.

A PENAL COLONY.—The history of the penal colony at Australia, must be regarded as extraordinary. It is situated on the largest island in the world, and was visited by Captain Cook in 1770. He then called it Botany Bay. It was colonized by the English in 1778, and a portion of the settlement is made use of as a penal colony for convicts. In 1838, no fewer than 336 ships arrived at New South Wales, nearly all from Great Britain; while in 1839, the imports into Sydney amounted to between $5,000,000, and $6,000,000, and the exports to between $3,000,000 and $5,000,000. The island is 2,700 miles long and 2,000 wide. Sydney is the capitol, and has about 30,000 inhabitants. At a sale of building lots in that town only a few months back, $100 per foot were obtained in some cases, and others sold at the rate of $150,000 per acre. The original lots, on which Sidney is built, were given to the early convicts, in the hope of inducing them to become industrious and independent. So lightly were they regarded by the majority, however, that one, more far-seeing than the rest, purchased the whole from his companions, for two puncheons of rum. This man eventually died worth $300,000 per annum, although 20 or 30 years before, he had been transported for stealing geese from a common in England. He lived in great splendor towards the close of his life, his table being furnished with every luxury. Among those who depended upon his bounty, was a clergyman who said grace at his table, who had been transported for the crime of forgery!

MOUNTAINS OF LEBANON.—The country at that point is of the most picturesque description, alternately covered with the mulberry, the fig, and the vine, and in greater luxuriance than is to be met with in the lower tract. Although now on the height of the first range, you are, to all appearance, walled in with other hills, whilst around you extend undulating valleys, broken here and there with minor eminences. The lofty irradd, or locust tree, and the olive, with its deep dark tint, were both seen diversifying the picture. Far above all in the eastern horizon, is the wedge-shaped mountain of the Scinneen—lofty, bold, and rugged—a stern contrast to the beautiful vegetation which surrounds it.—Hunter's Expedition in Syria.

CONSCIENCE.—A tender conscience is like the apple of a man's eye—the least dust that gathers into it, affects it. There is no surer and better way to know whether our consciences are dead and stupid, than to observe what impression small sins make upon them: if we are not very careful to avoid all appearance of evil, and to shun whatever looks like sin; if we are not so much troubled at the vanity of our thoughts and words, at the rising up of our sinful motions and desires in us, as we have been formerly, we may then conclude that our hearts are hardened, and our consciences are stupifying—for a tender conscience will no more allow of small sins than of great sins.—Bishop Hopkins.

AN AMUSING INCIDENT.—We sat down a few evenings since in the Broadway Society, listening to a reformed drunkard who was giving over the history of his past life, when he came to a stormy wretched night in which he put into a noted rumshop, where he got uproariously drunk and was turned out head and heels into the pitiless storm. Turning suddenly round and looking up at a distinguished advocate of temperance sitting on the platform, he said he was very happy to see the gentleman who turned him out of doors about as sick of his business of drunkard making as himself was of drunkard getting. The ex-knight of the bar, no less a personage than Mr. Sandy Welsh, took it as pleasantly as he could, though for the moment it threw him into some confusion. But it was not a little amusing to see those two individuals in such a different character and condition from what they once sustained.—Jour. of Amer. Tem. Union.

Lost wealth may be regained by a course of industry; the wreck of health repaired by temperance; forgotten knowledge restored by study; alienated friendship smoothed into forgiveness; even forfeited reputation won back by penitence and virtue.—Picayune.

When a man's moral system is dried up and withered beneath the scorching rays of avarice and selfishness, you can no more bring the salt drops of feeling out of him, than you can squeeze cider out of a soap stone.

Every stroke of a pendulum ushers one human being into existence, and heralds the departure of another.

It will afford sweeter happiness in the hour of death, to have wiped one tear from the cheek of sorrow, than to have ruled an empire—to have conquered millions, or enslaved the world.

It is said that there are six Americans in the College of the Propaganda at Rome.

Sabbath Department.

"Remember the Sabbath Day to keep it Holy."

MR. EDITOR, SIR:—As I had the pleasure of conversing with a minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ, on the great and important subject of the Sabbath, a few days since, I merely asked him to give me his Bible proof for keeping first day of the week for a Sabbath. He rather declined at first. As I insisted in the answer, he said he could tell me, and it was this: "we have the apostolic example, and when our Savior came he destroyed the old covenant and gave us a new one;" that is all the answer he could give, therefore, I wish to quote a few passages of scripture to prove that the ten commandments are not done away.

Our blessed Savior says in Matt. vii. 21, "Not every one saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." To know the will of God and do it, is a matter of great importance, because if we do the will of God he will make us eternally happy.

Also he says in Matt. v. 17—19. "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill. For verily, I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven."

Again in Matt. 22 chap. we have the account of a lawyer coming to our Savior, and asking him "which is the great commandment in the law? Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment, and the second is like unto it. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets."

These commands are frequently quoted by those that observe the first day Sabbath, with a pretence that our Savior extracted those two from the ten precepts, and said those were all that was necessary for us to observe. That is a sandy foundation to build on, for those two embrace the whole decalogue, and it can not be proved other wise.

Again, they say we have the Apostolic example. That is false, for there is no proof of that in the scriptures. We read that they had two meetings, the first was on the evening following the extraordinary event of Christ's rising from the dead, and the other was when Paul was about to depart on the morrow. Those two meetings are all that we have any account of in the New Testament, and but one of these in the day time. We will cast our eye for one moment to the meeting they held on the Sabbath, which is the seventh day of the week. Just observe for one moment how careful they were to obey the example of our blessed Savior. We have the following account of Barnabas and Paul, Acts xiii. 14. "They came into Antioch in Pisidia and went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day, and sat down, and after reading of the law and the prophets, they having liberty from the rulers of the synagogue to speak, Paul arose and preached Christ to those that were present, both Jews and Gentiles." So you see that Gentiles keep the Sabbath as well as the Jews, so that is proved that they meet together from time to time as though they were equally concerned in this matter.

Again, in the same chapter, 42d verse, he says, "and when the Jews were gone out of the synagogue, the Gentiles besought that these words might be preached to them the next Sabbath." 44th verse, "and the next Sabbath day came almost the whole city together to hear the word." Perhaps that is sufficient to prove that it was their practice to meet from Sabbath to Sabbath to hear the word of God preached. Or why did not Paul and Barnabas say, come let us meet to-morrow (Sunday,) on our new Sabbath? But nothing of the kind is heard from any of them, and it really seems as though they never heard or thought of such a thing, and I believe they never did for we hear nothing more about meetings or preaching until the next Sabbath. And now for a minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ to say that he has the Apostolic example, is a complete contradiction of the bible, and now, where is the man that dare say that the Apostles kept the first day of the week for the Sabbath, when it is not called the Sabbath in the Bible from Genesis to Revelation? The seventh day is called the Sabbath to distinguish it from the other days of the week, St. Mark ii. 27, 28. "And he said unto them, The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath. Therefore the Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath," as much as if he had said man was not made to be in misery in consequence of the Sabbath. But the Sabbath was made for the comfort and happiness of man, not a day of distress, not that they should let their cattle suffer for the want of water or food, not that they should let their sheep perish that had fallen into the ditch, and not pull it out on the Sabbath day. That such kind of work were lawful to be done on the Sabbath, we have our Savior's words for it. He said, "it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day, to save life and not to destroy." Therefore, O teachers! be careful what you say and what you teach, and be fully and rationally convinced that what you preach is agreeable to the will of God, revealed to us in the scriptures of truth. Be not conformed to the world, but to the will of God, not make void the law of God through your tradition.

One word to those who observe the command of God, and follow the blessed Savior in all his examples. Shall we withhold our influence while others trample the law of God beneath their feet? God forbid that we should hold our peace in this blessed cause. As we have the light, so walk in it.

Hark! hark! methinks I hear that small still voice say, if those that keep the sayings of mine are faithful, the word of God will triumph over all error. B. P. L.

Religious Department.

We publish the following extract from Marsh's Church History, to show what was the condition of the Christian Church at the time of the change of the Sabbath from the seventh-day to the first.

"The revolution under Constantine was one from which almost every thing which the Christian values, might be hoped; but, alas! such is the depravity of human nature, it was one in which almost every thing of evangelical worth was lost. Constantine brought the world into the church, and the church was paralyzed. The number of nominal Christians was indeed increased a thousand-fold. A new spring was given to missionary effort; and in this century, a number of barbarous tribes among the Armenians, the Ethiopians, the Georgians, the Goths, and the Gauls, were partially enlightened by the gospel of Christ. The work of translating and circulating the Holy Scriptures, also received great encouragement, though, for the former, few had learning and industry sufficient. The Latin version of Jerome, though, far from being correct, stands pre-eminent over all others that were made. Schools were established and libraries were formed for Christian youth, and the study of philosophy and the liberal arts was encouraged, that Christianity might not suffer by comparison for advocates with the erudition and skill of the sages of paganism. Immense and splendid temples were erected and richly endowed, and a great priesthood was regularly organized and liberally supported. The body existed, but the spirit had fled. Constantine set up an immense national Church, but the humility, and faith, and spirituality of the age of Polycarp had passed away. Constantine did not find it in the Church which he thus raised to worldly glory, and how could he create it there by those very means which always destroy vital piety?

"Among the more retired, in humble walks of life, there was, no doubt, much true religion. There must have been much to support the sufferers through the Dioclesian persecution. Many of these sufferers, with their children, were humble followers of Christ for many years. Some of the ministers were worthy of a better age. But the most of those who were exalted to places of power and trust, were engaged in pompous rites and ceremonies, and knew but little of the humiliating and sanctifying doctrines of Christianity. Indeed their elevation to wealth and power was followed by an amazing increase of luxury and vice. Bishops contended with bishops about the extent of their jurisdictions; vied with princes in their style of living, and shewed that they placed their heaven upon earth. Having such spiritual guides, the mass of the people soon became exceedingly corrupt. Schools of profligate men, allured by gain or driven by fear, pressed into the church; discipline ceased, and superstition reigned without control. The gentile converts to nominal Christianity, brought into the church a taste for the public processions and prayers, by which they had been accustomed to appease their gods; hastily transferred the virtues which had been supposed to belong to their temples and ablutions to Christian churches and Christian ordinances, and were at once disposed to deify the apostles and early Christians as they had been accustomed to do the heroes of antiquity. The old Christians found themselves associated with a new world of admirers, who knew nothing about their religion, and who were easily subjected to the most abominable impositions, prodigies, and miracles, therefore, beyond number were multiplied. The bones and relics of dead saints performed wonders. Dust and earth, brought from Palestine, was viewed as a certain and powerful remedy against the violence of wicked spirits. And, before the close of the century, the great business of the lower order of priests was to impose, in ten thousand ways, in the vilest manner, upon the credulity of the ignorant multitude.

"The erection of splendid temples, and introduction of a splendid worship, gave rise also to a vast variety of additional rites and ceremonies. These, in general, were copied from the heathen worship, and such was the amalgamation of the two religions, as to differ very little in their external appearance. Georgeous robes, mitres, tiaras, wax tapers, crosiers, processions, lustrations, images, gold and silver vases, are mentioned as common to both Christian and heathen churches. What deplorable degeneracy from the simple worship of the Apostles! The great festivals were five in number, commemorating the birth, death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, and the day of pentecost, but were rather days of public licentiousness than of pious exercises.

"Fasts were greatly multiplied, under the idea that they repelled evil spirits.—From being the outpourings of a broken heart and a contrite spirit, the public prayers degenerated into vain bombast, and in consequence of an intimate connection with the Grecian schools, the sermons of the divines partook of the nature of an oration, and were clapped and applauded, as were orators in the forum, by the christian assemblies. Two principles were introduced into the church which helped her on in her downward course, and led brothers to imbrue his hands in a brother's blood, and this to, thinking that he did God's service. The first was, "That it is an act of virtue to deceive and lie, when, by that means, the interests of the church may be promoted;" the other, that "Errors in religion, when mantained and adhered to, after proper admonition, are punishable with civil penalties and corporeal tortures."—Strange that men, who profess to serve an holy master, and to be looking toward an holy heaven, should so soon set at defiance the solemn denunciations of Christ, against the fearful, the unbelieving, the abominable, and all liars; and, that, with scorched flesh and broken limbs, they should kindle the fires of persecution against their own companions!"

From the Christian Watchman.

THE ANGELS TURNED MISSIONARIES.

"Why, if angels had this privilege of laboring for the salvation of the heathen, I had almost said—all heaven would be vacated."—Dr. Wayland.

I was sitting the other evening thinking of the state of missions, of the loud call of the heathen and of the missionaries for aid, and of the cold neglect of the church at home, when these words uttered with deep feeling at the late Foreign Mission meeting, came rushing into my mind. Suddenly an insensibility to all sights and sounds stole over me. I know not whether it was sleep bringing with it dreams, or one of those waking ecstacies in which the imagination (as in the insane,) gains for a time the ascendancy over reason so that we live awhile in fancied scenes.

I seemed to be standing before the glistening walls of the new Jerusalem. The twelve gates of solid pearl were thrown open; and in each entrance stood an angel with a silver trumpet. They blew in sweet harmony a rally note which rung echoing through space. Presently the sound of approaching wings and glad voices was heard; and then crowds on crowds and millions on millions of joyous angels appeared thronging hastily up to the city gates.

They gathered around a golden throne standing in the centre of the city, on which was seated one like unto the Son of man. His hands and his feet were pierced and marked with blood, but a smile was on his countenance and a halo of light was round his head; and at the sight of him the heavenly host broke forth in one pealing shout, "Glory to God and to the Lamb; thou art worthy to be exalted thus, O Lamb that wast slain!"

Then all was still, and every eye was bent eagerly toward the throne, when he who sat upon it thus began, "Gabriel, rememberest thou the hour when thou wast sent to announce to the Virgin Mother a Savior's birth? Rememberest thou the joyful host who shouted to the shepherds of once favored Judah, when the babe of Bethlehem was born?" Exulting enthusiasms kindled in the archangel's eye as he responded—"Never, never can that happy mission, that rapturous song be forgotten by one in heaven?"—and as he spoke a thousand harp-strings sung, and a thousand voices shouted, "Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, good will to men.

He upon the throne proceeded. "I that search all hearts know what feelings then swelled your breasts. Ye that sung when yonder world and man its inhabitant were created—ye that guarded Eden—ye that talked with Abraham and Moses, and bore them the promise—ye who sung praises at Messiah's birth—ye who ministered to the tempted Jesus, the sufferer of Gethsemane, the crucified on Calvary—yet that now rejoice over one sinner that repenteth—I know what rapture was yours when permitted to share some humble part in the work of man's salvation. And now, ye that delight to adore and praise your once absent and humiliated but now restored and exalted Lord,—pant ye to follow your Master's footsteps, and to preach his gospel to ruined man?" Then broke forth anew from the whole vast host—"O 'tis heaven to serve thee here; 'twould be more than heaven to follow thee there."—"But," continued he, "remember Calvary, the thorns, the scourge, the torturing nails, still more the bitter taunts, the exceeding sorrow, the bloody sweat, all the agony and anguish of your dying Lord;" (and as he recalled to their minds their dreadful past, I saw thier breasts heave, and seemed to see the burning tears start to many an eye; but I remembered there all tears are wiped away;) "and," continued he, "could ye, happy spirits, endure that same suffering, that baptism of agony?" There was a moment's quivering of many a lip; but it was only for a moment. "O joy—joy," burst forth from every lip—"joy unutterable to die like our Lord for wretched and ruined man. We delight to do thy will, O God." And then again harps and voices united in the song. "Worthy—worthy is the Lamb that was slain."

Once more he upon the throne went on, "No it needed no test to prove your love for man and for your Master's cause. But —hark;" and as he paused the sound of an approaching trumpet was heard and a joyful voice shouting—"A soul is new born; a soul of earth is redeemed." As the listening host caught again the glad tidings, they seized again their harps, and the voice of rapturous song swelled long and loud from every heart. When this new rapture had at length subsided, the newly arrived herald proceeded,—"Other tidings I bring from the world of sin, O Redeemer of man. I have come from the land where once was paradise, but where millions on millions of dark-minded men swarm rapidly down the road to death, and drop daily by thousands into the abyss of endless night. I have seen, too, hundreds who bear thy name, O Christ, on those same shores hazarding their lives and toiling to gather a little of the paltry dust of that worthless ball. I have seen, too, thousands of eager youth pouring forth from Christian lands, ready to leave friends, and property, and happy country, panting to bear misery and slaughter to men unprepared to die, and willing to lay their own bones on a foreign shore, if they can gain a warrior's empty renown. I have seen still more, a nation's treasure drained, to send those destroying legions forth, and even a father's and a mother's scanty pittance freely given up to equip a darling son for the work of death. But, alas, who makes sacrifice for treasures on high?—What ardent youth is willing to endure hardness as a good soldier of Christ, to carry joy and blessedness and eternal life to distant nations? Who pants for a crown of immortal glory? What citizen of God's kingdom on earth is liberal in his heavenly Master's cause? O, what privileges and honors are slighted by ungrateful man!—Would that we, happy brothers, could share in that glorious work!" Overcome by emotion he ceased to speak.

Then once more the exalted Redeemer broke the silence. "Pant ye, then, holy throng, for this labor of love? Long ye to share the privilege of my ungrateful and neglectful children on earth? Go then—go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that turns many to righteousness shall shine as a star in the firmament on high."

One rush—one leap—and heaven was vacant. They had broken away like a torrent. I caught a moment's glimpse of glittering wings and fluttering robes plunging in the depths below; then nought was seen but harps and crowns, and white robes and branches of palm dropped in their haste, and strewing the streets of the deserted city. In the distance was an indistinct view of the earthly ball swarming with the heavenly host, countless myriads surrounding each sinful mortal, some pleading with tears, and some shouting for joy.

But the scene was fading away—the vision, the reverie was gone.

Shall we mourn or rejoice that it is but a reverie? Shall we grieve that the heathen have not angel preachers to win them to Christ; or shall we rejoice that we still have the privilege of imitating our heavenly Master and of gaining stars for our crown on high? PHILANDER.

CLOUDS BIG WITH MERCY.

It is delightful to reflect how many prayers, like clouds of incense, have gone up from the hearts of God's people during this present Lenten season. Not one of those prayers that have been offered from the ground of the heart, in sincerity and faith, will fail to bring down a divine blessing.—Truly does the great Hearer of Prayer say, "I never said unto the seed of Jacob, seek me in vain." But God does not always, perhaps not often, take our method in answering prayer. We pray for instance, for faith, and imagine that it is to descend, with a kind of gentle illapse into the soul. Our prayer will be answered—but how? We attempt to lean on every earthly prop. God knocks the staff from under us. Do we fall? No; for faith is now called into exercise to support us. Again, we are thinking of sailing to heaven in a calm. God raises a great tempest, and breaks the ship, and tosses us into the waves. Do we sink? No. Now our faith is called into exercise, and saves us.

We pray for charity. God makes us parties in distressing scenes. God suffers us to be wronged, then bids us love.

We pray for humility. God does not overrule some leading infirmity of our heart; we stumble and fall—and in the midst of sorrow and shame, humility is formed.

We pray for happiness, for comfort, for joy. We have already formed our plan of happiness. We have our little paradise around us. We hope we shall not experience those losses and horrors, which we have seen overwhelming others.

Suddenly, however, all our earthly schemes are broken up. A child dies—a friend is taken away—our own abode is unfixed. And are we unhappy? No;—God now comforts us, and makes our comforts to flow from himself. We wished to dwell in our own house; but we must dwell in houses that we have not builded. We wished to drink of our own wells; but we must drink of wells that we have not digged. We wished to pluck fruit from our own vineyard; but we must take it from one we have not planted. God, very commonly, as tribulation abounds, makes our consolation to abound. Is the Christian afflicted? His joy, his comfort is ended. He is near, that will bind up that broken heart. Yes, believer, your prayers are heard. Out of this very cloud that seems to darken the heavens, you shall hear the voice, "Thou art my beloved son!"

With regard to supplies in time of exigency—we pray to have our wants supplied. We think of a certain quarter whence help will come. But we are woefully disappointed, no help appears. In this person, we say, we shall find a friend; but he is removed or dies, or is too much occupied. No help appears. But when we have wearied ourselves to find the way—all to no purpose—God opens an unseen door, and in such a manner as to show that "the Lord hath done it"—and thus sends the needed help. Our wisdom is to go to God with all our burdens, to lay them at his feet, and to leave the whole matter of our deliverance in his hands. He sees things from the beginning to the end—and will make all things, to those who love Him and call on his name, to work together for their everlasting good.—Epis. Rec.

THE UNGODLY.—There are those on earth, who bear the image of the Creator, but seem to have no impression of his character. His love to them is a dead letter; fear is cast off, and prayer is restrained. They neither exercise gratitude for mercies received, or penitence for mercies abused, and are without God and without hope in the world. Such are the ungodly. Unhappy is the state, and gloomy will be the doom of such.—N. Y. Evan.

CONVERSATIONS ON SCRIPTURE.

The Present and Future State of the Jewish Nation.

1. Why should Jerusalem be a subject of interest to the Christian?

A. Because it is so to the Lord, and because its restoration to the divine favor will be the period of universal blessing to the world.

2. What proof is there that the Lord is thus interested respecting Jerusalem and the Jews?

A. He has said Himself, that he has put His name there for ever; and that His eyes and His heart shall be there perpetually (1 Kings. ix.) And again—"I will plant them in this land assuredly, with my whole heart and with my whole soul," (Jer. xxxii. 41)

3. How do you know that this verse has not already been fulfilled?

A. Because it is said in a preceding verse to be at a time when He will give them one heart and one way, that they may fear Him FOR EVER (Jer. xxxii 39)

4. Is this their present state before Him?

A. No, their moral state is described in Rom. ix. 31, "Israel hath not attained unto the law of righteousness, because they sought it not by faith." Their outward state is described in Hosea, "The children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice," &c., and then it is added, 'Afterwards shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord thy God, and David (David means "beloved" in Hebrew.—David being a type of the Messiah, his name is frequently applied to Christ, as in the following passages:—Jer. xxx. 9, Ezek. xxxiv. 23, xxxvii. 24. See Cruden's Concordance—word "David.") their king; and shall fear the Lord and His goodness in the latter days." (Hosea iii. 4, 5.)

5. Do not some suppose that the Jews may be converted, and yet not restored to their own land?

A. Yes, but this opinion is entirely at variance with the scriptures, as the following quotations will plainly show:—

Amos ix. 14.—"I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities and inhabit them; * * * * and I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of the land which I have given them."

Also Jer. xxxii. 41.—"I will plant them in this land assuredly."

Also Ezekiel xxxiv. 25, &c.—"I will make with them a covenant of peace; * * * and I will make them and the places round about my hill a blessing; * * * and they shall be safe in their land." It is certain that these promises have not yet been fulfilled, for two reasons; first—because after having been thus restored, they shall be "no more pulled up;" and secondly—it is said to be a time "when He will give them one heart and one way, that they may fear me forever.

6. Is there not also in Ezekiel a remarkable prophecy respecting the restoration of the ten tribes?

A. There is; the ten tribes were carried into captivity about 700 years before Christ, and have never since been restored or even heard of. But it is said in Ezek. xxxvii. 22, &c., that "I will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land; and I will make them (together with Judah, from whom they have been divided ever since the time of Solomon) one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all * * * * and they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt." Many more passages might be added, but it is sufficient to observe, that the promises of their restoration to their land, and those of their conversion, are invariably distinct in scripture, although they often go together in the same portion of the prophetic word, as in Ezek. xxxvii. 22, 24.

7. Is there any reason for the land being so particularly mentioned?

A. Yes; because of the promise to Abraham in Gen. xv. 18, "Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river—the river Uphrates;" and in Gen. xvi. 8, it is said to be "for an EVERLASTING possession;" wherefore the restoration of Israel to their land is necessary, in order to vindicate the faithfulness of God. The gifts and calling of God are never repented of (Rom. xi. 29.)

8. Is Jerusalem mentioned distinctly as the land?

A. Yes, it is written in Zech. xiv. 11, that "men shall dwell in it, and there shall be no more utter destruction, but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited." The words "no more," shew that this promise has not yet been fulfilled.

9. Is it certain that the literal city is here intended?

A. It is; for in the preceding verse it is thus described:—"Jerusalem shall be lifted up and inhabited in her place, from Benjamin's gate unto the place of the first gate, unto the corner gate, and from the tower of Hananeel unto the king's wine-presses." The words of Jeremiah are even more remarkable.—"Behold! the days come, saith the Lord, that the city shall be built to the Lord from the tower of Hananeel unto the gate of the corner: and the measuring line shall yet go forth against it upon the hill Gareb, and shall compass about it to Goath; and the whole valley of dead bodies, and of the ashes, and all the fields unto the brook of Kedron unto the corner of the horse-gate toward the east, shall be holy unto the Lord; it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down any more forever."—(Jer. xxxi. 38—40.)

10. Is there any farther proof of the restoration of the Jews to their own land?

A. There is; in Ezek. xlviii. the arrangement of all the tribes, and the extent of their borders is there minutely specified. The arrangement is entirely different from that which formerly existed; one instance of which is, that the two tribes and a half which used to be on the east of Jordan, are to have their situation on the west.

11. Is there any intimation of Jerusalem's restoration to the divine blessing in the New Testament?

A. There is; after the Lord Jesus had wept over Jerusalem, and was leaving the temple for the last time, He added these words, "Behold! your house is left unto you desolate: for ye shall not see me henceforth till ye shall say—Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."—Matt. xxiii 38.

12. Are there any specific events mentioned as about to happen before this event?

A. Yes, those which are recorded in Zech. xii. and xiv., and Joel ii. and iii.

13. What do you learn from these chapters?

A. That the Jews will return in unbelief to Jerusalem, and be converted when in their city.

14. Do you mean that they will be restored by the Lord while in unbelief?

A. No; these chapters show that a considerable body will return in unbelief; after which the Lord will restore the whole nation. After being subjected to judgments more terrible than any they have yet endured, the remnant who are spared, will be converted in the land. But their spontaneous return should be carefully distinguished from their restoration by the Lord, as described in Isaiah xi. 11.

15. What will befall them after this spontaneous return?

A. The Lord will stretch out His hand against them, and gather all nations against Jerusalem.—Zech. xiv. 2, and Zech. xii.

16. May not this have already taken place?

A. It cannot have taken place yet, for it is written in the next verse.—"Then shall the Lord go forth and fight against those nations, as when He fought in the day of battle." In every past siege He has allowed the besiegers to triumph. The words in Zech. xiv. are very remarkable.

17. Will Jerusalem then be delivered by the Lord?

A. It will not only be delivered, but "be made a cup of trembling unto all the people round about, when they shall be in the siege, both against Judah and against Jerusalem. And in that day will I make Jerusalem a burthensome stone for all people, all that burthen themselves with it shall be cut in pieces, though all the people of the earth be gathered together against it.—Zech. xii. The 24th of Matthew also refers to this future siege of Jerusalem.

18. Will any thing cause some among the Jews to turn unto the Lord?

A. Yes, tribulation; and so it is written in Hosea v. 15, "I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence; . . . . in their affliction they will seek me early." The manner in which they seek and are answered, is fully described in Joel ii. 15. After describing the supplication of some who will be softened by the affliction, it is added,—"Then will the Lord be jealous for His land, and pity His people."

19. Is the place of their supplication mentioned?

A. Yes; the temple at Jerusalem; for the words in Joel are, "Let the priests, the ministers of the Lord, weep between the porch and altar." The existence of the temple at this period is shewn also by the description of their deliverance by the Lord in Isaiah lxvi. 6,—"A voice of noise from the city, a voice from the temple, a voice of the Lord, that rendereth recompense to His enemies." The whole of this chapter refers to this period.

20. By what means are the Jews delivered?

A. By the personal appearing of the Lord, the Messiah: for it is written in Zech. xiv. 4, that "His feet shall stand in that day (i. e., the day on which he destroys the nations) on the Mount of Olives."

21. May not this passage refer to his first appearing?

A. It cannot, because He then came not to destroy, but to save; and secondly—it is added in the following verse, that he shall come and all the saints with Him. It is certain that He never yet has been manifested in glory with all his saints.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, February 8, 1843.

"Avenge not Yourselves."

The above exhortation of the Apostle to the Romans, exhibits one of the most lovely and valuable principles of the gospel. It is in perfect accordance with the conduct of Jesus Christ "when he was reviled he reviled not again." Thus the example of our Savior and pattern, and the exhortation of the Apostle teach us this grand truth that it is no part of the Christian's duty to avenge himself; for vengeance belongs to God, and he will execute it.

The Savior forewarned his disciples that in the world they should have tribulation, but in him peace; and also that if any man would live godly in Christ Jesus, he should suffer persecution. But he gave them no instruction to avenge their own wrongs. This would be in contrariety to the principles on which his kingdom was founded, and to the example which he had given them in his own conduct. In another place, he informed the judge before whom he was arraigned that his kingdom was not of this world, but if it were of the world, then would his servants fight, that he should not be delivered to the Jews.—As his kingdom was not of the earth, or worldly in its nature and administration, so worldly means should not be used to establish or defend it. In its nature, it was divine and spiritual; consequently in its administration it must be so, and no carnal weapons should be used. Whatever belongs to the kingdom of Christ, belongs to every component part of it—to every individual that comes into it.

The Apostle to the Corinthians further teaches that the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds, and to the Romans he says, be not overcome of evil but overcome evil with good. All these teachings perfectly agree with the grand principle on which the Christian religion is founded, viz: of supreme love to God and impartial unaffected love to all men. Men can be reclaimed by mildness and love, when they can not be driven by force. This the wise man Solomon well understood when he said, a soft answer turneth away wrath, but grievous words stir up anger; and if thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink; for thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head, and the Lord shall reward thee. The Savior taught the same in his sermon on the Mount. 'But I say you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your father which is in heaven."

If the above are the true principles of the kingdom, then he who takes vengeance into his own hands and executes it upon his enemies, shows that he takes that in his own hands which belongs to God, for God has declared that he will repay. It is God's right to reign, and every deviation from right every departure from moral rectitude, every infringement of another's rights, is a sin against the law of God, and he alone has the right to execute vengeance.

The Savior, in order to have his disciples clearly understand from what source they might expect deliverance from their enemies, gives them the parable of the widow and the unjust judge, and then exclaims, shall not God avenge his own elect which cry day and night unto him, though he bear long with them? I tell you that he will avenge them speedily.

Avenging one's own wrongs, not only meddles with the business that belongs to God, but it evinces the spirit of this world. The Christian dishonors his profession and brings disgrace on the cause of piety when he steps aside from exercising love to his enemies, and undertakes to vindicate himself when slandered or insulted by forcible measures. Love will conquer the heart that law and force will harden.

But it is often said, I must vindicate my character. My reputation is at stake. Well how can this be done better than by adhering strictly to the pattern set by the Lord Jesus Christ, and to his teaching. "But I say unto you that ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek turn to him the other also." A life devoted to the cause of piety, and a constant exercise of the true principles of religion, a correct and consistent christian deportment maintained with evenness, is the best vindication of the character. This will subdue an enemy's heart, while other and forcible measures of vindication will only strengthen his enmity.

Millerism.

The doctrine of Mr. Miller is extending considerably. There is, however, in the teachers of it considerable diversity of opinion as to the appointed time of the end. It varies from the 15th of the present month to fourteen months.

This doctrine sets aside those prophecies that refer to the return of the Jews to their own land, and the possession of it. If these prophecies are to be fulfilled, then this doctrine is not true. That some important event is soon to take place, almost all believe, and there are those who are persuaded that it will be the establishment of the Jews in their own land, and the establishment of the Christian religion among them. The signs of the times indicate some mighty change. The whole enlightened world is in motion, such as has not been known for centuries. Many are running to and fro, and knowledge is increasing. Almost every scheme that can be devised to raise the condition of man, is in operation. Combinations are entered into of a great variety of forms and for divers purposes. Missionary, Tract, Bible, Education, Moral Reform, and Temperance Societies are in vigorous operation. Societies for ameliorating the condition of the Jews, Seamens' Friend Societies, Peace Societies, Societies to promote universal liberty, with many others whose object is to elevate man, are also plying their efforts unceasingly. The rapid spread of the gospel, the numerous revivals of religion, and the hastening progress of the Redeemer's kingdom, all speak of an important change. All these signs of the times, with numerous others, are doubtless the harbingers of some important event.—Coming events cast their shadows before, admonishing to faithfulness in the exercise of love to God pure and fervent, and of Christian benevolence that dictates the use of every consistent effort for the temporal and eternal interests of men. He that is wise will mark the signs of the times and be ready for any event, whether it be the coming of the Son of Man to judge the world, or the termination of his own earthly career.

Revival in Petersburgh.

BRO. BAILEY—Some time since I wrote you that the Lord was distilling some mercy drops in Petersburgh; I will now endeavor to give you some farther account of what he has done and is still doing.

A protracted meeting was commenced about the first of December in the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house, under the labors of Eld. Crandall, a first day Baptist minister. During these meetings many backsliders were reclaimed, and many sinners were converted. By request I continued the meetings in connection with Eld. Wescott and brother Jared Kenyon, after the labors of Eld. Crandall had closed, during which time many were converted from sin to holiness. I then commenced a meeting at Potter's Hill, and labored there for 16 successive days. Here also the Lord came down in a powerful manner, and the slain of the Lord were many in the camp, and when the "sacramental host of God's elect moved forward," the groans of the wounded, and the wailings of the dying mingled with the shouts of conquest, resounded on every side, and in the space of a few days Satan lost about 30 subjects, and King Jesus had an equal number of valiant soldiers enlisted under his conquering banner. As the result of our labors, I have baptized 20 who have connected themselves with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in this place. About 8 have connected themselves with the first day Baptist Church, while a goodly number have joined the Methodist Church.

Last first day I went to Berlin, & preached and baptized three; two of them being the result of the revival here. While I was at Potter's Hill, Eld. Wescott and Br. J. Kenyon commenced meeting about two miles east from the village, where the Lord wrought powerfully. Some hard and openly vicious were among their converts. The Lord is indeed doing wonders all around.—On the North, South, East and West, He is pouring out His Spirit, and sinners are flocking to Christ. In Berlin, last night 130 were on the anxious seat. During our meetings the greatest union has and does still prevail amongst the seventh and first day Baptists. Our labors have been jointly.

In the midst of the Revival, a "Dancing School" was opened a few rods from the meeting-house. Immediately the battery of prayer was opened against the fortress of Satan. And so well was the artillery of Heaven, and the battering ram of eternal truth brought to bear upon this citadel of the devil, that within the short space of 24 hours every gun of the enemy was silenced, the fort itself razed to the ground, and the black banner of his Satanic Majesty hauled down, a number of the besieged taken prisoners, and willingly enrolled themselves as subjects of King Jesus, while the remainder fled to parts unknown, or at least unheard, and now not even a dog, much less a man, dare open his mouth against the truth of the Bible. "This is indeed the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes," and to him be all the glory.

In conclusion, I would say, the work still continues nearly the same, and it is our determination to take complete possession of the land in the name of Jesus and drive the devil from this part of the country, and let the friends of Jesus look out that he finds not a lodgment elsewhere.

SHERMAN S. GRISWOLD.
Petersburgh, Jan. 28, 1843.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ARRIVAL OF THE CALEDONIA.

Nineteen Days Later from Europe.

The royal mail steamship Caledonia, Capt. Lott, arrived at Boston on Wednesday morning, a little before 7 o'clock, after a passage of 20 days and 12 hours, having been retarded by head winds and heavy seas.

The Caledonia brought 36 passengers from Liverpool, and several from Halifax.

The letters from Boston vary in their statements of the amount of specie brought by the steamer. The lowest sum stated is half a million, and the highest a million.—This specie, which most of it belongs here, will probably square up the balances that have for some weeks been in favor of the Literary Emporium.

Among the sales of stocks in London were £50,000 Massachusetts 6's at 89 a 90. They were of the parcel sold in Boston some time ago at 86.40 and so leaving to the operation a profit of some eight per cent. John Bull has not lost all his good nature.

The character of the news is decidedly favorable in all commercial respects.

The Great Western was to start for New York on the 11th of February, and had already a good number of passengers engaged.

The Acadia, Capt Ryrie, arrived at Liverpool on the 16th ult., and the Columbia, Capt. Miller, on the 29th.

The overland mail from India had not reached London on the evening of the 3d inst.

Several smart shocks of an earthquake had been felt in the southern part of Wales and in Cornwall.

The accouchment of the Queen, who is again enciente, will not take place, it is expected, before May.

The wheat crop is coming up beautifully every where, and looks more promising than it has done at the same season for years.

The American giant, Freeman, has been victorious in a prize fight with "Tipton Slasher," the champion of England. Wicked and foolish sport.

A captured slaver from Mozambique and Pernambuco had been brought into the Tagus.

Incendiarism has of late been very prevalent in various parts of the country. The firing of premises, stacks, and farms in many of the agricultural districts, has been on the increase, while few of the depredators have been discovered. In one instance, in Surrey, property to the amount of £2.000 was destroyed.

The income tax is still very unpopular, and the hatred of it increases daily. Meetings have been held in London, Scotland, and elsewhere, to petition for its repeal.

On the morning of the 21st of Dec., a fire broke out in the premises of Messrs. Platt & Co., tar and turpentine distillers, Parliament street, Liverpool, which consumed their works, besides two large warehouses, a school-house, and some cottages. The property insured amounts to £58,880.

Messrs. Fernandey and Sons, extensive corn merchants, have recently failed in £90,000—victims of the sliding scale.—The last few months have swept away a great number of houses over the country, arising from the same cause.

Mr. Duan, a great corn factor, at Wakefield, is amongst the victims to the sliding scale. He has failed in $1,500,000.

The Leeds Mercury, without mentioning names, states that several more serious failures in the corn trade have taken place in the West Riding.

Mr. Everett, the American Minister in London, has been passing a few days with Sir Robert Peel, at his country house, Drayton Manor, in company with a number of distinguished official and other personages.

The statement put forth by the Globe, that Sir Robert Peel would propose in the ensuing session of Parliament a fixed duty of 12 shillings a quarter on wheat, with a remission of 6 shillings in favor of the countries disposed to trade on reciprocal terms with Great Britain, has been contradicted by most of the government organs, and is now generally disbelieved.

The Church Intelligencer, a Puseyite paper, recommends the revival of monasteries in the Church of England.

Thomas Thornley, Esq., one of the members for Wolverhampton in the House of Commons, connected for many years with the United States as a merchant at Liverpool, has returned from visiting the principal cities in the Union. He addressed a large meeting of his constituents on the 23d ult., relative to the state of parties in the United States. He pointed out forcibly the advantages which both countries would derive from a free trade in corn.

The distress in Paisley continues, and is daily increasing.

Congressional News.

Correspondence of the Jour. of Com.

WASHINGTON, Wednesday, Jan. 25.

The question "who shall be the next President" is more agitated here, just now, than any other.

The friends of Mr. Calhoun, who are many and active, now propose to submit their claims to a National Democratic Convention, on the following conditions, viz: That the Convention shall not be held till May, 1844; 2d, that it shall consist of delegates chosen from each congressional district.

The friends of Mr. Van Buren, propose a Convention to be held at Cincinnati, in July, 1843, to be composed like the Convention in 1840, of delegates representing States, and casting the whole undivided electoral vote of the State.

In the meantime, I learn that a strong movement is about to be made in favor of Gen. Cass. Some preliminary arrangements have been made at Harrisburg, in his favor, under the auspices of the Porter interest, as it is said; and it is stated that a number of his friends are now assembled here for the purpose of effecting a general organization.

There are to be many changes in our representation at foreign courts, very soon. Mr. Todd is to return from Russia, and Mr. Jenifer from Austria. Several of the Charges are also to return. I understand that Mr. Wise will probably go to Austria. No one has yet been named for Paris; but, if Mr. Webster should not wish to go abroad, and it is stated that he does not, I would not be surprised if that important post should be given to Mr. Wheaton, now minister to Prussia. It is very necessary that the Paris Extraordinary should be a sound, able, and experienced diplomatist and statesman. I have heard from good authority that the administration contemplated, at one time, the appointment of Mr. Wheaton as Minister at London, instead of Mr. Everett.

The Exchequer.—The reports of the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject, were taken up, and Mr. Cushing spoke against that of the majority, defended the exchequer, and said if the House would go into the Committee of the Whole, he would move to substitute the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury for the bill reported last session by the select Committee, so that gentlemen might not be able to avoid responsibility on the allegation that "the peculiar friends of the President" were not disposed to favor the plan of the President.

Mr. Barnard obtained the floor and the House adjourned.

In the Senate, the Oregon occupation bill was again discussed. Mr. Woodbury and Mr. Phelps argued that the bill did not conflict with a fair construction of the treaty of 1810, and that it proposes to do no more than Great Britain had already done under the treaty.

Mr. Huntington took a different view of this point; but proposed that we should give Great Britain the twelve months' notice that the treaty required before we took possession.

Wednesday, Jan. 25.

Oregon Occupation Bill.—Mr. McDuffie had the floor, in the Senate, on this subject to-day, and treated it in a very satisfactory and able manner. Mr. McDuffie is in very feeble health and has been for some time. His friends were apprehensive that his strength would not sustain him in the effort. The Senate chamber was crowded by the members of the House who were anxious to hear him. Though he was manifestly weak in body, I did not perceive that he had lost any of the vigor of his intellect. I heard him often in the House during the administration of Mr. J. Q. Adams, and Gen. Jackson; and his general manner of speaking appears to be much the same as formerly. At all events, his argument has given the coup de grace to this Oregon scheme.

Thursday, Jan. 26.

The Oregon bill was again the subject of discussion in the Senate to-day.

Mr. Benton and Mr. Sevier went into detailed historical statements of the Oregon country, to show that our title to it, from discovery, was beyond dispute, independently of our claim under the cession from Spain to France, and from France to us.—They also contended that the bill did not militate against any provision of existing treaties with England. No question was taken on the subject.

Mr. J Q. Adams is of the opinion that our title is perfect. In a speech in the House some years ago, he said there were fourteen degrees of latitude on the Pacific that belonged to us, and for which we might fight.—Jour. of Com.

News of the Day.

Naval.—Active measures are in progress according to the general report, which we have no doubt is correct, to place in commission as many vessels of war as are available. The principal dock yards will soon be alive with the bustle of preparation.

Beginning at the North, at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, the new and beautiful sloop-of-war Saratoga is now ready for sea; her destination is the coast of Africa.

At Boston, the new brig Bainbridge is nearly ready, and the store ship Erie will sail for the Pacific in the course of the present month. The frigate Cumberland, launched last year, is to be fitted out, and the frigate Potomac is undergoing repairs.

At New York, the new frigate Savannah is in a state of forwardness; the sloop of war Vincennes is commissioned; the brig Somers is ready for service; and the brig Porpoise is about to sail for the coast of Africa.

At Norfolk, the frigates Brandywine and Macedonian, the sloop-of-war Levant, Warren, and St. Louis; the store ship Lexington; and the new brig Truxton, will soon be, if they are not already, in a condition to receive their officers and crew.

It has been intimated that the Brandywine is bound to the East Indies. One or two sloops will also be required for that station, and one or two more for the Pacific.

There are four first class frigates on the stocks, viz: the Santee, at Portsmouth; the Sabine at New York; the Raritan at Philadelphia; and the St. Lawrence at Norfolk, the two last ready for launching.

According to the estimate submitted to Congress, the naval force to be employed during this and the year following will be distributed as follows:—

	Frigates.	Sloops.	Brigs or Schooners.
Mediterranean,	2	3	3
Coast of Brazil	2	3	3
Pacific Ocean,	1	4	1
East Indies	1	2	2
Home Squadron,	1	4	4
Coast of Africa,	6	2	4
Whole number,	7	18	20

Of brigs or schooners, there are but nine, exclusive of the Wave and Flirt; leaving eleven to be built or purchased.—Army and Navy Chronicle.

The Marquesas Islands.—The seizure of these distant isles in the Pacific, by a French naval force under the command of Admiral Thouars, is beginning to attract public attention. It seems, by the following extract from an English paper received by the Caledonia, that the natives sought and obtained the protection of the French Flag in the fear of being punished for wantonly shedding the blood of American sea men. If the report of the outrage be true our Government will have a double reason for inquiring into the circumstances of this quasi capture:—Eve. Jour.

"The Moniteur publishes an official notification of the formal acceptation of the Marquesas Islands, in Polynesia, by Rear Admiral Dupetit Thouars, with imposing ceremonies, on the 1st of May—a guard of honor of sixty men, a treaty, shouts of "Vive le Roi," and a salute of 21 guns. The admiral it appears, gave and received presents from the natives, and the treaty of the cession with King Yotete, now a vassal of France, is described in the non-official accounts in very imposing colors. Some American sailors, who had sought an asylum from sea perils in his territory, were shot at by the natives to amuse themselves, and one of the strangers was killed. A missionary, however, intimated to the royal savage that this was a kind of sport which the Government of the United States would not permit being taken with its citizens, and King Yotete claimed the protection of the French Admiral.

"Probably the new vassal of France may hear more of this anon. The great republic will exact a rigid account for the blood which has been so wantonly shed. France, in its anxiety for new colonial settlements, seizes upon some queer spots, and commits some ridiculous feats. By the way, a vessel called the "Mary Joseph," containing a bishop, twelve missionaries, twelve nuns, and other holy persons, has sailed, or is about to sail from France, for the colonization of these islands, and for the purpose of propogating the gospel amongst the natives, who are described as one of the finest race of savages extant."

The Great Western.—The Caledonia brings a report of the Great Western steamship having been sold to Mehemet Ali. We have made inquiries and find there is no truth in the report, but on the contrary the company at Bristol had engaged quite a respectable number of passengers for her first trip to New York on the 10th of February.—Com. Adv.

A Nice Point.—One Ned Douglass, a New Orleans loafer and thief, was recently brought before the Recorder for stealing an umbrella. Mr. Douglass put himself on his "reserved rights," and defended himself on the principle of the "resolution of '98." He was a strict constructionist, and doubted the constitutional right to punish him. There was not a word in the Constitution about stealing umbrellas, and it would be a latitudinarian construction to consider it a crime. It would, in short, be nothing more or less than "Old Federalism," and having, like Mr. Tyler, a very tender "conscience," he couldn't think of such a thing as recognizing the right to whip him. The Recorder, however, having doubts,—Curia advisare Vult—Ned was sent to jail till the point could be settled.—Cour. and Enq.

The Charleston papers chronicle the suicide of one John Irvin, who shot himself in that city a short time since.—We suppose the unhappy man had been "unfortunate in business," as he had for some time been the owner of a pack of trained blood hounds, which he kept for the purpose of hunting runaway negroes! We should have thought that so "chivalrous" a people as those of South Carolina, would have saved such a wretch the trouble of shooting himself. A man of his peculiar profession, would, in the colder and less courageous communities of the Northern States, be very apt, if they caught him and his hounds running down a negro or any body else, to give him the benefit of a public execution without any expense to himself—especially if he had bagged any of his game.—Cour. and Enq.

Completion of the Tonnewanda Rail Road.—We take pleasure in announcing to the traveling public that the last remaining link in the great chain of Rail Roads which unites Buffalo to Albany and Boston, is completed. The Attica and Buffalo Road, has been completed for some time, and now the distance between here and Attica is finished, and the cars now make regular trips to Buffalo.

Great praise is due to the enterprising stockholders and officers of the Attica, and Buffalo Rail Road for bringing about this great public improvement. They have succeeded not only in building their own road, against the systematic and united opposition of a set of interested opponents, but by so doing have driven the Tonnewanda Rail Road folks into the completion of their road.

The officers of both roads are gentlemen, and the traveling public will find the route a pleasant and agreeable one. Mr. Wallace, is the superintendent of the A. & B. Road, and Walter M. Seymour, Esq., of this place, is superintendent of the Tonnewanda Road.

Another Sign—No new Moon in February!—The Millerites recently discovered the planet Venus in the day time,—no uncommon occurrence—she being now in her perigee, and the atmosphere having been, most of the time lately, remarkably clear. Another phenomenon equally portentous, is announced in the Boston Transcript, as follows:

"Perhaps many of our readers are not aware of the singular astronomical fact, that there will be no new moon in the month of February next, and that there will be two new moons in the month following. It will be new moon on the 30th inst., again on the 1st of March, and also on the 30th of March."

The General Naval Court Martial, says the N. Y. American, to which we alluded yesterday, will convene on board the North Carolina on Wednesday next, the first of February. The Court will be composed of the following members:

President—Commodore Downes.

Commodore Read.

Captains—W. Compton Bolton, Dan. Turner, Charles W. Skinner, Isaac McKeever, John H. Aulick, Bladen Dulany, John Gwynn, and Thomas W. Wyman.

Commanders—Henry W. Ogden, Irvine Shubrick, and Wm. W. McKean.

Judge Advocate, Samuel Rush, of Philadelphia.

Commander Mackenzie, who received yesterday the order for his arrest, will be tried upon three charges—the first murder, the second cruelty and oppression. What the third is, we have not heard.

San Antonio Prisoners.—Recent advices from Mexico state that the San Antonio prisoners had arrived at the castle of Perote, where, with the single exception of Judge Hutchinson, all are in chains. They are said to be in good health and spirits, although they entertain little hope of being liberated. They are chained in pairs, and the report was that they were to be set at work on the 2d inst. One of the unfortunate prisoners, named Glenn, was left sick at San Louis Potosi, and another, named Norvall, at Queretaro. The health of Judge Hutchinson is represented as extremely good, as was also that of D. C. Ogden, Colquhoun, Maverick, Bradley, Johnson, Jones, and others who are well known here.

The news of the capture of California, combined with the account of the invasion of Mexico by Gen. Somervell, which had reached the city, had tended to render the Mexicans more exasperated than ever against the prisoners, and induced them to treat the poor fellows with extreme rigor.

The news in relation to Van Ness, Fitzgerald, and Hancock is, that they were left at San Fernando under sentence of death—but this sentence had been commuted to ten years imprisonment in the castle of San Juan de Ulloa, at Vera Cruz. At that unhealthy place they would probably die before one eighth of their term of imprisonment would expire.

The President's Message.—Was carried out again by the Independence, in sixteen days. The London and Paris papers comment upon it at great length, the former generally with considerable virulence of disapprobation. We shall take the earliest opportunity of laying before our readers a general view of what was said, in both capitals, on certain points of the message—particularly the President's remarks upon the right of search and the suppression of the slave trade.—Com. Adv.

The whole number of persons confined in Massachusetts for debt, during the year ending Nov. 1, 1842, was 742; for crimes 3593, 890 of whom were females.

Buffalo, Jan. 20.—The wheat market begins to move again. Within the past week contracts and sales have been made for 18,000 bushels of Ohio to arrive, at prices which have not transpired, doubtless, however, in the neighborhood of 62 1-2 cents. Advices from the West represent the grain market as languid, but with light receipts. Along the lake shore 50 cents is paid from wagons, and in the interior half a dollar appears to be the ruling rate. Much however depends upon the facilities for shipment. Since ashes have become such an important article of domestic export, the business of manufacturing seems to be increasing rapidly. At every point west of us we hear of large accessions to the stock storing. At Monroe, which now has excellent facilities for reaching the interior by the railroad, it is estimated that two thousand casks will be ready for shipment by the opening of navigation. Last year the shipments from that place were only 826 casks. We anticipate almost a corresponding increase generally at the west.—Some of our commission houses are advancing 75 per cent. on all brought in.—Com. Adv.

A Large Amount of Crime.—It is said that the N. Y. Court of General Sessions, has during the last term which was terminated yesterday, convicted and sent to the State Prison upwards of thirty prisoners.

RAIL-ROAD CONVENTION.

At a convention of delegates representing all the Railroad Companies between the Hudson river and Buffalo, namely, The Attica and Buffalo, Tonawanda, Auburn and Rochester, Auburn and Syracuse, Syracuse and Utica, Utica and Schenectady, Mohawk and Hudson, and Troy and Schenectady Railroads, held at the American Hotel in this city, on the 31st January, the following resolutions were adopted:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to run two daily lines between Buffalo and the Hudson river, connecting with the morning and night boats out of Albany and Troy, and that each line be run in 25 hours, including stops, and that the same be apportioned as follows:

Buffalo to Rochester 6 hours; Rochester to Auburn 6 hours; Auburn to Syracuse 2 hours; Syracuse to Utica 4 hours; Utica to Albany and Troy 7 hours—25 hours.

And that the times of starting from each end of the line for the two trains be as follows: Buffalo 6 a. m and 4 p. m.; Albany and Troy 6 a. m.; Schenectady 8 a. m.; Albany and Troy 7 p. m.; Schenectady 8 1-2 p. m.

Resolved, That passengers ought to be allowed to pay their fare and direct their baggage to such places upon the route as they may deem proper, and that the Superintendents of the several roads be directed to devise and execute a system to carry out this resolution under direction of the Executive Committees of their roads.

Resolved, That baggage masters be employed at the joint expense of the several Companies between Albany and Buffalo to accompany each train and ticket and take charge of baggage between those points, who shall be paid by each Company in proportion to their length and amount of receipts, and that the details of the plan to carry out this arrangement be referred to the Superintendents of the several roads.

Resolved, That it is expedient that the car houses on the line between the Hudson river and Buffalo inclusive, should be closed, and the passengers relieved from the press and inconvenience of being crowded in the several car houses by persons who may resort there from curiosity.

Resolved, That it is expedient that a third run be made between the Hudson river and Buffalo, leaving the Hudson river at 1 o'clock p. m., and Buffalo at 12 noon, at uniform prices of 2 1-2 cents per mile for one description of cars and 1 1-2 cents per mile for emigrant cars; and that it be referred to the superintendents of the several roads under the direction of the executive committees, to arrange the arrivals and departures on the intermediate points on the line and other matters in connexion therewith.

Resolved, That during the winter months the train shall leave Buffalo at 7 in the morning, reach and remain over night at Syracuse; and leave Albany at 9 o'clock in the morning, and stay over night at Auburn, so that a passenger may make the passage between Albany and Buffalo in two days; and that it be referred to the Superintendents of the road under the direction of the Executive Committees to carry this out, and this to take effect on Monday, the 6th instant.

Resolved, That the two first lines commence on the 15th of March next, and the third line on the opening of the canal.

Resolved, That the several companies on this rail road line will not employ persons in the business of transportation who ever drink intoxicating liquors.

Commercial intercourse with China and the Sandwich Islands.—The following is a copy of the Report made on Tuesday by Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, harmonizing, in its spirit, as far as we have observed, with the general opinion of the press, and of commercial men, on the subject to which it relates:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of December 30, 1842, concerning the present condition of the relations, commercial and political, of the United States with the Sandwich Islands and with the Chinese Empire, and recommending to the consideration of Congress the expediency of adopting measures for cultivating and improving those relations, respectfully report:

That, concurring in the views of the President, as expressed in the message, with regard to the intercourse with those remote regions, suited to the best interests of the United States, and adapted to the promotion of benevolence and good-will between brethren of the human family, separated heretofore not only by geographical distances to the utmost ends of the earth, but by institutions, in both extremes, of barbarism and of civilization, alienating from one another the various tribes of man, children of one common parent, and born for mutual assistance in the purpose of promoting the happiness of all—they report for the consideration of the House two bills to enable the President to carry into effect the purposes set forth in the message.

Peace—friendly, social, and commercial intercourse—and the reciprocation of good offices with all nations, was proclaimed as the fundamental policy of this Union, from the day and in the instrument with which the North American people, till then English colonists, "assumed among the Powers of earth that separate & equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them." At that time more than one-half the surface of the habitual globe was hermetically sealed up against them, and inaccessible to them. A series of events all emanating from one beneficent Providence, but wonderfully various, and seemingly antagonistical in their original character, have unlocked or burst open the gates of countries ranging from the equator to the pole in both continents of America, in the central darkness of Africa, and in the continental islands of Australasia.

At that time the S. Isles. were yet undiscovered by the race of civilized men, and China, from ocean to ocean, had surrounded herself from ages immemorial, by a wall, within which her population, counting by hundreds of millions were pent up in sullen separation and seclusion from all the rest of mankind. Within one year from the day when the United States were first acknowledged as a nation, the discoverer of the Sandwich Islands (the most illustrious navigator of the eighteenth century) perished on their shore by the hands of their savage barbarian inhabitants.

It is a subject of cheering contemplation to the friends of human improvement and virtue, that, by the mild and gentle influence of Christian charity, dispensed by humble missionaries of the gospel, unarmed with secular power, within the last quarter of a century, the people of this group of islands have been converted from the lowest debasement of idolatry to the blessings of the Christian gospel; united under one balanced Government; rallied to the fold of civilization by a written language and constitution, providing security for the rights of persons, property, and mind, and invested with all the elements of right and power which can entitle them to be acknowledged by their brethren of the human race as a separate and independent community. To the consummation of their acknowledgement, the people of the North American Union are urged by an interest of their own, deeper than that of any other portion of the inhabitants of the earth—by a virtual right of conquest, not over the freedom of their brother man by the brutal arm of physical power, but over the mind and heart by the celestial panoply of the gospel of peace and love.

LATE FROM TEXAS.

DEFEAT AND CAPTURE OF A PORTION OF THE TEXIAN ARMY.

Since our paper went to press this morning, we have seen Mr. Needham, who arrived last night direct from Bexar. He states that Gen. Somervell, with a portion of the army that remained under his command, about 200 men, has returned to Bexar.—Another portion of three hundred men, left the command of Gen Somervell, elected Col. Wm. S. Fisher commander and went down to Mier, and captured the town; but a shower of rain came up just after they had captured it, so that they could not use their rifles to advantage, and the Mexican army arrived and after a desperate engagement retook the town and captured about two hundred or two hundred and fifty of our troops. During the engagement our troops captured seven pieces of artillery which were retaken by the Mexicans.

About 400 Mexicans were killed in this engagement,—only four Texians were killed. It is not known upon what terms the Texians surrendered. Only two Texians escaped, who were found at Gonzales by our army when it returned, and it is from these two men that Mr. Needham derived this news. The names of these men are Chalk and Sinclair. They say they secreted themselves in some canes in or near the town, while the Texians were fighting in the stone houses, and they left in the night after the firing had ceased. They say also, that the fight lasted from twelve o'clock till two P. M. the next day, and during all this time only four Texians were killed! This story seems quite too incredible for belief.—The army under Gen. Somervel heard nothing of it until they reached Bexar. Mr. Needham says Sinclair reported that the Mexicans were commanded by Gen. Ampudia and Canales, and that the whole Mexican force was 1,500 or 2,000.

We doubt this also; Ampudia had only three or four hundred effective men at Matamoras, and Canales retired from Guerrero with only 300 men when our army captured that town. Capt. Cameron, with his command, was with Col. Fisher. Most of the old federal soldiers that served under Jourdan were also with this detachment, and they are so well acquainted with the country, that it seems scarcely possible that some of them should not have made their escape, but they have not been heard from. We shall doubtless have accurate intelligence respecting this affair in a few days.

Mr. Needham mentions that our army, after the capture of Laredo, moved down on the east bank of the Rio Grande to the mouth of the Salado, and found Canales with 300 men, ready to dispute the passage, but our troops crossed without difficulty, and he retired without firing a gun. The troops then proceeded to Guerrero and encamped near the town, the Alcalde came out and informed the General that the Mexican troops had fled, and that he would furnish any articles they required. The General made a requisition for the articles most needed by the soldiers, and they were promptly furnished by the Alcalde.

Gen. Somervel believing that his force was too weak to proceed further, gave orders for the army to return to Bexar. This gave dissatisfaction to a large party of the troops, and in consequence the division was formed, and the party under Col. Fisher refusing to obey orders, left the command as before mentioned.

TREES.—By felling the trees that cover the tops and sides of mountains, (says Humboldt,) men in every clime prepare at once two calamities for future generations—want of fuel and scarcity of water.

Colored Passengers by Rail Road.—The Massachusetts Senate has passed a bill providing that railroad corporations shall not make any rule discriminating between the accommodations of passengers on account of color, and making it a penal offence in agents who exclude or assault them on that account.—Alb. Jour.

Ingenious Invention.—A mechanician of a little town in Bohemia has constructed an automaton which imitates perfectly the human voice, particularly the soprano notes. It sings several difficult airs with the greatest accuracy. Shakes, runs, and chromatic scales are all executed with surprising precision. The automaton, in singing, even pronounces certain words so as to be easily understood. The inventor hopes to arrive at such a point of perfection as to bring his machine to pronounce all the words of the best operas.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Passed January 21, 1843.

The People of the State of New York represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

§ 1. The printer of the state be appointed by the senate and assembly, in the same manner as prescribed by the constitution for the appointment of secretary of state, and shall hold his office by the same tenure.

§ 2. It shall be the duty of said state printer to publish a newspaper in the city of Albany, in which shall be published all notices, laws and other advertisements required by law to be inserted and printed in the state paper, or paper printed by the state printer, and which shall have the same effect when given in evidence, as has heretofore been given by law to the newspaper printed by the state printer; and the proprietor and editor of such state paper may charge and receive the prices that are now or shall hereafter be prescribed by law.

§ 3. Each house of the legislature shall by ballot appoint its own printer or firm of printers being some person or persons other than the state printer, who shall hold his office for the same term, whose duty it shall be to print the journals, bills, documents and such other printing as may be ordered by such house. All contracts for such printing shall be made by the president of the senate, speaker of the assembly and comptroller, and at prices at least ten per cent more favorable to the state than the prices now paid to the present state printer. But no such contract shall be made for a longer period than one year and shall expire on the fifteenth day of February in each year. Any vacancy occurring in the office of printer to the state or printer to either branch of the legislature shall be supplied by the Governor until the next meeting of the legislature, or until another is appointed.

§ 4. The several executive officers may make contracts for such necessary printing as is authorized by law, for their respective departments, at the prices before mentioned, with a printer or firm of printers other than the state printer, or printers for the legislature.

§ 5. The commissioners of the canal fund may contract at the said rate for the printing of such blanks as are required for the several canals, with a printer or firm of printers other than the state printer, or printers for the legislature.

§ 6. The secretary of state shall annually procure the printing and publishing of the session laws, on the most favorable terms, by a printer or firm of printers for the legislature; and the legislature may by concurrent resolution require an extra number of copies to be published, to be sold under the direction of the secretary of state, at an advance not exceeding ten per cent on the original cost; and the distribution of the said laws to the several county clerk's offices shall be made within sixty days after the adjournment of the legislature.

§ 7. The state printer shall annually report to the legislature the whole amount of fees charged and the amount received by him for the publication of all legal notices and laws which are required by law to be published in the state paper during the year preceding.

§ 8. All notices and advertisements required by law to be published in the state paper, the publication of which has been commenced, or which may be commenced before a successor is appointed, in the Evening Journal, may be continued and be as valid as if this act had not passed.

§ 9. All laws which are inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

☞ This act shall take effect immediately.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE, }
ALBANY, 20th January, 1843. }

INSPECTORS OF ELECTION.

By the twenty-first section of Article third, title III. of "An act respecting Elections other than for militia and town officers," passed April 5, 1842, after the first day of January instant, the electors of each city and town, at each annual town meeting and charter election, are entitled to vote by ballot for two inspectors of election, residing in each election district by the presiding officers of each town meeting and charter election, in the manner prescribed by the said section. The last clause of the said twenty-first section is in the following words: "And no ballot for inspectors shall be counted upon which more than two names shall be contained."

This clause has created doubts in the minds of some, and several town officers have applied to the undersigned for an exposition of the said twenty-first section: for as every city and most of the towns contain more than one election district, it is apparent that if "no ballot for inspectors" is counted upon which more than two names are contained, the several election districts in cities and in such towns will not be supplied with inspectors.

On looking at the whole section (§31,) and on regarding the intent of the law, the undersigned has not the least doubt but the latter clause should be understood in the same manner as it would be in the following words: "And no ballot for inspector shall be counted upon which more than two names FOR EACH ELECTION DISTRICT shall be contained."

As the town meetings in some counties will be held in February, and as the doubts above alluded to may be entertained in various parts of the State, editors of newspapers will confer a favor upon town and charter officers by giving this communication an insertion.

S. YOUNG, Secretary of State.

An American Slave on the Coast of Africa.—The Governor of the Colony of Liberia, in a dispatch addressed to the Executive Committee of the American Colonization Society, on the 9th of June last, states that on his arrival at Bassa Cove, which place he visited in February, 1842, he found anchored there a fast sailing schooner belonging to New York. The captain refused to pay any port charges, in defiance of the authorities, who had no means of forcing a compliance with their regulations. The Governor told him he knew him to be a slaver, and ordered him to leave the settlement. The vessel soon got under way and stood up the coast, but in ten or fifteen days returned, and in twelve days took in a cargo of 250 slaves and put to sea.

William Dickson, who died at Greenville Tenn., on the 2d inst., was appointed postmaster by Gen. Washington in 1796, and held on through all the changes of the country to the day of his death. He had also taken the National Intelligencer for forty-two years, and had paid up to the 5th day of the month preceding his decease.—Utica Gazette.

Stockbridge Indians.—It is proposed to admit a portion of the Stockbridge Indians, residing in Wiskonsan, to the privileges of American citizens. They having petitioned Congress for the purpose. It appears that there are in all, one hundred and ninety-three souls. They have fifty houses, many good and valuable farms, stock, &c. and become civilized, and Christianized, and have residing among them a minister of the gospel.—Detroit D. Adv.

Earthquake.—Last night about 9 o'clock, as we were standing at our case putting a paragraph in type, our attention as well as that of other persons in the room, was suddenly arrested by the violent shaking of the stands, and at the same instant a noise was heard at the end of the building about the windows, as though struck by a sudden blast of wind. The vibration of the stands was so great as for a moment to cause a dizzinesss as we attempted to take up a type. Every compositor looked round to see what was shaking his stand, and none could see a cause. The shock continued while a person might count twenty; and for more than two minutes a slight trembling was distinctly felt.—Madison (Ia.) News.

The New Orleans Bee of the 4th ult. says, the citizens were thrown into consternation yesterday by a report that an attempt had been made to assassinate Mr. Clay, in the Supreme Court. The true version of the story appears to be this:—While our distinguished guest was leaving the Court, in company with Mr. Preston, an individual outside the railing exclaimed, "salute to Henry Clay," and discharged a pistol above his head, the ball lodging in the ceiling. Dreyforus was the name of the person in question; he is looked upon as somewhat unsettled in his intellect. He was immediately arrested, and taken before the Recorder, where the affair was investigated. Dreyforus was sent to prison, the Recorder recommending that he should be treated with all possible mildness, as his mind was evidently disordered.

Notices.

WANTED,

Any amount of wood, hay, grain, pork, butter, lard, tallow, lumber, apples, &c., at this office, in payment of unsettled newspaper accounts.

DIED.

In this village, February 1st, 1843, RACHEL, wife of Theodore Norton, of dropsy in the chest, aged 77 years, 2 months and 15 days. Sister N. left the world, with strong hopes of a glorious immortality beyond the grave, having been a worthy member of the Methodist Episcopal Church upwards 55 years. Thus her husband has lost an affectionate wife, the church a pious saint, and her 10 children, 9 of whom are pious, an amiable mother. Z B.

At the residence of her father, in Fenner, Madison co., January 23, SABRINA K. ROBERTS, in the 28th year of her age.

Sister R., made a profession of religion, several years since, and was baptized by Elder L. T. Ford, becoming a member of the Baptist church at Peterboro. From that period until her death she evinced the sincerity of her profession by her manifest attachment to the cause of Christ, and her persevering effort to promote the salvation of those under her influence. She was not without faults, but the remembrance of her good deeds, like the mantle of charity, hides them from our vision; and we see but to admire the wonderful grace of God, which rescued her as a brand from the burning, and permitted her to shine as a light in the world.

Her funeral was attended at the Methodist chapel, by a large concourse of mourning friends, to whom Elder Wright of Clockville, preached an appropriate discourse from 2 Cor. 5. 6, 7 and 8.

In Bridgewater, Oneida co., on the 18th inst., BETSEY, wife of James Adams, daughter of Robert and Sarah Burdick, Burlington, Hartford co., Conn., aged 50 years.

Mrs. A., experienced religion in youth and died in the strong hopes of a blessed immortality beyond the grave.

No Hoax.

THE SUBSCRIBER would respectfully inform the public generally, that he is manufacturing Cabinet Ware of all descriptions, wanted by the inhabitants in this section of the country, although he cannot boast of his great EXPERIENCE, he having carried on the business only 10 years; yet in that time he has learned that basswood, does not make as good and durable posts and draw fronts for Bureaus, as well seasoned cherry does: although there is in this section, pine and basswood in abundance, thrown together something in the shape of a Bureau, but it is not, and cannot be done in his shop, nor under his superintendence. The Subscriber intends that all Cabinet Wares sold by him shall be made in a good workmanlike manner, and of thoroughly seasoned lumber, and will be sold on as good terms, as can be had at any well established shop in this, or any of the neighboring villages. His shop is in the east corner of LaFayette Block, No 3. Cortland street.

Ready Made Coffins.

THE SUBSCRIBER having long regretted the too high charges made for COFFINS and funeral services in this place, and at the request of many citizens, has made, and will keep on hand, a full assortment of Coffins, from the largest to the smallest size.

A HEARSE WILL BE IN READINESS

THE Natural, Intellectual and Moral Sciences, are taught by the different Instructors, as best suits the circumstances accompanying the formation of classes, except those mentioned above, which are always taught by the same Teacher.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 28th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers, and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business, in the shop formerly occupied by S. M. House, over I. R. Cook's jewelry store, one door east of E. D. Jenck's store, in all its various branches, where they will be happy to wait on customers on the shortest notice. Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done up in a style not surpassed by any of the "Craft" in this "village or county;" and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been asserted to be the "road to wealth."— Cutting done at short notice, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

POETRY.

The Stilling of the Waters.

'Twas midnight on the waters, and there rode
A slender bark upon the swelling flood.
The moon and stars had vanished from the sky,
And tempest-nourished winds were hurrying by,
Bestowing in their wild and wayward wrath,
Sad, fearful desolation in their path.
The waves were tossed in mountains to the sky,
And danger banished sleep from every eye.
The thunder roared tempestuously loud,
And lightnings broke from out the uncharged cloud.
It was a time to fear, as, tossed to heaven,
The slender sails by the furious winds were riven.
It was a time to fear, and those who stood
Upon the vessel, when they saw the flood
Come on in angry majesty, were bowed
In agony. The seamen wept aloud,
And lifted up their voices, tuned to grief,
To him who was their Master and their Chief.
He heard not, for He lay in gentle sleep,
And heeded not the terrors of the deep.
He rested sweetly, and there dwelt a smile
Upon his holy lips, that might beguile
The cares and sorrows of the world away;
He had been wearied by a toilsome day.
The rich, dark locks were curled upon his brow,
The flush upon his cheek was deep'ning now;
He stirred, and whispered some delightful word;
'Twas like the music of a fairy bird;
And then the smile came on, as if a gleam
Of heav'n was mingled with his midnight dream.
Might not the Savior dream, and smile to see,
Although in visions, what his end would be!
They came and woke him. As he ope'd his eyes
There was a radiance, as if from the skies:—
"Save, Lord, we perish!" was their fearful cry,
While glancing upwards to the angry sky.
It was enough;—the Savior gently rose,
And kindly bid his followers calm their woes.—
"Peace, peace, be still!" The rolling waves were stayed;
The storms were over and the winds allayed.

Peace, troubled soul! The Savior bids thee rest.
And calm the tumult raging in thy breast.
Into thy heart let his sweet smile descend,
For He will be thy Brother and thy Friend!

THE ASTRONOMICAL CLOCK.

This clock has excited considerable attention among the savans assembled at Strassburg, and some further descriptions have been published of the extraordinary complication of its performances and the ingenious means by which they are effected. The following description is from the foreign journals. The clock is composed of three parts, respectively dedicated to the measure of time, to the calendar, and to astronomical movements. The first thing to be created was a central moving power, communicating its motion to the whole of the mechanism. The motive power, which is itself a very perfect and exact time-piece, indicates on an outer face the hours and their subdivisions, as well as the days of the week: it strikes the hours and the quarters, and puts in motion divers allegorical figures. One of the most curious of these is the genius placed on the first balustrade, and who turns each hour, the sand-glass that he holds in his hand. The cock crows and a procession of the apostles take place each day at noon. In the calendar are noted the months, days, and dominical letters, as well as the calendar properly so called, showing all the saints' days in the year. The plate on which these signs are marked, revolves once in 365 days for the common, and 366 days for the bissextile year; making, at the same time, the irregularity which takes place three consecutive times out of four in the secular years. The moveable feasts, which seem as though they followed no fixed rule, are, nevertheless, obtained here by a mechanism of marvellous ingenuity, in which all the elements of the ecclesiastical computation—the millesimal, the solar circle, the golden number, the dominical letter, and the epacts—combine, and produce, for an unlimited period, the result sought. It is at midnight of the 31st of December, that the other moveable feasts and fasts range themselves on the calendar in the order and place of their succession for the whole of the following year. The third division solves the problems of astronomy. It exhibits an orrery, constructed on the Copernican system, which presents the mean revolutions of each of the planets visible to the naked eye. The earth, in her movement, carries with her her satellite, the moon, which accomplishes her own revolutions in the space of a lunar month. Besides this, the different phases of the moon are shown on a separate globe. One sphere represents the apparent movement of the heavens, making its revolution in the course of the Sideral day. It is subjected to that almost imperceptible influence known as the procession of the equinoxes. Seperate mechanisms produce the equations of the sun, its anomaly and right ascension. Others the principal equations of the moon; as its erection, anomaly, variation, annual equation, reduction and right ascension. Others, again, relate to the equations of the ascending node of the moon. The rising and setting of the sun, its passage to the meridian, its eclipses, and those of the moon, are also represented on the dial.

BATTLE WITH WILD ELEPHANTS.

On the 24th of September at midnight I received information that two elephants of very uncommon size had made their appearance, within a few hundred yards of the cantonments, and close to a village the inhabitants of which were in the greatest alarm. I lost no time in despatching to the place all the public and private elephants at the station, in pursuit of them, and at daybreak on the 25th was informed that their very superior size and apparent fierceness, had rendered all attempts for their seizure unavailing, and that the most experienced driver I had was dangerously hurt: the elephant which he rode having been struck to the ground by the wild ones, which had retreated to a large sugar cane adjoining the village——.

I immediately ordered the guns to this place, but being desirous in the first instance to try every means of catching the elephants, I assembled the inhabitants of the neighborhood, with the assistance of Rajah Rangnath Sing, and caused two deep pits to be prepared at the edge of the sugar-cane, in which our elephants and people with the utmost dexterity, contrived to retain during the day. When the pits were reported ready, we repaired to the spot, and they were with the greatest dexterity driven into them; but unfortunately one of the two did not prove sufficiently deep, and the elephant which escaped from it, in the presence of many witnesses, assisted its companion out of the other pit with his trunk.

Both were, however, with much exertion brought back into the sugar cane, and as no particular symptons of vice or fierceness had appeared in the course of the day, I was yet anxious to make another trial to catch them.

The bildars, therefore, were set to work to deepen the hole, and prepare new pits against day break, when I proposed to make the final attempt.

At four o'clock in the morning of yesterday, however, they burst through all my guards, and making for a village, about three miles distant, entered it with so much rapidity, that the horsemen, who galloped in front of them, had not time to apprise every inhabitant of his danger, and I regret to say that one poor man was torn limb from limb, a child trodden to death, and two other persons (females) wounded.

Their destruction now became absolutely necessary, and as they showed no inclination to quit the large village in which the mischief had been done, we gained time to bring up the four-pounders, from which they soon received several round-shot, and abundance of grape, each. The largest of the two was even brought to the ground by a round shot in the head, but after remaining there a quarter of an hour apparently lifeless, he got up again, as vigorous as ever, and the desperation of both at this period exceeds all description. They made repeated charges at the guns, and if it had not been for the uncommon steadiness and bravery of the artillery who more than once turned them off, by shots in the head and body, when within a very few paces of them, many dreadful casualties must have occurred.

We were now obliged to desist for want of ammunition, and before a fresh supply could be obtained the elephants quitted the village, and though streaming with blood from an hundred wounds, proceeded at a rapidity of which I had no idea, towards Hazareebagh. They were at length brought up by the horsemen and our elephants, when within a very short distance of a crowded Bazaar, and ultimately after many renewals of the most formidable and ferocious attacks, upon the guns, gave up the contest with their lives. Nineteen four pound shots have already been taken out of their bodies, and imagine eight or ten more will yet be found.

I have been thus particular, both because I think the transaction worthy of being recorded, as well as from a hope that you will concur with me in the propriety of application to the Government for a compensation for the damage suffered by the owners of the villages of——and Ooria, from the destruction of several huts and much cultivation. I have taken the necessary steps to ascertain the extent of the injury they have sustained, and shall have the pleasure of communicating to you the result.

I enclose a correct measurement of the elephants, which will be read with surprise, I believe. I am of opinion that they must have escaped from Hyderabae, or some part of the Deccan, for I have never heard of or seen animals of their size in this part of India.—E. Roughsedge, Bombay.

INTERESTING JEWISH MARRIAGE CEREMONY.

There is something peculiarly solemn and impressive in the Jewish marriage ceremony, and having for the first time in our lives witnessed its solemnization on Wednesday last, we believe that a description thereof will prove acceptable to the readers of the Aurora. The parties were the Rev. Jacques J. Lyons and Miss Grace Nathan, daughter of Seixan Nathan Esq., a gentleman well known and highly esteemed in this community. The ceremony was performed in the synagogue in Crosby street, of which the Reverend bridegroom is pastor, and the marriage ritual was read by his brother, the Rev. E. Lyons, of the Richmond Va. synagogue. The spacious building was crowded to excess, and never do we remember having witnessed such a dazzling assemblage of brilliant eyes and beautiful faces. The chandeliers and candles around the altar and ark, were all lighted; in front of the ark, near the classic and beautiful pedestal on which the lamp is placed, which is kept continually burning by the contributions of the pious, were the groomsmen, bearing a crimson damask canopy, under which stood the bride, with six young ladies as bridesmaids her father and sister, the bridegroom in his clerical robes, his father and brother, by whom the marriage ceremony was performed. The bride, an excedingly interesting young lady, was neatly attired in a light colored silk, a white hat and veil.—The ladies present were all dressed with exquisite taste, without unnecessary display; indeed, so much beauty needed not 'the aid of foreign ornament.'

After a solemn chaunt, the officiating clergyman, tasted a glass of wine, which the bridegroom and bride successively raised to their lips.

The bridegroom then placed the ring on the finger of his bride, and pronounced the following words:

'Behold, thou art wedded to me with this ring, according to the laws of Moses and Israel'

After another solemn chaunt, the minister again tasted a glass of wine, after pronouncing a blessing, of which the following is a translation:

'Blessed art thou, oh Lord our God; King of the Universe, who created the fruit of the vine.'

After the bride had tasted the wine, the bridegroom raised it to his lips, poured the wine on the salver, placed for the purpose, and on which he dashed the glass, breaking it into numberless fragments.—This ceremony is in commemoration (as we perceive by the book which we were politely furnished) of the destruction of the Temple of Jerusalem—and further, as we were informed by a gentleman learned in the Jewish laws and customs, as an emblem of the frailty of human happiness. Another prayer was chaunted, the concluding portions of which is thus rendered into English:

'Blessed art thou, oh Lord our God!—who causeth the bridegroom to rejoice with the bride, and cause them to prosper. Oh! give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good for his mercy endureth forever. May joys increase in Israel, and sighs flee away.'

The ceremony being concluded, and congratulations interchanged, the numerous assemblage dispersed, and the bridal party repaired to the house of the bride's father, in Varick street, where they received cogratulatory visits of their friends until a late hour in the evening. May all their anticipations of happiness be realized! We never witnessed a ceremony with the solemnity of which we were so forcibly impressed.

WINTER IN RUSSIA.

Under the head of 'Winter in St. Petersburgh,' we find the following in the Constitutionel:

'Winter is more variable at St. Petersburg than at Moscow; that is, the cold does not reign there with such continued severity. Thus, for instance, it is said not to be a rare circumstance at Moscow to find a fruit peeling, or any other matter, thrown by chance from a window, catch on the balcony, and, becoming immediately frozen, remain there suspended for the rest of the winter. Such a case could not occur at St. Petersburg, where, though the thermometer often descends to 30 degrees of Reaumer below zero, (35 1-2 below zero of Fahrenheit,) the neighborhood of the sea combats the icy winds of Siberia, and unexpectedly brings on the most strange changes in temperature. It has never rained, in the memory of man, at Moscow during the months of December and January. At St. Petersburg, on the contrary, rain frequently falls during these two months, and at that period it has been constantly the custom to replace carriages by sledges. This latter kind of vehicle, which no person gives up, becomes the most inconvenient in the world, being driven in the midst of snow and mud.

The winter at St. Petersburgh, on account of these sudden transitions, so unexpected and so rapid, is far more formidable than at Moscow, and to strangers who have not experienced its effects is particularly serious. To defend one's self from the weather, the most constant and minute precautions are required. In October, the Russians, and all who have been long in the country, assume fur clothes, and keep them in continual wear until the month of April, after the ice has broken up on the Neva. Stoves are lit every where, and each family lays in a stock of birch wood. There is a servant specially appointed to attend to the stoves, and his duty is to keep up as much as possible, an equal heat throughout the house. The best stove-keepers, whose fame procures them a high salary, are generally from Moscow.—Twenty degrees of cold do not appear astonishing to an inhabitant of St. Petersburg, though he then casts a curious look at the thermometer. At 23 or 24 degrees, constant rounds are made during the night, to prevent the police and sentinels from falling asleep on their posts.

Should the cold bring on drowsiness, and the sufferer not be able to prevent himself from yielding to its influence, he must perish as he can only wake from his sleep in the other world. At 25 degrees the theatres are closed, and all those who are obliged to go out on foot hurry along with the utmost speed, most anxiously looking at the noses of all those whom they meet in the street. If a sudden paleness—of which no intimation is given by any physical feeling—should appear on any part of the face, the passer-by rushes forward, and commences rubbing the afflicted feature of the alarmed passenger with snow, to produce animation. The same thing may occur to the operator himself, before the hour is over. At 30 degrees of cold the populace alone go out of doors, entire families shut themselves up, and not a single sledge of any appearance of fashion is seen in the streets. Yet even the military reviews are not interrupted, and the highest dignitaries, up to the Emperor, repair to them without a cloak.

It must be evident that, with cold of such intensity, the sufferings of the poor must be dreadful. Yet it may be affirmed without exaggeration, that the lower classes, in winter, suffer less in Russia than in France. There are placed in the various quarters of every large town in the empire public establishments, heated by large stoves, where every person that pleases, may take refuge. Dreadful accidents undoubtedly mark the arrival of the severe season, but they generally fall on the servants of Russia noblemen, whose carelessness towards their servants' comforts is akin to barbarity. It must not be forgotten either that, three-fourths of these accidents are attributable to the abuses of spirituous liquors. The passion of the people for brandy sets at defiance every warning, and in winter it becomes more than usually fatal.'

THE TOILS OF A NEWSPAPER EDITOR.—Newspaper literature is a link in the great chain of miracles which proves the greatness of England, and every support should be given to newspapers. The editors of these papers must have a most onerous task. It is not the writing of the leading articles itself, but the obligation to write that article every week, whether inclined or not, in sickness or in health, in affliction, distress of mind, winter and summer, year after year, tied down to one task, remaining in one spot. It is something like the walking a thousand miles in a thousand hours. I have a fellow feeling for them, for I know how a periodical will wear down one's existence. In itself it appears nothing—the labor is not manifest; nor is it the labor—it is the continual attention which it requires. Your life becomes, as it were, the publication. One week is no sooner corrected and printed, than on comes the other. It is the stones of Sisyphus—an endless repetition of toil, a constant weight upon the mind—a continued wearing upon the intellect and spirits, demanding all the exertion of your faculties, at the same time that you are compelled to do the severest drudgery. To write for a paper is very well, but to edit one is to condemn yourself to slavery.—Capt. Marryatt

BLITZ OUTDONE.—The London Spectator thus speaks of the tricks performed by a celebrated juggler now in that metropolis:

Among other incomprehensible doings he boils four plucked pigeons in a kettle full of water suspended over a fire, and perfectly isolated, and out fly four living birds from an empty vessel; he returns to their owners a score of handkerchiefs, washed and ironed, that a moment before lay soaking wet in a pail, and he produces no end of bouquets, out of an old hat that he stamps upon, and turns inside out, each pressure or squeeze of the hand being followed by a fresh supply of bunches of sweet smelling flowers from the old battered hat.

A young lady near us lent her straw bonnet, and was horrified at seeing it crushed up into a ball; but, to her great relief, it appeared hanging at the top of the proscenium, and being brought down by a pistol shot, she found it quite undamaged. A handful of gold watches is flung to the back of the stage, and presently reappear hanging from the branches of a plant that had just been watered and placed under a heated cover for producing this sort of golden fruit; bunches of keys that seem not to be out of sight, are found attached to the roots of a plant in a flower pot; and a head, with goggle eyes, at the summons of a pistol shot, thrusts out a bunch of rings at the tip of its tongue, and stares with two gold watches for eye-balls, though one could have sworn both rings and watches were under certain covers.

But perhaps one of the completest puzzles is the pouring successively of black and red wine, and steaming champagne from the identical black bottle that we had just before seen with water; this, and the dipping for bouquets in the old hat, are done in the very faces of the spectators; and the bottle, when emptied of its contents, is broken, and a silk handkerchief is found in it. A couple of lemons are handed to the company, and one of them, on being broken, yields a walnut; that, when cracked, discloses a ring belonging to one of the audience. If those feats seem wondrous in telling, they are far more inexplicable in the doing; for you feel what cannot be indited sufficiently in a brief description, the seeming impossibility of them. The illusion is perfect; you see things vanish under your eyes, and behold them in another place, while yet they appear to be where they were before.

SWEETNESS OF NATURE.—Surely there is nothing in the world short of the most undivided reciprocal attachment, which has power over the workings of the human heart, as the mild sweetness of nature.—The most ruffled temper, when emerging from the town, will subside into a calm at the sight of a wild stretch of landscape reposing in the twilight of a fine evening.—It is then the spirit of peace settles upon the heart, unfetters the thoughts, and elevates the soul to the Creator. It is then we behold the Parent of the universe in his works—we see his grandeur in earth, sea, and sky—we feel his affection in the emotions which they raise, and half-mortal, half-etherialized, forget where we are, in the anticipation of what the world must be, of which this lovely earth is merely a shadow.—Miss Porter.

BROUGHAM says: If a child is neglected till six years of age, no subsequent education can recover it. If to this age he is brought up in ignorance and dissipation, in all the baseness of brutal habits, in that vacancy of mind which such habits create, it is in vain to try to reclaim it by teaching reading and writing. You may teach it what you choose afterwards, but if you have not prevented the formation of bad habits, you will teach in vain. With children under the age of six years, learning—school learning—should not be the chief consideration, but the formation of moral principle."

FEAR.—Thousands, through fear of want, want all their lives; and thousands every day, for fear of dying, suffer worse than the pangs of death. The demon Fear at all times trembles at impossible events. Why should we grow pale at hideous fictions of our own? We should at all times endeavor to be serene and masters of ourselves, prepared for what may come, leaving the rest to heaven.

A DAY OF UNIVERSAL PEACE.

The prophecies of the word of God are explicit upon one point—that there is to come a day when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth,and when among all the nations of men there shall be found nothing to hurt or destroy. Much of the sublime imagery of the Old Testament shadows forth this day.

"The Lord will comfort Zion; he will build all her waste places, and he will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord; joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving and the voice of melody." "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them." "The cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together, and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. The sucking child shall play upon the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice den. In all my holy mountain they shall not hurt nor destroy;—nation shall not lift sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

These and a multitude of similar passages assure us of a coming day, when the horrors of war shall be forever ended, when all the weapons of destruction shall be converted to implements of husbandry, and mankind no longer study as a science or follow as an occupation the art of murder. Whatever may be the history of the past or the appearances of the present, that time will come.

The restless and furious elements of ambition which roll, wave upon wave, over the world, shall hear the voice of the Prince of Peace, and fall into a gentle calm. The heart-rending and wide-spread abominations of war shall be banished from the world, for there shall be nothing in all the habitations of man to hurt or destroy.

It is delightful to suffer the imagination to float onward to the future, and contemplate even in the distance, this day of peaceful glory. But there we cannot rest. Sure as its coming has been made by the unalterable word of prophecy, it comes not to us. We have had the lines fall to us in other places, and in other times. Ours is a day of confusion and the noise of war. The sublime and conservative charity of the gospel of peace has not yet found a lodging-place in the bosoms of all men, nor are all the myriads of the human race united in one harmonious brotherhood

And we have need of caution, while contemplating the latter-day glory in the light of prophecy, lest we allow ourselves improperly to rest upon God's word, and wait for its fulfilment in indolence and ease.

We know the purposes of the Almighty to be immutable, and that all his declarations will be fulfilled; but we know also, that these grand ends which he purposes to gain, are to be accomplished by the co-operation of men. Human exertion is necessary for the accomplishment of these designs. God will never send from heaven any sudden and irresistible influence, which shall compel men to lay aside their implements of war, and unfurl the banner of peace.

Omnipotence will be exerted for the accomplishment of this end; but not by any overwhelming fatality that shall fall upon the world in some unexpected moment.

This promised peace which is to be universal, is to be procured only by kind and patient Christian effort. Intelligent labors to spread the principles of peace will be made; the mild and benevolent doctrines of the gospel will spread; the fires of love will be kindled and burn from bosom to bosom, and nation to nation, until every degree of latitude shall be embraced in an inseparable bond of love; every province of earth bear the olive-branch, and every dwelling-place of man be happy and secure.

Christians of this generation may excuse themselves from this work, but the work will be done. God will raise up men, in his own time, and way, who shall be made co-workers with himself. Happy the man whose shoulder shall bear the yoke, and whose back shall bow to the burden. His name shall be blessed, and he shall be a child of God. B.

From the Oberlin Evangelist.

THE LIBERTINE'S CODE OF MORALS.

NO. I.

The friends of virtue have good cause to care to know what this code is. The question is practically coming before them for decision. Shall this code become the social law of the land?

I shall therefore adduce the leading features of this code with such remarks as seem demanded.

1. The first doctrine of the libertine's code is, that the crime and the punishment of seduction pertain not to the author but to his victim.

All the world knows that this is the sentiment of all libertines. And all the world must see intuitively that it screens the more guilty and punishes the comparatively innocent. Is this right or wrong?

Fix your eye upon the slanderer, exulting over the ruined character of his slandered neighbor, and gruffly maintaining the doctrine that his skill in traducing, acquits him of all blame. Is this right or wrong?

Observe that vender of alcohol who puts the cup to his neighbor's lips and leaves him in the gutter—and then glories in his own good morals, justifies his honorable calling, and disdains to associate with his fallen customer. Is this right or wrong?

The seducer's arts may be secret, and hence the comparative measures of his guilt may be effectually concealed. Falsehood on his part may screen him from just censure, especially if by success he can blast the character of the only witness in case. How immense then are his facilities for practising, without exposure, the basest arts and even the foulest perfidy.

Such deeds do not thereby become guiltless. The true principles of righteous law holds them to be both the meaner and the more culpable.

The man who forcibly enters my house or fires it under cover of darkness, is doubly guilty compared with the author of the same deed in open day. All right public sentiment recognizes this principle and ought to. If we have detestations to give for crime, we give it most liberally where detection is most difficult No form of murder is meaner than midnight assassination.

What then do we think of the doctrine which throws its ample shield over the wily seducer, and brands the seduced as alone vile and guilty? It is outrageously wrong. What then shall we do with it? Expel it from the earth. It deserves no places in a world where men applaud the right and speak well of virtue.

On the ground of its intrinsic enormity, the crime of seduction should receive from public sentiment unsparing and most exemplary reprobation. The crime is cruel as the grave, relentless as the pit of despair, fraught with mischiefs to its victim which their author can never fully repair, if he would, and commonly would not if he could. Indeed the most cruel thing in this doctrine of the libertine's code, is that it authorizes the guilty man to heap the bitterest possible evils—desertion and eternal shame, upon his victim. It makes one wrong a justification for another; bids him atone for his inflicted wrong by inflicting every other in his power! This is a gentleman's honor.

There is no remedy for these enormous wrongs short of an utter revolution in that horrible doctrine of libertine sentiment which lies at their base. The seducer must have his due. His crime should be estimated in view of the innocence which he betrays; of the untold evils which he inflicts; of the crafty arts which he employs; and of the facilities for concealment which pertain to the nature of the crime. In view of these circumstances who does not feel that public sentiment ought to brand seduction, always, and every where, as one of the worst and meanest crimes which can be perpetrated upon society?

Let each father make it the case of his own daughter; each brother of his own sister; and then take the gague and dimensions of the seducer's guilt. This is no unfair mode of estimating it; indeed it is the only righteous mode; for every seduced female is a daughter, and probably a sister. Why does not public sentiment, rising in its strength and majesty, pass its righteous and changeless decree against this worst of crimes?

2. A second doctrine of the libertine's code is, that a female seduced, is forever ruined, and forever to be excluded from respectable society.

This iron-hearted decree society owes to the tender mercies of the libertine. He could not well bear the presence of his victim in good society and on a level with himself. If this were admitted, it would seem to testify that the guilt and degradation consequent upon seduction do not belong exclusively to the female. This the seducer could not bear. It conflicts with this code of morals. In a point where there must be some wrong, he insists that it shall all be imputed to the female, and that her seducer shall remain untarnished in reputation.

Besides it answers another purpose of his much better, to thrust her into a caste of degraded beings where she can have no influence to use against him, and no object to live for except, perchance, to minister to the basest passions of the worst of men.

With how dignified and virtuous an air does the libertine issue and sustain his inexorable mandate against his fallen victim. O, now he is the careful conservator of the public morals! If a corrupt female were to be tolerated in decent society, there would no longer be any protection for virtue!!

This jealousy for the interests of virtue would appear with somewhat better grace if the libertine would mete out his rebuke to each party according to the respective measures of their guilt, and also with some regard to the relative degree of jeopardy into which they respectively throw the well being of society by their influence and example. Why, in his jealous watchfulness for virtue's interests, does he not doom the seducer to his just portion of indignant retribution? If he cared a straw for virtue he would.

In respect to being restored to society again, the true doctrine and the only true one, for seducer and seduced, is this; pardon to the penitent, for the impenitent no pardon ever. While the vicious pursue their vicious course, let them know that virtuous society has no place for them in the bosom of its confidence and friendship. If they are wretched and forlorn, she gives them a place in the sympathies of her benevolence—that is all. Let them give proof of their repentance; then 'tis human and God-like to forgive. One law only should there ever be for man or woman.—Be forever abominated the cruelty that makes the distinctions of the libertine's code—distinctions both without reason, and against all reason.

3. A third doctrine. Female purity possessed, is to be sneered at; lost, the miserable victim is to be unutterably despised.

Towards the resolutely virtuous they freely use the epithets of prude and nun. It would be a real advance in their system of legislation over society if they could quite exclude the strictly and firmly virtuous from public esteem. They have tried to do this; but with limited success. This nation is not yet one universal Sodom.

The capriciousness and unreasonableness of this principle in their code is not its worst feature. It is horribly cruel and malicious. It seems to fix its eye on the ruin of the entire female sex. Its libertine authors rail at those who stand beyond their fell grasp, and curse those who fall under it. They find pleasure in the society of none except those whom, with satanic anticipations of conquest, they are luring into their toils.

Let mothers and daughters read this, and looking at the facts, let them ask themselves if the libertine is their friend. But one class of ladies are their chosen associates—those whom they hope to make their victims. These they can caress, flatter, applaud—and then betray and forever forsake to the doom of the outcast. What friendship this?

Be it remembered, however, that the libertine's ostensible respect is one thing; the inner homage of his conscience and his reason is quite another. Those ladies who firmly and indignantly repel his improprieties may be sure of the latter, however much they fail of the former.

H. C.

EXTENT OF THE DIVINE LAW.

Do you feel any tendency to self-righteousness?—any disposition to claim perfection for yourself, or to acknowledge such pretension in others?—any insensibility respecting his own guilt?—any want of detestation towards sin? Then think of the extent of God's pure and spiritual law.

It is a spiritual law, and therefore extensive. It goes down through all external folds of character, and rests upon the soul itself, places its claim beside the very germ of all action, and touches the mainspring of immortal existence in an accountable being. The soul, the motive, the choice, the very element of moral life is placed under its control. Nothing of which moral character can be predicated is exempt.—Nothing which can be used for moral purposes is excluded. It expands and lives as far and as long as the soul.

It is as extensive as the divine perfections. It claims for God, from moral agents, all the love, reverence, confidence, obedience, adoration, and moral affection of every shade, which his known affections deserve. It claims that the heart in all its various emotions should correspond with the character of God in its varied and blended moral loveliness. It claims that we should render him the glory due unto his name.

It is as extensive as the known interests of the universe. It is founded on the principle of impartial love. It claims for these interests that regard which their relative value requires. It vindicates and asserts the right of all and each upon the individual soul.

It is as extensive as the relations which the soul sustains to God and the universe. These relations originate duties. These duties are various, important, and essentially binding upon the moral nature. They are to be studied, understood, followed out, and invariably regarded, now and forever.

It is as extensive as the powers of the man, both in body and mind. It demands a perpetual consecration of them all to truth and a constant use of them all according to its purposes. It restrains, impels, decides, guides, and judges the man in them all.—Thus it diffuses its claim through the whole system demanding every part and power supremely for God.

It is as extensive as the flow of moral existence.—Every day, hour, and moment in which we are moral agents it rests upon us. It binds us constantly with their obligations. Not an instant can we be relieved from its absorbing claims.

It is as extensive as all the developments of the gospel.—Through the gospel, all the perfections of God shine brighter—the interest of the world seem grander, the relations of being more numerous and sublime, and the purposes of life more important, and indeed the law itself in all its elements, wider, deeper, higher, grander, and more splendid than it could have seemed without the gospel. New relations and duties, new interests, and emotions are wrought around the mind. The soul is bound to meet them every moment without any failure, so far as it is possible for her to know them.

It is as extensive as the order of the moral universe.—It reaches forth on every side, onward through all changes and upward along every avenue of truth, wherever the hand of God binds, and arranges and directs all beings and events. So far as knowledge can be had, it claims of the soul perfect conformity to the ordering of the divine hand.

"I have seen an end to all perfection, but thy commandment is exceeding broad."

Can the proud moralist study the divine law and maintain his claim? Can any sinner compare himself with this standard, and not feel his overwhelming guilt? Can any man look over one hour of his life, and KNOW that during that hour he has fully met every claim and bearing of this law?

Can the holiest saint on earth contemplate this bright law of God, and not feel his imperfection and his dependence?—Can the vilest sinner ponder on it, and not acknowledge that there is something glorious in true religion? Can any friend of God meditate upon it, and not long for a full, and perfect, and eternal assimilation to his character as revealed in the law, especially as it is seen shining down upon us through the gospel?

O, who can paint the glories of the Truth!
How bright it beams, how far its beauties shine!
What heart can feel the full o'erflowing might
Of all-enfolding goodness in the Law!
Immortal Mind awake! put forth thy powers,
Lean on thy God, and strive to rise and soar
Amid these endless realms! On! for the skies!
On! upward! always for the purest height,
Which man can e'er attain, or God bestow!

From the Vermont Chronicle.

HOW TO MAKE A GOOD PREACHER.

Every church, it is presumed, must be desirous of having a good minister, yet every one may not in their own apprehension be favored with such a blessing. Many churches, or rather many persons in our churches, often feel that their minister is not quite what they desire him to be—not quite the man for the place he is in. Their eyes are, therefore, turned away from the minister whose labors they enjoy, to some other man—or to their beau ideal of a minister, and they desire a change. For the benefit of such we would relate the following circumstances, which we are told, are substantially matter of fact.

A young man was settled in a large and popular congregation in New England, under very flattering circumstances. The church and people had settled him in the belief that he was a young man of more than ordinary talents, and with the expectation of his becoming a distinguished man. After a year or two, when the novelty of the thing had worn off, the current seemed to change, and the feeling prevailed that Mr. B——— was not, nor likely to be, quite what they had expected. He did not grow as they had thought he would; he did not perform that amount of labor which was needed to build up the church, and interest the congregation. Things dragged heavily. The young man felt the influence of the chill atmosphere which thus surrounded him. His spirits sunk, his health run down, and it was soon whispered around in the society and in the neighboring towns, that Mr. B—— would probably have to leave ——; he was not the man for the place. He was not the man of talents which they had anticipated.

While things were in this state, at a meeting of the church when the pastor was absent, (perhaps one called to see what should be done,) Mr. O——, an intelligent and influential member, arose and said:

"Brethren, I think we have been in the fault respecting our minister. I think that he is a young man of superior talents, and will one day be a distinguished man. But we have not sustained and encouraged him as he should. We have not spoken of him to others with esteem and confidence, as we should. We have been standing and looking on, expecting him to raise both himself and us to eminence. Now let us adopt a different course. Let us encourage our minister with our prayers, our sympathies, and our efforts. Let us speak of him with esteem and confidence to others, and say that we think him a man of talent, and one who bids fair to be a distinguished man."

The thing was agreed upon. The leading men set the example. Very soon every one was speaking in favor of Mr. B——. His people visited him, sympathized with him, encouraged him; and people out of the society soon began to remark how Mr. B—— was rising in the estimation of his people. The young man felt the change. The cold damp chill with which he was surrounded, and which was benumbing the energies of his soul, was changed by the influence of such kindly beams, and a warm genial atmosphere came over him. His spirits rose; his health returned; his energies awoke, and he soon showed to all that he had within him the elements of a man. Several revivals have attended his labors. In the affections of the church and people he has long since firmly established himself. They delight in him as a man of talents, as well as a good man. His name has become honorably enrolled among American authors, and he is one whom his own church and the churches of New England delight to honor. Reader, Christian, would you have a good minister? Go thou and do likewise.

FAMILY WORSHIP.

A household in which family prayer is devoutly attended to, conjoined with the reading of the Scriptures, is a school of religious instruction. The whole contents of the sacred volume are in due course laid open before its members. They are continually reminded of their relation to God and the Redeemer, of their sins, and their wants, and of the method they must take to procure pardon for the one, and the relief of the other. Every day they are receiving "line upon line, and precept upon precept." A fresh accession is continually making to their stock of knowledge; new truths are gradually opened to their view, and the impression of old truths revived. A judicious parent will naturally notice the most striking incidents in his family in his devotional addresses; such as the sickness, or death, or removal for a longer or shorter time, of the members of which it is composed. His addresses will be varied according to circumstances. Has a pleasing event spread joy and cheerfulness through the household? it will be noticed with becoming expressions of fervent gratitude. Has some calamity overwhelmed the domestic circle? it will give occasion to an acknowledgement of the divine equity; the justice of God's proceedings will be vindicated, and grace implored through the blood of the Redeemer, to sustain and sanctify the stroke.

When the most powerful feelings, and the most interesting circumstances, are thus connected with religion, it is not unreasonable to hope that through Divine grace, some lasting and useful impressions will be made. Is not some part of the good seed thus sown, and thus nurtured, likely to take root, and to become fruitful? Deeply as we are convinced of the deplorable corruption of the human heart, and the necessity consequent on this, of Divine agency to accomplish a saving purpose, we must not forget that God is accustomed to work by means; and surely none can be conceived more likely to meet the end.—What can be so likely to impress a child with a dread of sin, as to hear his parents constantly deprecating the wrath of God as justly due to it; or to induce him to seek an interest in the mediation and intercession of the Savior, as to hear him imploring it for him, day by day, with an importunity proportioned to the magnitude of the subject? By a daily attention on such exercises, children and servants are taught most effectually how to pray. Suitable topics are suggested to their minds; while their growing acquaintance with the scriptures furnishes the arguments by which they may plead with God.—Robert Hall.

FORGIVENESS OF INJURIES.

It is not the prostration of an enemy, but the forgiveness of him, that evinces a divine filiation, and conducts to the noblest victory. Our great Exemplar of righteousness, the purity of whose life baffled the scrutiny of malice, and compelled that blood-stained wretch who had often sported with the rights of innocence, to exclaim, "I find no fault in the man," how did HE meet injuries, and what was HIS demeanor towards his enemies?

Mark his entrance into Jerusalem, that city blackened by crime and steeped in the blood of martyrs. From the Mount of Olives it opened to his view. At which sad sight, he wept Wept not over friends, but enemies; enemies who had rejected, vilified, persecuted him, and who were still waiting, with fiend-like impatience, to wreak their vengeance on his person, and quench their malice in his blood. Nor is this a solitary instance of benignity. Trace his paths from Bethlehem to Calvary, and you will find him everywhere meek, humble, long-suffering. Surrounded by adversaries, and called to meet calumny and even persecution, he supported his matchless clemency to the end; and left the world, good above conception—great beyond comparison.

From the toils and trials of a distressing, but perfect life, follow this illustrious Personage to the place of death. Approach his cross, and fix your attention on the prodigies which signalize his sufferings, and stamp divinity on his martyrdom! Think not that I allude to the terrific drapery which in that dread hour was flung around the great theatre of nature. No; 'tis not the darkened sun, the bursting tombs, the quaking mountains or the trembling world, that I allude to! These are indeed prodigies; but these vanish before the still greater prodigies of meekness humility and sin-forgiving goodness, displayed in the dying Savior.—When I behold him amidst the last agonies of dissolving nature, raising his dying eyes to Heaven, and forgetful of himself, interceding with the God of mercy, with his last breath, and from his very cross, in behalf of those wretches whose insatiable malice had fixed him there—then it is that the evidence of his claims rises to demonstration, and I feel the resistless force of that impassioned exclamation which burst from the lips of infidelity itself, "If Socrates died as a philosopher, Jesus Christ died as a God!"

And shall a worm covered with crimes, and living on sufferance, in that same world where the agonizing Savior uttered his dying supplication, and left his dying example for imitation—shall such a worm, tumid with resentment, lift his proud crest to his fellow-worm, and incapable of mercy, talk of retribution? No; blessed Jesus, thy death is an antidote to vengeance. At the foot of thy cross, I meet mine enemies, I forget their injuries, I bury my revenge, and learn to forgive those who have done me wrong, as I also hope to be forgiven of thee.—Dr. Nott.

TEARS FOR A LOST SOUL.—We are made for the enjoyment of eternal blessedness; it is our high calling and destination; and not to pursue it with diligence, is to be guilty of the blackest ingratitude to the Author of our being, as well as the greatest cruelty to ourselves. To fail of such an object, to defeat the end of our existence, and, in consequence of neglecting the great salvation, to sink at last under the frown of the Almighty, is a calamity which words were not invented to express, nor finite minds formed to grasp. Eternity invents every state, whether of bliss or of suffering, with a mysterious and awful importance entirely its own, and is the only property in the creation which gives that weight and moment to whatever it attaches, compared to which all sublunary joys and sorrows, all interests which know a period, fade into a most contemptible insignificance. In approaching every other object, it is easy to exceed the proper estimate. But what would be the funeral obsequies of the lost soul? Where shall we find tears fit to be wept at such a spectacle; or could we realize the calamity in all its extent, which tokens of commiseration and concern would be deemed equal to the occasion? Would it suffice for the sun to veil his light, and the moon her brightness; to cover the ocean with mourning, and the heavens with sackcloth? or were the whole fabric of nature to become animated and vocal, would it be possible for her to utter a groan too deep, or a cry too piercing, to express the magnitude and extent of such a catastrophe?—Robert Hall.

ACTIVE BENEVOLENCE.

The following was written by a correspondent of the Christian Advocate and Journal. It is a delightful story.

"I must here tell a little story which I hope may be of service to the younger members of respectable families. A short time since, I happened at the house of a friend; and while seated in the parlor engaged in conversation, a gentleman called in to settle an account. During the process of exchanging the money, a five-cent piece fell upon the floor which at the moment was not found. The gentleman, after arranging the business, told the little son of my friend, that if he could find the piece he might have it to spend in cakes. The little fellow went to work, and in a short time found the money, and, running to the gentleman, presented it to him, saying it was his. 'No, my son,' said the gentleman, refusing the money, it is yours. I gave it to you to buy cakes.' The child's countenance sparkled with delight at the idea of having found the piece, but he seemed to insist that the owner should receive it. Noticing his hesitancy, I said to him: 'Come here, my little fellow, and let me tell you a story.' As he stood by my knee, I told him that I knew of a poor widow who had five children, one little boy about his size; and that when I saw them they were all crying for bread. The little boy said: 'O, mother, do give me some bread. I have so much pain and am so hungry.' The mother said, 'Johnny do not cry so, and I will get you some bread presently.' But Johnny knew there was no bread to be had, for he had been told the same often before; and looking beseechingly into his mother's face, he burst into tears and turned away in despair. I told him that I had but a five-cent piece in my pocket, which I gave the child with directions to go and buy some cakes. 'O, no, not cakes,' said his mother, 'get some bread;' and away he ran and brought the worth of it in bread, and the children all fell into it and devoured it directly. Little Alonzo (for that was his name,) placing the money in my hand, said: 'Will you give this to some poor little boy whose mother has no bread?' 'And here,' said the father, 'are twenty-five cents more to add to it.' A young brother of Alonzo's, named Thomas, who was looking on, and who had heard the story, ran to his mother who was sewing in the back room, and cried, 'O, mother, I want five cents for the poor boy who has no bread.' Obtaining his request, he ran to me, and with his countenance beaming with pleasure, he said: 'Here is more money for the boy.' The gentleman who came to settle the account, looked on with astonishment and delight at the childish generosity so innocently exhibited before him. 'Well,' said he, 'I only wish it were in my power to add so much to the gifts of these dear children, as my heart would dictate. 'Here,' said he, 'is one dollar—it will be of some service.'

After leaving the house, I went on my way, musing on the interesting scene, until I fell in with a poor afflicted widow with a sick daughter, who had neither bread, nor wood, nor any thing to supply their immediate and pressing necessities. I looked at the dollar and thirty-five cents I had received through Alonzo, and thought of their request 'give it to the little boy who has no bread;' but I concluded that their generous little hearts would not object to my dividing a portion of it between these afflicted sufferers. I gave them nearly half the amount, and then went to procure some wood. When the car was loaded, I told the circumstances to the wood merchant, and he refused the pay, saying that was his part of the donation. He filled the cart as full as it would hold, then the carter spoke and said he would put in his part, and that would be the hauling. I mentioned the circumstances that took place in connection with the offerings of the children to show the train of incidents that may occur in connection with a single visit. Nor is this case a solitary one. With almost every act of charity bestowed, a single circle of events takes place.

Prof. Bush vs. Miller.

Prof. Bush of New York University has lately delivered a series of lectures on sacred symbols and prophecy, in Portland, Me. Among those lectures he gave one touching Mr. Miller's theory of the end of the world. There is, probably, no better interpreter of prophecy in this country than Prof. Bush. Relative to the theory of the destruction of the earth in 1843, Prof. Bush holds the following language:—

"But such an event—the destruction of this mundane system—cannot be contemplated separately from its past history.—New facts in Geology are almost daily discovered, which show the age of the world to be much greater than has usually been supposed. In this, all intelligent geologists are agreed. It is believed to be perfectly consistent with the account which is given by Moses, and a necessary inference from the facts above referred to, that it should have existed for many thousand years, at least, before the time to which the scriptures carry us back. And all this period seems only a preparatory one for what was to follow. But the six thousand years which has since elapsed, bears but a very small proportion to the preceding period. Is it likely that God would be many thousand years in preparing for a series of events, which were to occupy only six thousand years? What should we think of an architect, who should occupy many years in erecting a theatrical stage which was to be used only for one short hour, and then destroyed?

"And yet, if the word of God, fairly interpreted, teaches any thing of this nature, it should be embraced at once, irrespectively of any such considerations. And in ascertaining the meaning of the Bible, and of prophecy in particular, regard must be had to the science of philology. A thorough knowledge of the original languages of the Bible, as well as of the principles of interpretation, are indispensable. He was very far from wishing to undervalue the importance of common sense and of divine illumination; much less would he hold up the idea that there is a privileged class, who alone can understand and expound the Book of God; yet he must say, that Mr. Miller has given many proofs, in his book, of his need of literary qualifications. As an illustration of this remark, the use which Mr. M. makes of a passage in Lev. xxvi. 23, 24, on which he has founded his 17th lecture, was mentioned. "And if ye will not be reformed by these things, but will walk contrary to me, then will I also walk contrary unto you, and will punish you yet seven times for your sins." The phrase, 'seven times,' in this passage, Mr. M. says, means prophetic times, or seven times 360 years, and from this, he calculates that the end will be in 1843. And yet, the word 'times' has nothing corresponding with it in the original. The meaning of the Hebrew, is, seven fold, not seven times; and yet Mr. M has built a whole lecture upon the latter expression.

"Mr. M. has a peculiar way of quoting scripture, following the sound rather than the sense. This is true in his book from beginning to end. Some instances were mentioned as examples, found in his first lecture—2 Sam. xxii. 9, 10, 13—"Then went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured," &c. This Mr. M. quotes to prove, that the wicked will be destroyed by fire when Christ comes; while it is a song of David, composed in view of a special deliverance from his enemies. It relates to an event in his own life—to a past event, and to no future one whatever. Other illustrations of Mr. M's. loose manner of quoting scripture, equally striking, were presented."

The 2,300 days of the vision in the 8th and 9th chapters of Daniel, which Mr. Miller understands to be so many years to the end of the world, Prof. Bush, (and very justly, too, we think,) refers to the protracted persecution of the Jews. The Jews, it is well known, have been trodden under foot from the time they invoked the blood of Christ on themselves, and their children. At the accomplishment of these 2,300 prophetic days which are to be understood as so many literal years, Prof. B. thinks the sanctuary will be literally cleansed. The literal Jerusalem is to be cleansed and the Turks to be driven out, and the Jews now scattered abroad are to return and possess it.

In Daniel vii. 10, mention is made of a judgment which Mr. M. takes to be the last judgment, Prof. B. thinks this refers to the beast, for in the next verse it is said that the beast was slain, and not the world of ungodly, and his body given to the burning flame. This he regards as figurative, and refers to the triumph of Christianity over its antagonist powers. Any one can see that such a triumph has already commenced.

Relative to the 1,000 years mentioned in Revelation, Prof. B. holds as follows:

"Mr. Miller maintains, that there is to be a resurrection of the righteous 1,000 years before that of the wicked, and that during this period, the righteous are to reign on earth with their Lord. But he thus assumes, that the resurrection body is of such a nature, that it can occupy a material abode. Paul tells us that there is a natural and a spiritual body. Mr. M. has not explained how a spiritual body can be adapted to an earthly residence. But, Mr. M. says that as the promise, that the Jews should inherit the land, has never been fulfilled, it must be a promise to the spiritual Jew, and is to be fulfilled at the second coming of Christ. Mr. Bush thinks he can prove that the Jews literally will yet inherit the land of Palestine.

"Mr. Miller finds no room for a temporal millenium, such as is spoken of in Rev. 20, except the one which he believes in. Mr. Bush finds room for it in time past, but he considers the reign with Christ here referred to, as a very different one from that which Mr. M. advocates. The dragon here, is Paganism. So Mr. M. admits in one part of his book, though, in another part, he gives to it another meaning. And this passage, Rev xx. 1, &c. carries us back to the time of Constantine. The faithful witnesses reigned with Christ spiritually from that time to the present.—"Till the thousand years should be fulfilled." This does not declare that they were not to reign after that period. Paul says, "Until the law came, sin was in the world." Did he mean to imply that after the law came sin was not in the world?—The deceiving of the nations, Gog and Magog, has already occurred."

Mr. Miller and his views, we have no doubt, are much slandered by common fame; yet there are some of his interpretations that seem very arbitrary, for instance, "Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall increase." This he thinks is fulfilled in turning to and fro the Book of Daniel.

But we would wish by no means to prevent any one from preparing themselves for the judgment. All are hastening to it, and in a trice will be there, whether prepared or otherwise. Blessed will those be who are ready when the Son of Man shall come to execute judgment, and assign to every person his appropriate destiny.

Precept vs. Practice.

One of the Editors of the Morning Star, in an article headed "Perpetuity of the Sabbath," lays down the proposition that an institution ordained by God can be abolished only in one of three ways:

1. The cessation of the causes which induced the establishment of that institution, (including the object for which it was established)

2. By the origin and action of some counteracting causes.

3. By the positive revocation of God.

The above positions he establishes beyond the shadow of a doubt. Of the law of the Sabbath he holds the following

"The commandment to remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy, is a member of the moral code. The strength of no other precept in that code, is in the least degree diminished! If this precept does not embrace an everlasting moral principle, why is it here, as a solitary exception, associated with an entire list of perpetual principles? With the same propriety may an infatuated mortal lay his impious hand upon any other foundation stone in the great moral fabric, and attempt to wrest it from the place where God has fixed it, as to waste his energies in fruitless efforts to overthrow the Sabbatical institution."

We, as believers in the unchangeable nature of MORAL LAWS and the precepts of the DECALOGUE, can ask for nothing more than the Editor contends strenuously and effectually to sustain. But yet, after having established the argument beyond the possibility of contradiction, the Editor in practice denies it. How must we look upon him in the light of his precept or practice? We advise him to change either one or the other to make himself CONSISTENT. The "Star" is a Free-will Baptist paper.

The Jews.

The Russian Government seems disposed to grant emancipation to the 2,200,000 Jews within the Empire. Dr. Lilienthal, the grand Rabbi of Riga, has been charged with the mission of visiting the eighteen governments of the Empire where the Jews reside, to collect all the necessary details of their condition, and inform them that the object of the government is to furnish them, gratuitously, the means of moral and intellectual improvement necessary to raise them to the rank of other citizens, without interfering with their religion.—This should be chronicled as one of the signs of the times that foreshadows the literal fulfilment of prophecy relative to the permanent settlement of the Jews again in Palestine.

It is said that there are 50,000 Jews in the United States, and that they have 50 synagogues.

The Mothers' Journal.

The February number has come to our table. Like its predecessors, it is well calculated to be of service to those for whom it was designed.

Among its articles are the following, "George Crabbe—Pure Air." "It is said—I think." "A Mother's Reverie." "A Mother's Responsibility cannot be delegated." "Stuffing children with improper food." "The Christmas Party." "Getting children out of the way." "Heroes." "Novel Reading and Reality."

A work of this sort should be in every mother's hands. The aid that they might derive from it in learning how to attend to the trusts committed to their charge, would abundantly more than pay the subscription price. The health, comfort, education, and temporal and eternal interests of children are in a great measure in the hands of mothers. Surely they need every possible assistance to direct and sustain them under such responsibilities.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—Mr. Greeley, of the Tribune, and Dr. S. H. Cox, have debated the subject of Capital Punishment in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York. Mr. O'Sullivan and Rev. G. B. Cheever have also debated it two evenings. The argument of Dr. Cox and Mr. Cheever against abolishing the punishment, was unanswered by Mr. Greeley and Mr. O'Sullivan. Well might it be so, for while the former have the word of God for their argument, the latter have to explore the field of speculation. We trust the good sense of our Legislature will not allow it to take so impolitic and dangerous a course as to abolish Capital Punishment.

SABBATH SCHOOL TREASURY.—Fifty cents forwarded, post free, to Henry S. Washburn, Agent, 79 Cornhill, Boston, will secure you a neat octavo pamphlet of 24 pages, monthly, for one year. And we are quite sure that every youth who reads it and cherishes its instruction, will be decidedly better in his habits and morals, and will treat others with that respect due them. Parents would do well to furnish their children with such a work. It would save them many bitter regrets, and give them unspeakable pleasure in seeing them walk in the ways of virtue, and in the paths of peace.

TO AGENTS.—We wish no one to pay money to any one on debts claimed due from us without our special order. We shall be able to settle every authenticated demand honorably, and to entire satisfaction, we trust.

Christ's Second Coming.

BROTHER BAILEY—I observe from the publications of the day, that the subject of the Second Advent is much agitated in many places; and almost in every place is the theory of certain Millenarians receiving some consideration, especially that of Mr. Miller. I regard this subject with interest, and I believe no subject connected with the state of the church, can be more interesting; still, it may be rational to suppose that error is connected with every theory with which the human mind has any thing to do.—That God's truth will stand, is undoubted; but do we understand it? This is the important question.

In respect to the main position of the Millenarians, I profess to be warmly attached; it appears to me to be one of the best established positions in the unaccomplished prophecies. It is necessary, to carry out the great work which the Savior, the second Adam was promised to perform, (i. e.) to destroy the work of the devil, and restore all things, to raise man from the ruins of the fall, and conquer, even the last enemy, which is death. That this is to be done in the militant state of the church, before the Judgment, when the righteous and the wicked shall stand before their Judge, and be separated as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats, is evident, for, from the time when the saints shall be changed from the mortal to the immortal state, after the precedent of Enoch and Elijah without death, and our Savior in the Resurrection, "they shall live and reign with Christ a thousand years"—for, says the scripture, and the rest of the dead lived not till the thousand years were accomplished. This being before the final resurrection, must relate to this world, and not to the heavenly state.

It then appears that all the blessings of the primeval state will be restored to the church, before the Judgment and final consummation of all things. If so, what will be the state of the church and of the saints?

1st. They must be holy—so was Adam from the hands of his Maker.

2d. They must be immortal, for death is but the consequence of sin.

3d. They must be saved from all moral and natural evil, for these are the inheritance of a fallen state.

4th. The curse must be removed from the earth, and henceforth she must produce her strength; and disease and death cannot be communicated from her atmosphere,—a renewed earth must be the appropriate dwelling of the renewed men. Thus we shall have a "new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." "And God shall wipe all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow or crying; neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away."

This state of things is shown by the scripture to be the perfection of the work of redemption when the last enemy is conquered, and the saying is brought to pass, that "death is swallowed up in victory," and the church is redeemed from the ruins of the fall.

What a cheering reflection is this to the real child of God! The scenery which rises to his view, infinitely surpasses that which enraptured the soul of the man of God when, from the top of Pisgah, he was permitted to overlook the Jordan that rolled between him and the land of Canaan—the promised inheritance of the people of God—the ultimatum of their highest hopes, from the time the promise was made to Abraham to the close of their eventful journey.

The Millenial state of the church, no doubt, will combine all the blessedness, all the pleasure and enjoyment which Christians in their present imperfect state are capable of comprehending or anticipating, as connected with future felicity in heaven, to which it will doubtless be but an intermediate and preparatory state.

That the Millenium is necessary to the militant church, is evident from analogy.—The Sabbath is the consummation of the week; six days of which are spent in care and toil, and often in severe and desperate conflict, but the Sabbath comes, to the real christian, a cessation of conflict, the end of toil and care; and the Millenium is but the Sabbath of the church. She has toiled and suffered during the preceding 6,000 years as no tongue can describe or imagination paint; but a Sabbath is reserved for her, when her toil and conflicts are over, a glorious rest indeed is reserved for the people of God.

When this state shall commence, it will, no doubt, be joyful to the saints of Christ. The holy Apostles and primitive Christians seemed to dwell with satisfaction on the promise of his coming, and the activity of their minds and the strength of their faith seem to overleap the thousands of years that intervened, and presented the time as if it were at the door. The Apostle Peter says, "seeing we look for these things, what manner of persons ought we to be." And the toil-worn pilgrim of every age has been cheered on his pilgrimage with the same blessed assurances associated with the second coming of Christ, and the Sabbath of rest which remained for a toil-worn and afflicted church.

But of the time when this Advent will take place, God has seen fit to reserve to himself. And our Savior has directed his disciples to watch. "Blessed is that servant whom, when his Lord cometh, he shall find watching;" for, although his coming will be to many in an unexpected hour, and find them unprepared; still, the true disciple, obeying his Master's injunctions, will not be in darkness, that that day should overtake "him as a thief."

I am aware that some modern Millenarians have supposed that they are able to define precisely by the prophetic numbers the year in which this Advent shall be, and Mr. Miller has fixed it at A. D., 1843, taking for the basis of the calculation Daniel's 2,300 days. Others have fallen into the same error, (for an error I am disposed to consider it,) for, from their own showing, there must be a discrepancy of four years, and it could not transpire till 1847. Daniel's 70 weeks were fulfilled in three and a half years after the Passion of our Savior, for he says, that "in the midst of the week shall the Messiah be cut off." If then, the 70 weeks were fulfilled in 37 years after the Advent, which is upon the conclusion that he was 30 years old when he began to preach, and preached 3 or 3 1-2 years, and was cut off in the midst or middle of the week then the close of the 70 weeks would be 37 of the Christian era; which deducted from 1847, will leave 1810; this added to the 490 is equal to 2,300, the full complement of Daniel's numbers; whereas, those who fix the termination of these numbers at 1843, close the calculation of 70 weeks at the death of Christ, and therefore deduct only 33 years from the number of the Christian era. I name this to show that error enters into the calculations of the most precise and confident on this subject.

But I am constrained to believe that Miller and those of his views have fallen into a still more important error, and that is the object for which the numbers are given.—It is a common error in commentators to transfer the promises and prophecies of the scripture relating to Jerusalem and Israel to the Christian church, and some Millenarians have abandoned their avowed principles of a literal application of the prophecies, and have also adopted this erroneous construction of this prophecy, which clearly relates to the "cleansing of the sanctuary," which has been trodden under foot of the Gentiles from the dispersion of the Jews, at the destruction of Jerusalem, to the present time, and from the indications apparent is soon to be cleansed from the control and contaminations of the feet of Mahomedan Gentiles, whose "time is nearly fulfilled."

If such be the case, as we have every reason to believe it is, then the object of the prophet was to shed light on the future history of the Jews, and as they, by rejecting the gospel, incurred the displeasure of God, (who however "confirmed the covenant with many during the one week," from the commencement of the Savior's preaching to the time they counted themselves unworthy of eternal life; and Paul was called and sent to the Gentiles—a period of about 7 years) and who at that time and by that means committed the abomination that has made their city and land desolate for about 1800 years; and given their sanctuary unto the hands of the Gentiles to be literally trodden under their feet. If such was the object of the prophet, then we may soon look for the disability which has attended the Jews to becoming a body politic, and re-people their land and inhabit their city, and cleansing their sanctuary, (not only from the pollution of Gentile feet, but also of the stain of infidelity to their Messiah and King) for the 2,300 days is very nearly accomplished. The exceeding injustice of appropriating the promise belonging to the Jews, to the Gentile Church is apparent; beside, the prophecies clearly relating to the Jews, as noted by Paul Rom. xi., are yet unaccomplished, and the scriptures cannot be broken. All of which go to show that Mr. Miller is mistaken on this subject.

You see, Brother Bailey, I have given an off-hand article on the subject. It is the result of much reflection and careful comparison of writers on this subject with the scriptures. A word to the wise is sufficient.

Yours, &c.,

JOHN MAXSON.

BROTHER BAILEY—Notwithstanding I have recently written to you of the progress of Zion in this village, (Pawcatuck.) My heart now inspires me to send another irregular scrawl for insertion in the Register.—I noticed in my last that my health was fast declining, and my fears that I should thereby be obliged to close my labors here.—These fears I now fully realise. After laboring continually for about eight weeks, I find myself unable to proceed farther.

Last first day evening was a time of great interest in this town, it being an appointment for the backsliders redeemed, and the newly converted to take the body slips in the sanctuary, and listen to a discourse directed to them. At the ringing of the bell the people began to gather, and as the most of the inhabitants were interested, they appeared like an army bending their course from every street to the house of God. The "young converts" gathered to the place appointed, until, for the lack of room, they were obliged to mingle with the congregation at large. The house was literally "jammed," and many, very many, not able to get in, were compelled to return to their homes—I had already given up my labors, but deep anxiety urged me to the house to behold the scene. And oh! how glorious was that season! How marvellous that sight! What a cloud of new-enlisted witnesses. Scores and hundreds, that eight weeks ago were in the gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity, are now hopeful beings in the sight of God. A goodly number of them were open opposers of that religion they now profess. Sceptics of about every class are with the number. From the gray-headed man, whose course is almost run, even down to the child—the man of the world, honor, wealth and pleasure, all are there, and all are upon the same level at the foot of the cross. Some that were there had once despised even that "church-going [illegible] confessed they had [illegible] terrific peals of [illegible] hear even the echo [illegible] had derided that nam[illegible] deemed." Those [illegible] blasphemers, mo[illegible] ages and distincti[illegible] in this glorious re[illegible] scene! They w[illegible] Campbell. He [illegible] most of the time, [illegible] those recently conve[illegible] might have thought all [illegible] the house were about to ris[illegible] in compliance with the invitation. The rush of this cloud of witnesses, caused a thrill of joy through the congregation which burst forth in one loud "Amen—glory to God." My soul felt that this met a response from angels above; and that while heaven's arches were ringing with angelic shouts, the acclamations in heaven and earth met and mingled, as did the spirits of the celestial and terrestrial bands. One minister said to me that nineteen-twentieths of the inhabitants were already converted to God. A continued, consistent effort on the part of the church, and Rhode-Island shall have one village dedicated to the service of the Lord of Hosts. The people still maintain the watch-word "hold on," and are advancing "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

The advancement of the temperance cause in these parts is heart-cheering to the lovers of truth and morality. The inebriate, on conviction, first signs the "temperance pledge," then offers himself for prayers. One merchant with a large amount of liquors on his hands has embraced religion, abandoned the traffic, joined the church, and last first day evening in the congregation praised God that he had left off dealing in "ardent spirits," and had engaged in the business of religion. During the sermon to the converts a vote was taken of them on "total abstinence," and it is believed that every one voted in its favor. Temperance goes in this country by the name of "John the Baptist," because it "prepares the way of the Lord."

In my last I noticed the conversion of Mr. Nash, of Watch-Hill. God has thoroughly converted him, his family, hotel and all. Although his house is on the "beach," and a place of general resort for pleasure parties, and those who visit the sea for health, he has closed his bar, and given out word that his house is open for prayer and preaching. Eld. Campbell preached there last evening. The house was thronged, and my informant said, "God came down in power; sinners begged for mercy, and saints shouted loud hallelujahs to the Lord!" Glory to God for the contrast—The heavenly fire is burning all around us, and about all are evincing their desire to be sharers in this precious revival of religion. May the Lord ride on, in his native majesty and power throughout the nations of the earth.

Prayer was offered by Prof. Raymond.

Messrs. Putnam, Tremain, and Foote were appointed a Committee to nominate a Board of Officers for the year ensuing.

After a short season devoted to prayer, and remarks upon the importance of S. Schools there was a recess for one hour.

Met pursuant to adjournment at 1 o'clock P. M.

The Nominating Committee presented the following list of names for the several officers, which were duly appointed by the society, viz:

Rev. E. D. Willis, Eaton, President.
" C. H. Harvey, Hamilton, 1st V. P.
C. Allen, Lenox, 2d "
Rev. James Bailey, De Ruyter, 3d "
" B. Putnam, Morrisville, Recording Secretary.
Prof. J. H. Raymond, Hamilton, Cor. Secretary.
William W. Farwell, Morrisville, Treasurer.

J. Jenkins, Cazenovia, Rev. J. B. Pixley, De Ruyter, Rev. Hiram Lee, Georgetown, D. Woodworth, Fenner, J. W. Slocum, Erieville, Rev. Mr. Abell, Chittenango, J. Foote, Hamilton, Mr. Thwing, Brookfield, Rev. Mr. Cooper, Lenox, A. C. Stone, Peterboro, James Bolton, Pratt's Hollow, Rev. M. L. Platt, Madison, Rev. E. D. Reed, Lebanon, Rev. William Tompkins, Stockbridge, Managers.

The Treasurer's report was presented, which, after being duly audited, was accepted. It acknowledged receipts in cash amounting to $167,87, and in pledges deemed good, $326,75. The society then listened to remarks from their agent, Mr. Smith, [illegible] the success which he had realized [illegible] the year. The number of [illegible] had been nearly doubled, while [illegible] remained a majority of youth [illegible] within the County, unconnected [illegible] S. School; he had been cor[illegible] ceived by all the evangelical de[illegible] and had found them ready to [illegible] for the promotion of our ob[illegible]

[illegible] Raymond then moved the following resolution, accompanied with appropriate remarks, which was seconded by B. Putnam, and unanimously adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the blessings of Providence upon our past labors, call upon us to devise liberal things for the future.

The semi-annual meeting of the society was appointed to be held in Peterboro, in September next.

The Secretary was directed to forward, for publication, the above minutes to the editor of each paper printed in the County, also to the editors of the N. Y. Baptist Register, the N. Y. Observer, and the Christian Advocate and Journal. After prayers by Messrs. Putnam and Smith, the Union was adjourned to meet in the Baptist Church in Peterboro, in September.

News of the Day.

DECISION OF THE COURT OF ENQUIRY ON COMMANDER M'KENZIE'S CASE.

U. S. Ship North Carolina,
Jan. 20th, 1842.

Present—Commodore Charles Stewart, Commodore Jacob Jones, Commodore Alexander J. Dallas, Ogden Hoffman, Judge Advocate.

The Court after due deliberation, resolve to report the facts and circumstances of the case submitted to them, and to deliver their opinion upon the facts as follows:—

In execution of the order of the Hon. Secretary of the Navy, the Court, with the exception of ten of the crew, who are in confinement, examined every officer, seaman, and apprentice, belonging to the United States Brig Somers, in her late cruise, and unanimously report the following facts as proved to the satisfaction of the Court by the testimony, the record of which they have the honor herewith to submit.

That on the 27th of November, 1842, in lat. 13 24 16, and longitude 41 24 45, Commander McKenzie discovered that a mutiny had been organized on board the Brig Somers.

The Court further finds that such mutiny did exist, and that Midshipman Philip Spencer, Boatswain's mate, Samuel Cromwell, and Seaman Elisha Small, were ringleader's in it, and that others of the crew had knowledge of its existence and participated in its guilt.

That on the 27th of November, Midshipman Spencer was arrested and confined in irons, that on the subsequent day Boatswain's Mate, Cromwell, and Seaman Small were also confined in irons, and at the time they were so confined, it was the intention of Commander McKenzie to bring them to the United States to be tried by the laws of their country, and that to effect this desired object, Commander McKenzie adopted every measure that a brave, prudent, and skilful officer could adopt. That during the confinement of the prisoners, sullenness, discontent, inattention to duty, disobedience to orders, often as seamen know, and naval records prove, the sole precursors to open acts of violence and blood, were manifested by the crew, and justly excited the belief in the Commander & in the officers, that an attempt would be made to rescue the prisoners, and take the brig from those to whom she had been entrusted by the Government.

The Court further find, that there was no place on board the Brig, which would have given greater assurance of protecting the prisoners from a rescue, than the quarter deck, on which they were confined.

That Commander McKenzie in the responsible situation in which he was placed, sought, as it was his duty to do, the advice and counsel of his officers, and that the unanimous advice and opinion of those officers, after an examination of some of the crew, and careful deliberation, was that the safety of the brig Somers depended upon the immediate execution of Midshipman Spencer, Boatswain's Mate, Cromwell, and Seaman, Small.

That Commander McKenzie, in pursuance of the advice of his officers, and in obedience to the dictates of his own judgment, did execute, by hanging, Midshipman Spencer, Boatswain's Mate, Cromwell, and Seaman, Small.

That such execution took place on the 1st of December, 1842, in lat. 17 deg. 31 m. 28s., and long. 41 deg. 24 m 45s and that the brig at the time of the execution, was, by the log, distant from St. Thomas 528 1-2 miles, at which place she arrived on the 5th of December, 1842.

The Court further find that the conduct of Commander McKenzie had been kind to his crew, attentive to their wants and comforts, that he was studious to promote their knowledge of their profession, and that no punishments were inflicted greater than were rendered necessary by the discordant nature of the crew, and the proper discipline of a man of war.

The Court further find that the conduct of Commander McKenzie, Lieut. Gansevoort and the officers of the brig was, during the trying scenes through which they passed collected, calm and brave, and justified the confidence reposed in them by their country.

OPINION

The Court are, therefore, of opinion,

That a mutiny had been organized on board the United States brig Somers to murder the officers and take possession of the brig.

That Midshipman Philip Spencer, Boatswain's Mate, Samuel Cromwell, and Elisha Small, were concerned in and guilty of such mutiny.

That had not the execution taken place, an attempt would have taken place to release the prisoners, murder the officers and take command of the brig.

That such attempt, had it been made in the night, or during a squall, would, in the judgment of the Court, from the number and character of the crew, the small size of the brig, and the daily decreasing physical strength of the officers, occasioned by almost constant watching and broken slumbers, have been successful.

That Commander McKenzie, under these circumstances, was not bound to risk the safety of his vessel, and jeopard the lives of the young officers, and the loyal of his crew, in order to secure to the guilty the forms of trial, and that the immediate execution of the prisoners was demanded by duty and justified by necessity.

The Court are further of opinion, that throughout all these painful occurrences, so well calculated to disturb the judgment, and to try the energy of the bravest and most experienced officer, the conduct of Commander McKenzie and his officers, was prudent, calm, and firm, and that he and they honorably performed their duty to the service and their country.

(Signed) CHARLES STEWART,
President of the Court.
(Signed) OGDEN HOFFMAN,
Judge Advocate.

Anecdote.—"My dear husband," said an amiable and witty wife to her truant lord, the morning after returning at a late hour somewhat the worse for an evening's dissipation, "do you think, really, that man and wife are both one, as is sometimes said?" "Certainly, my dear; how can it be otherwise? But why ask the question?"—"Because," she replied, "if that be the fact, I am bound to express my regret and ask your forgiveness for being imprudent last night. Pardon me this offense, and I promise you that I will never get drunk again." The rebuke was effectual.

The Cost of the Capture.—In adjusting the awkward Monterey business, the following stipulations were entered into between the high contracting parties;

6th. Sir Thomas Ap. C. Jones will deliver five hundred complete suits of clothes, of woolen, for the infantry, to replace about one half of what was spoiled of the Mexican division, by their forced march in continued rains to recover the port which he invaded.

7th. Sir Thomas Ap. C. Jones will pay into the Treasury of the nation $15,000, which were expended in the general alarm occasioned in the department of the Californians by his invasion of the port of Monterey, as well as for a complete military band of musical instruments rendered useless by the same cause.

Another Post Office Decision.—John A. Bryan, Assistant Postmaster General, in answer to an inquiry says, "that the making of lines round an advertisement, or paragraph in a newspaper, with ink or pencil, unaccompanied by any writing upon the same, is not considered to be 'memorandum,' within the meaning of the 13th and 20th section of 1825."

A Well-Fought Battle—"Science against Numbers."—The Olive Branch says that some time since, on a Sunday, the people passing a grain store on Front street, heard an unusual noise. Many stopped and looked in, and beheld a weasel fighting rats.—He fought bravely, and some fifteen of the rats fell successively before the heroic weasel; every part of the store was sprinkled with blood; at last, however, the weasel became exhausted from the very labor of slaughtering his enemies, who, being almost innumerable, dashed on their foe and killed him.—Bos. Trans.

The Choctaw Tribe of Indians.—The Arkansas Telegraph furnishes, from the Choctaw Almanac, statistics indicative of the progress of the tribe towards civilization. They have a printing press, from which they have issued, up to September, 1842, 33,000 impressions, or more than 3,000,000 of pages, consisting of translations of books, pamphlets, &c. They have also contributed $10,000 to the building of a Central College, where they intend to complete the education of Choctaw youth, and prepare teachers for the general instruction of youth.

Their country is divided into four districts. There are courts of law in each, judges inferior and superior, with all the necessary officers. Religious and temperance societies abound, and trade is carried on with spirit. The population of the four districts which comprise their territory is 17,600. There are many missionaries among them. In one district there are eighteen, fourteen of whom are of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Confirmation of the Capture of the Texian Army.—The rumors of the defeat of the Texians at Mier, which were brought by the last accounts from Galveston, are fully confirmed by authentic accounts received by a late arrival at New Orleans from Matamoras.

We quote from the Bee of the 26th ult., as follows:

"On the 15th of December, Gen. Ampudia received a despatch from Gen. Woll, informing him that the Texians, 800 or 1000 strong, had taken Loredo, and that he (Gen. Woll) had been compelled to fall back; that the Texian forces were taking the northern route towards Matamoras.

On the receipt of this intelligence, Gen. Ampudia left Matamoras with two battalions of sappers and miners in quest of the enemy, and reached Mier, fifty leagues distant, on the 22d of December. A body of Texians, under the command of Colonels Fisher and Green, had in the mean time crossed the river and attacked the town in the night. The Mexican troops stationed in the neighborhood immediately went to the assistance of the city, when an engagement took place which lasted seventeen hours.

Every house and street was desperately defended. After the battle had been maintained on both sides with determination and obstinacy for a great length of time, the Texians, finding themselves surrounded on all sides, resolved to surrender, and finally capitulated on honorable terms. It is feared, however, that the articles of surrender will not be faithfully complied with on the part of Mexico.

The Mexicans report their loss during this engagement at 420 killed and 130 wounded. The loss on the part of the Texians was 11 killed and 19 wounded.—This great disparity evinces the superior skill of the Texians in the use of fire arms, and the surrender of the invading army after so slight a loss would lead us to suppose that they only surrendered after having exhausted their ammunition. The success of the Mexicans, after suffering so severely, speaks favorably of their courage and perseverance.

Gen. Ampudia returned to Matamoras on the 7th of January, and was received by the citizens with great rejoicings and applause. He brought with him 212 Texian prisoners, including Colonels Fisher and Green. Texians were to leave Matamoras on the 16th inst. for the city of Mexico, there to await their destiny from the hands of Santa Anna. Colonels Fisher and Green, and the prisoners generally, acknowledge the treatment they received from Gen. Ampudia since the capitulation, to have been humane and gentlemanly.

We have given the substance of a document which we have been favored with a perusal of, but which is too lengthy for insertion.

[The force of the Texians engaged in the above contest is stated at about 260 men, and that of the Mexicans at from 1,500 to 1,800.]

American Inventive Genius Abroad.—The Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer writing under date of the 31st ult. takes the following notice of one of our citizens and his admirable inventions:

You and all the American public are acquainted with the high professional reputation of William Norris, Esq., and the unsurpassed excellence of his locomotive engines. These possess already a European fame. Last month or earlier, he brought to this capital an elegant finished model as a present to King Louis Phillippe. It and the donor—the able engineer and mechanician—were received by his majesty with all interest and honor. The model underwent a Court examination and admiration in all detail.

The King bestowed on Mr. Norris, in return, or as a general evidence of his double satisfaction, a splendid gold box with brilliants, and a gold medal with his portrait. A large compartment in the Louvre was assigned for a railway experiment. I annex a note from Mr. Norris, which I received yesterday, relating to what passed. He formed several advantageous contracts for his locomotives, to be furnished from his manufactory in Philadelphia, to the superintendents of the French railroads about to be executed.

Paris, December 27, 1842

Yesterday the King and all the royal family, accompanied by several of the Ministers of State and general officers of the army, visited the Marine Museum Gallery of the Louvre to witness the performance of the Miniature Locomotive on a railway constructed in such a manner as to show the inequalities of surface—deviation from straight lines—with curvatures of the smallest radii, that are found in practical railroads. The length of the road is 305 feet, width 44 inches. The shortest curve is of 11 feet radius for the length of 28 feet.

The locomotive made many trips over the road, much to the surprise and gratification of the company, when a car of huge dimensions, in comparison with the road and locomotive, was attached. The car, accommodating ten persons, was soon filled with Major Generals and other illustrious personages, who were delighted with their rapid trips to and fro.

Settlement of our Affairs with Morocco.—The following (official) from the Madisonian, shows that an affair has been readily settled by the new Consul, from which much difficulty was apprehended.

Tangier, 12th Dec., 1842.

To the Hon. Daniel Webster,
Secretary of State of the U. S

Sir,—I hasten to reply to your letter under date the 3d August, which I did not receive until the 3d inst. I considered it advisable to proceed immediately to Tangier, as no United States vessel of war had made its appearance at Gibralter up to the date of the receipt of your letter. I have now the honor to report to you, immediately on my arrival here, I had an interview with the Bashaw, and made the following demands:—

First, that as the Lieutenant Governor of Tangier had been lately removed from office, without the presence of Commodore Morgan or myself, that (he) the Bashaw would make to me an acknowledgement in writing, that the Lieutenant Governor had been removed by orders from the Emperor, in consequence of having caused the difficulty between the two countries. Secondly, that the flag of the United States would be hoisted on Monday the 12th inst. and saluted with twenty-one guns from the town batteries; that I would then proceed to Gibralter as early as convenient, and return to Tangier in a United States vessel of war, when I would be saluted with a certain number of guns, and that an equal number be fired in return from the town batteries upon my landing; that the Moorish flag would then be hoisted at mast head on board said vessel of war, and saluted with twenty-one guns. All these terms have been fully granted, and certificates exchanged in writing, that they will be faithfully executed; and I have now to submit to you for your approbation, the course I have pursued. At the same time I have the honor to report to you, that the United States flag was hoisted, this day, on this Consalute, over a salute of twenty-one guns, accompanied by the flags of the respective Consuls resident here.

I will, with the earliest despatch possible, report to you the origin of the late difficulty, which grew out of a breach of etiquette on the part of my predecessor, Mr. Carr, which he ought to have observed; at the same time I have to inform the Department, I have received an acknowledgement from the Bashaw, that the Lieutenant Governor of Tangier was turned out of office, for having been the cause of disturbing the peace between the two countries; a copy of which document, with copies of my correspondence with the Bashaw, I will transmit to the Department with my next despatch. I am now about to proceed to Gibralter, to wait the arrival of a United States vessel of war, having reported to commodore Morgan that the United States flag has been hoisted this day, on this Consalute, with a request that he will despatch a vessel from the squadron, to receive me on board at Gibralter, and land me here to exchange the necessary salutes. I have the honor to remain,

Your most obedient and humble servant,
JNO. F. MULLOWNY.

Narrow Escape and Probable Loss of Life.—We learn from Capt. G. W. Taylor, who has for some days been engaged, by means of his submarine armor, in an attempt to raise the steamboat Erie, which was sunk about a month since off Point Huron, Lake St. Clair, that after encountering great inclemency of weather, and working for days surrounded by ice, they succeeded on Wednesday last, in raising the Erie to the top of the water. That about midnight he attempted with eight others, to cross on the ice to the shore, a distance of about two miles, but before they reached the land, the ice parted from the shore, and they found themselves rapidly drifting into the Lake. He immediately decided that their only hope was in returning if possible, to the boat, in which he was seconded by four of his companions, but the remaining three of the company persisted in their attempt to reach land, and had not been heard from so late as Friday evening. Capt. T. thinks they must have perished, as immediately on escaping on board the boat, the ice gave way and was broken to pieces by the waves. We did not learn their names.—Detroit Gaz.

India Rubber Boats.—A French gentleman tells us that he saw on the Seine an India rubber boat of 400 tons burthen! It was used for bringing down produce.—When unloaded, it was folded up and sent back in a wagon.—Jour. Com.

Employment of Convicts.—The report of the Commissioner (Ransom Cook Esq.) appointed under the law of the last session, with a view to a personal examination into the practicability of employing convicts in mining—was presented to the House on Saturday through Mr. Daly, and a large number ordered to be printed for the use of the Legislature, on motion of Mr. Pentz.

We have not had an opportunity of looking into the report, which is now in the hands of the printers to the House; but we learn from those who have examined it cursorily, that the results of the commissioner's examinations and inquiries are highly favorable to the change in the mode of employing convicts, with reference to which the inqury was ordered by the legislature. We understand that the Commissioners suggests the purchase of an iron mine in Clinton county, now in operation, and favorably located with reference to health, communication with the prisons and the market, and to materials for such buildings as the security and comfort of the convicts may require. We learn also that the Commissioner estimates that a gang of one hundred convicts might be immediately and profitably employed there—that temporary cells might be erected, from the peculiar stone quarry on the spot, at a trifling expense—and that ultimate accommodations for some five hundred men might be erected, and profitable employment given to the whole number—under an outlay of about $170,000 for the mine and the new cells.—Albany Argus.

A Smart Race.—On Tuesday last the delegate to Augusta of the Passamaquoddy tribe, on his way to this city took the Ellsworth stage and proceeded to the half way house, when it was discovered that he had no money to pay his fare, and he was informed that he could proceed in the stage no further. Just as the pole horses were being hitched to the stage, the Indian started on foot for a race to Bangor, which being perceived by the driver, he immediately started his team. The horses were driven with great violence, but the Indian was not overtaken until within a few rods of Penobscot bridge, and then the poll horses could only be made to lap a few feet past the Indian. In crossing the bridge the Indian gained so much that he reached the Kendnskeng bridge in advance of the stage.

The horses were in a foam of sweat and puffing badly, while the Indian was in a laughing mood, and sufficiently self-possessed to converse and joke upon the incident with good relish.

The distance run was strong fourteen miles, the time one hour and forty-five minutes, and the Indian had a bundle to lug. We intend to challenge Mr. Ellsworth to race with this Indian.—Bangor Whig.

The Course of Trade.—Our neighbor Draper has been selling, to-day, a cargo of cotton goods, the travels of which, in finding their way to market have been long and perilous. They were manufactured in Massachusetts, and sent to New York for a market. Here they were sold to the far West, in which direction they were shipped, by the way of New Orleans.—Thence they were transferred to one of the steamers of the mighty Mississippi.—Arriving at the confluence of the Missouri, the goods were sent up the latter river, more directly to the Rocky Mountains.—Having proceeded five hundred miles up the Missouri, the steamer was snagged and sunk. An agent of the underwriters was despatched thither, to look after the cargo; the cottons were recovered from the water; hung up to dry upon the trees and spread upon the prairies, repacked into bales, and sent back to New Orleans, and thence to New York for a market. Beat that who can.—Com. Adv.

The nearest guess we ever knew a man to make, was made by one who was tumbled bodily out of a second story window, and when picking himself up, "he rather guessed he wasn't wanted up there."

DIED.

In Petersburgh, on the 19th April, 1842, WM SCRIVENS, aged 83 years.

Brother Scrivens was one of those who lived in the day that tried men's souls, one who raised his voice and arm against the cruel oppression of a Tyrant and his Satelites, but the victories he helped achieve on the field of battle, were nought compared with his victory over sin. For fifty years he has been a member of the S. D. Baptist church here, and the holy flame of holy love was always burning in his heart. So habituated was he to prayer that oft would he when asleep commence praying with the greatest regularity; thus has he gone to his grave in peace. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

Instructress in the Primary Department.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec., followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

What is Economy?

RANDOLPH & DUNHAM, take pleasure in informing their customers, and the public generally, that they continue the Tailoring business, in the shop formerly occupied by S. M. House, over I. R. Cook's jewelry store, one door east of E. D. Jenck's store, in all its various branches, where they will be happy to wait on customers on the shortest notice. Thankful for the patronage already bestowed on this establishment, they would say, that all work entrusted to them shall be done up in a style not surpassed by any of the "Craft" in this "village or county;" and at prices that will suit their customers, and tend to that "Economy" which has been advertised to be the "road to wealth."—Cutting done at sight, and warranted to fit if properly made up. Finally, all work done at this Establishment will be warranted to fit or no sale.

S. F. RANDOLPH,
J. V. DUNHAM.

Take back the Cup.

BY JAMES MILLER.

Take back the cup! take back the cup!
Present it not to me
Away with the drink, the accursed drink,
Of the wretched debauchee!
Far be it from your social feast,
However bright and fair,
Far be it from your friendly guest.
For there is ruin there.

Take back the cup! take back the cup!
I scorn the treacherous thing.
Though tippling bards and epicures
Its thousand virtues sing.
Virtues! the red and swollen face;—
The loss of all that's dear;—
The honored brought to deep disgrace:—
These, these its virues are,

Take back the cup! take back the cup!
Though filled 'tis to the brim,
A thousand ills are lurking there,
Within its fatal rim;
"Look not upon the wine when bright,
Nor to its goblet cling,
For it doth as the serpent bite,
And as the adder sting."

Take back the cup! take back the cup!
I will not of it quaff,
It minds me as it gurgles forth,
Of mania's wild laugh.
Methinks I see upon time's wave
A mother wan and pale;
And hear beside a new made grave,
A loving sister's wail.

Take back the cup! take back the cup!
I hate the "flowing bowl,"
It dries the vital fountains up,
And murders e'en the soul.
Put serpents on the festive board,
And let them coil and roll,
Or death himself with unsheathed sword;
But not the madd'ning bowl.

NURSERY SKETCHES,

BY MRS. E. R. STEELE.

English Nurseries.

One of the most agreeable things which attract the attention of a stranger in the pleasant homes of England, is the docility of the children. Every one knows how much the comfort of a house depends upon these little creatures. When they command, instead of their parents, they are so many abbots of misrule, subverting all law, and carrying disorganizing measures, in spite of all opposition. In those English nurseries which I have visited, I have never seen this. There, the strictest discipline is enforced; the parents are acknowledged as holding authority over the children, and no question is made of their obedience. The father and mother, with their grandparents guardians, and elder relatives, are the 'power that be' to them, and are treated with a respect and deference charming to behold. As this respectful behavior and obedience to elders is habitual, and not only 'company behavior,' the visitors of the house are treated in the same deferential manner. I observed this in many mansions, and will give one instance of the manners of the children at a house where we had been invited to dine.

The guests had nearly all arrived, and were assembled in the drawing-room, when some of the elder children were brought in to be introduced to the strangers. I expected the exhibition, which I had too often beheld, of reluctant children dragged up to the visitor, urged on with a frequent admonition, "speak to the lady, child!—go up to her—kiss her—that's a dear—fie, I'm ashamed of you!" The child is then forced to me and I forced to kiss it, when it is dismissed with a reproof which brings a 'brawling torrent,' from her eyes, while the mother, as she shuts the door, observes, "'tis always thus. When you wish children to behave the best, they are sure to act their worst!"

With pleased surprise I beheld these children coming smilingly towards us, and after putting out their tiny hands to be shaken, or lips to be kissed by us, they performed the like to the remainder of the guests, and then took their seats in their corners and nooks, where they remained quietly gazing at or listening to the company. Their manners were easy, but not bold; there was no reluctance, but a gentle timidity, which heightened their bloom, and cast their pretty eyes upon the ground.—we descended to the dining-room, leaving the children alone. When the dinner was over, the cloth removed, and the dessert of wine and fruit set upon the board, they were once more brought to us. Places were eagerly made for them among us, and there they stood quietly answering our questions, looking upon the good things before them, but not presuming to ask for or to touch any. The mother, after waiting awhile, said to the eldest, "Will you take a piece of this pine, Maria?" "Yes, mama, if you please," she answered sweetly. The father then, addressed his boy near him, asked him what he should like. "An apricot, please, papa." After each had received a share of the fruit, and each had drank the company's health in a glass of wine, they were all dismissed to their nurseries, except the eldest, who returned with us to the drawing-room, where she entertained us with some airs upon the piano, which she did without manifesting any reluctance, when she also retired.

I must digress a little here to speak of this custom of giving children wine to drink. Setting the temperance question aside, it is a habit to be much deprecated. Wine, if used at all, should be reserved as a cordial for the sick or the old. The weak stomach may require it, or the custom long used may be dangerous to the health if suddenly abandoned; but to allow children the habitual use of the wine-cup, is, to say the least of it, injurious to them. Its nature is exciting, and invigorating, and the rapid pulse of a child needs no stimulating, its young freshness needs no renewing draft. The English people generally make the etiquette of the table such a point in their menage, that not to drink wine at dinner, or not to take certain wines with certain courses, is as heathenish and ungenteel as if one ate fish after meat, or used steel forks instead of silver. Hence the slow progress of the temperance cause among them.

One instance of great forbearance and discipline in another family, and I will give place to more agreeable contributors.

We were staying with a friend on a farm in a remote part of the country, where primititive customs still remain—among others, that of dining at an earlier hour than is customary in cities. Consequently tea was a matter of more importance, and for the first time since we had left America, we saw a table spread with cakes and sweets, as with us. As we were not to be 'made strangers of,' the children were allowed to take their seats around the board as usual. How often upon such occasions I have seen the children stuffed with these dainties, which after hours of headache they had been obliged the next day to reject from their little overloaded stomachs. Here, there was nothing of this. A pitcher of rich fresh milk, and a plate of brown bread stood before them, from which they made their suppers; while their stout healthy forms, and the smiles of good humor which lighted up their rosy cheeks, told the success of the system upon which they had been reared. They had been taught that the sweets around them were injurious to them, and that they were only placed there for their elders. Their mother, they knew, would give them a share if she thought proper, and they quietly awaited her pleasure. They were not however to be entirely deprived of the good things before them. After Louisa had been asked if she would like a piece of cake, and had answered "yes, please, mama," and the others had said "thank you, mama," they each received a small portion of sweets, and retired joyous and contented with their share.

After my return I related this to an A-american mother, who was indignant that children should be treated so harshly.—"For her part," she said, "she should never wish to withhold anything from her children which she had on her table."—What! are children with their delicate organization to be fed with the same con-concentrated and varied food as their elders? Must they be brought up to believe every whim should be gratified! What harm is it if a child is called upon to exercise self-denial, to 'bear the yoke in his youth'—is it not better thus, when enjoined by affection, and rewarded by the approval of those they love, than to have these lessons forced upon them by the cold world's teaching? Alas! how much of the sorrow and trials of life are caused by the fondness of an injudicious mother!

The great deference to superiors exhibited by the children of England, is to be attributed in some measure to the government of the country. Society is arranged in classes, and each one sees another above him which he cannot enter, and which he does not strive to enter. The people are educated to believe all are not equal, and each class is taught deference to the class above,—and the highest looks to one still superior to him in the sovereign, who is above all. A habit of reverence for those in authority is thus acquired and is no doubt carried in their institutions to excess. We, on the contrary, err upon the opposite side. Liberty, equality, independence, are delightful things, and in fact are essential to our happiness. Still, when independence degenerate to rudeness, and the 'sturdy little republican' is applauded for insolence to superiors; and when respectful attention is refused lest it be an acknowledgement of inferiority, the principles of our institutions are mistaken, and we are doing ourselves an injury in the eyes of our neighbors. Let us then teach our little republicans that civility is not servility, and that respectful behavior is not incompatible with freedom.

TOUCHING INCIDENT.—There is a farmer residing near "the gap" of the Blue mountains in this State, who had been for many years an intemperate man. Some months ago, he was induced to sign the total abstinence pledge, and in a very short time afterwards he united himself with the Methodist church. The rumseller and his dependents were sorely dismayed at this "extraordinary change," as they termed it, and set their wits to work to lure him back. The time of harvest having arrived, and the farmer having many acres of wheat to be cut, the rumites assembled, with their cradles in their hands, and demanded their accustomed allowance of rum. "Not a drop shall be given," firmly replied the farmer.—"We will not cut your wheat without it," said the rumites. "Then it shall rot in the field," replied the farmer. The faithful followers of alcohol now returned to their respective homes, (if homes they can be called) and left the "obstinate farmer" to his fate. His wheat had begun "to fall in the stubble" yet he placed his reliance in God, and having commended himself to his Maker, he retired to his rest. Early in the morning he was awakened from his slumber by a shout which seemed to speak the very soul of joy. He looked out and beheld a large number of men, with cradles in their hands, the foremost bearing a broad banner with the words, "Total Abstinence," inscribed upon its ample folds. "What can all this mean?" said the farmer, gazing with astonishment upon a scene which seemed rather the work of magic than reality. "Isn't there a teetolar somewhere about these parts, who has a field of grain to be cut?" inquired one of the crowd. "Yes," replied the farmer, "I am he." "Well, we've come to cut it," was the short response. The farmer hurried down to greet his kind-hearted visiters, who having heard of the circumstance, had traveled many miles to give him a "helping hand." He pointed to the field—the banner was erected in its midst—the men worked like good teetolars, and in a few hours, the farmer's crop was saved!—Thus doth God protect his obedient children, who in firmness of faith obey his word, and trust in his great name.—Temperance Advocate.

From Alison's History of the French Revolution.

WASHINGTON.

Modern history has not so spotless a character to commemorate. Invincible in resolution, firm in conduct, incorruptible in integrity, he brought to the helm of a victorious republic, the simplicity and innocence of rural life; he was forced into greatness by circumstances, rather than led into it by inclination, and prevailed over his enemies rather by the wisdom of his designs, and the perseverence of his character, than any extraordinary genius for the art of war. A soldier from necessity and patriotism, rather than disposition, he was the first to recommend pacific councils when the independence of country was secured; and bequeathed to his countrymen an address on leaving the government, to which there is no composition of uninspired wisdom which can bear a comparison.

He was modest without diffidence, sento the voice of fame, without vanity;—independent and dignified, without eitheir asperity or pride. He was a friend to liberty, but not to licentiousness; not to the dreams of enthusiasts, but to those practical ideas which America inherited from her English descent, and which were opposed to nothing so much as to the extravagant love of power in the French Democracy. Accordingly, after having signalized his life by successful resistance to English oppression, he closed it by the warmest advice to cultivate the friendship of Great Britain; and by his casting vote, shortly before his resignation, ratified a treaty of friendly and commercial intercourse, between the mother country and its emancipated offspring. He was a Cromwell, without his ambition; a Sylla, without his crimes; and, after having raised his country by his exertions, to the rank of an independent state, closed his career by a voluntary relinquishment of the power which a grateful people had bestowed. It is the highest glory of England to have given birth, even amidst transantlantic winds, to such a man; and, if she cannot remember him among those who have extended her provinces or augmented her dominions, she may at least feel a legitimate pride in the victories which he achieved; and the great qualities which he exhibited in the contest with herself; and indulge with satisfaction in the reflection, that vast empire which neither the ambition of Louis XIV. nor the power of Napolean could not dismember, received its first rude shock from the courage which she had communicated to her offspring; and that amidst the convulsions and revolutions of other States, real liberty has arisen in that country alone, which inherited in its veins the true principles of British freedom.

A WORD FOR BOOK BORROWERS.—Those who have collected books, and whose good nature has prompted them to accommodate their friends with them, will feel the sting of an answer which a man of wit made to one who lamented the difficulty which he found in persuading his friends to return the volumes which he had lent them—"Sir," said he, "your acquaintances find, I suppose, that it is much more easy to retain the books themselves than what is contained in them." I would just observe here that nothing can be more mean and unkind than to borrow books of persons, and to lose them as is frequently the case. If my friend gratifies my request in lending—if by so doing, he saves me the expense of purchasing—or if, also, by the loan, I gain considerable information or intellectual profit—it is base and ungrateful either to suffer the book to be injured, or not to return it. I give this as a hint to some who are more in the habit of borrowing than returning books.—Buck's Anecdotes.

IRISH GALLANTRY AND WIT.—We clip the following from the Providence Chronicle, the Editor of which paper clipped it from an exchange. "A few days since a sudden gust of wind took a parasol from the hands of its owner; and before one had a chance to recollect whether it would be etiquette to catch the parasol of a lady to whom he had never been introduced, a lively Emeralder dropped his hod of bricks, caught the parachute in the midst of its Elssler gyrations, and presented it to the loser with a low bow, which reminded us of poor Power. "Faith, Ma'am said he," as he did so, "if you were as strong as you are handsome, it would'nt have got away from you."

"Which shall I thank you for first, the service or the compliment?" asked the lady smiling.

"Troth, ma'am," said Pat, again touching the place where once stood the brim of what was once a beaver, "that look of your beautiful eye thanked me for both!"

SUNDAY SCHOOL ANECDOTE.—A SWEARER REPROVED.—Some little boys were playing at marbles on the village green.—One of them irritated, by losing the game, swore and used ill language, upon which the winner answered mildly, "Why do you swear and take God's name in vain? I will rather give you back your marbles again that you should go on so." "What then do you say when you lose?" rejoined the other, "for my part I am so vexed that I cannot help swearing. "How wicked," remarked the first, "you never hear me swear, for I go to Sunday School every Sunday, and have learned that swearing is sin. If you knew how angry God is with you whenever you take his name in vain, you would soon leave it off."—Christian Watchman.

PHILOSOPHY OF HEAT.—"Well, my little fellow," said a certain Principal to a juvenile philosopher, whose mamma had been teasing the learned Knight to test the astonishing abilities of her boy.—"what are the properties of heat?" "The chief property of heat is, that it expands bodies, while cold contracts them."—"Very good, indeed—can you give me a familiar example?" "Yes, sir; in summer, when it is hot the days are long and in winter when it is cold, they become short." The learned Knight stopped his examination, and was lost in amazement that so familiar an instance should have so long escaped his own observation.—English paper.

HOW TO DO IT.—"What a pretty little child that is," said the schoolmaster to Mrs. ——. 'Its countenance is so expressive. Why, madam, how very much it looks like you!" Our schoolmaster said he never had a better boarding place after that.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

To Families and Invalids.

THE following indispensable family remedies may be found at the village drug stores, and soon at every country store in the state. Remember and never get them unless they have the fac simile signature of Comstock & Co. on the wrappers, as all others by the same names are base impositions and counterfeits. If the merchant nearest you has them not, urge him to procure them at 71 Maiden-lane, the next time he visits New York, or to write for them. No family should be a week without these remedies

RHEUMATISM AND LAMENESS

Cost of preparing the work, $5000. This beautiful and important work contains upwards of 500 pages royal octavo, is printed from new stereotype plates, handsomely bound in gilt, and lettered, and retails readily at the low price of $2 50 per volume. The following extract is from a lengthy Review, written by the Rev. W. C Brownlee, D. D., and is only one out of several hundred recommendations, from the clergy and the press, that the work has already received.

New-York, August 6, 1842.

"This is, beyond question, one of the most elegant books ever presented to our fellow citizens in this Republic. It ought to be in every Christian family for its innate value; and in every patriotic family as a splendid specimen of our progress in domestic manufactures, and the advancement of our artists and manufacturers in their rivalship with those of Europe. W. C. BROWNLEE."

A very liberal offer!—One Hundred Dollars will be given by the Publisher to every Agent who will undertake and sell One Hundred Copies of the above Work. He believes that there is scarcely a town or village in the Union, but that numbers may easily be disposed of.

⁂ Persons inclosing money, will be careful to pay the whole postage; and in ordering books will state, explicitly, how the books shall be sent to them

Also, in press, another important, valuable, and cheap work, in the course of publication, and will be ready for delivery early in October, 1842, complete in one volume royal octavo, containing about 600 pages of letter-press, and more than five hundred Engravings, elegantly bound in gilt; price only $2 50 per copy.

Original Papers.

For the Register.

BR. BAILEY,—Some six months since I proposed some few queries in your paper like the following, "Is it consistent for a S. D. B. Minister to baptize one with whom he will not commune? one who connects himself with no church? or one who keeps not the Sabbath?" Not having the files of your paper I may have varied the wording a little now, but I have given the substance I believe, and for this reason I may not answer my respondent, Eld. Eli S. Bailey, as correctly as I otherwise might. My reason for not sooner replying, is, Eld. J. G. requested the privilege of responding, but having long waited, I shall endeavor to maintain the negative of my "string of queries."

For the sake of rarifying the "fog" which some may raise, I remark, that as some place the "laying on of hands" between baptism and communion, together with the "right hand of fellowship," I shall only say that I cannot find one single text of scripture to maintain such a view, and however proper it may be to practice imposition of hands, yet I believe it would puzzle even a sprinkling minister to prove that it stands between baptism and communion. I am not now denying the propriety of the practice, but the place which has been assigned to it in the church. Query. Why practice imposition of hands and not wash feet?

That the Apostles practiced "imposition of hands," I admit, but that they placed it between baptism and communion, or by it, consider it to be even a necessary requisite to communion, or that it was the initiating act to the visible church, I call upon my opponent to prove. It cannot be proved from Acts viii. 19, but that those individuals upon whose head hands were laid, had participated in the communion once and again. Hands were laid on some time previous to baptism. See Acts ix. 17, 18. These remarks seemed necessary to clear away all fog so that we might enjoy a transparent atmosphere.

To proceed, then. By the unanimous consent of all Christian denominations, (except one, I believe,) baptism is a prerequisite to communion, so that as Dr. Woll said, "Among all the absurdities ever practiced, none ever heard of this, viz: That of admitting persons to the communion without previous baptism," so that I agree that baptism is a prerequisite to communion. This being the case, may I not inquire if all baptized persons have not a right to participate in the communion. If baptism be the only prerequisite to communion which the bible recognizes, then all baptized persons have a right to the communion. And that all baptized persons have a right to commune, is evident from Acts ii. 41, 42, where those who were baptized continued in "fellowship and breaking of bread." Baptism then appears to be the only thing required by the bible to be done between repentance and communion, for it is certain that "imposition of hands" oft preceded baptism, and that it was not the initiating act to the communion, is evident from the fact that it was often practiced several times upon the same individual. Compare Acts viii. 13 with Acts xiii. 3. Thus we see that "laying on of hands" has no connection with communion, and he that undertakes to prove that the giving of the right hand of fellowship is of divine authority, or even an apostolic practice as an initiating act into the visible church, will find as Herculean a task as to find infant sprinkling or first day Sabbath. Thus we see that baptism is the public initiatory and consecrating act which introduces a person into, and recognizes him a member of Christ's visible church. Consequently it is altogether inconsistent (if not unscriptural,) for an administrator to perform the public initiating act upon one with whom he cannot or will not walk after they are admitted, or in other words, will not commune. For a minister to hang the badge of discipleship upon one whom he cannot recognize as such, must be inconsistent practice. But my opponent may say, "that baptism and communion are two things quite different." So they are. But who dare perform the solemn right of baptism on one who refuses to obey the dying command of his Savior, "do this in remembrance of me"? Men are to be taught previous to baptism, and it requires but little teaching to show that the command for being baptized is no more obligatory than partaking of the Lord's supper. And for one I should seriously hesitate about performing the solemn ordinance of baptism upon any one who refuse obedience to Christ's command. If obedience be not an evidence of repentance and faith, what is?—and if obedience be wanting, what else can be? And that candidate who can disobey the dying command of his Savior, lacks an important qualification for baptism, and one that ought to preclude him from it.

It is the want of implicit obedience to the authority of God that has divided the church of God into so many fragments.—Let men but bow to God and yield submission to his commands, and to morrow's sun would witness, "one Lord, one faith, one baptism." Heaven would keep a jubilee, and hell filled with despair, and devils gnaw their tongues in hopeless disappointment of any farther increase of their number. Therefore it seems to be very inconsistent for one to baptize another, and then not let him have a seat with him at the Lord's table. Christ himself has defined the prerequisites for both baptism and communion, and who shall disannul them? or who shall sunder what he has joined together? I think I have fully shown that it is inconsistent with the principle of bible truth, church organization, and admission into Christ's visible church, for a minister to baptize one with whom he cannot commune, or who refuses to acknowledge himself a member of Christ's visible church, and therefore refuse obedience to the laws and ordinances of Christ's house. Thus the two first of my "string of queries," I have endeavored to answer negatively.

I now proceed to the other, viz: Is it consistent or right for us as Sabbath keeping ministers to baptize a Sabbath breaker? It would seem as if there could be but one answer to the above, if we were only fully persuaded which the Sabbath day was of the seven. If my opponent has a query about it in his own mind, I would say, that, perhaps, he might baptize one who did not keep the seventh day. But if I have not misunderstood him, he fully believes that the seventh day is the Sabbath. Now, Br., it is or it is not. There can be no medium between, can there? If the seventh day is the Sabbath, IT IS. If it is not, it is not. Just say which. I know my Br. will say the seventh day is the Sabbath. Now, then, all we have to do to answer the above question is, to find out what is a prerequisite of baptism. The bible says, "repentance and faith." What is repentance? Is it not sorrow for the past and reformation for the future? Of what are we to repent? Of disobedience of God's commandments? Now, I ask, can that be gospel repentance which only repents of some acts of disobedience, while it does not of all? I thought Paul said, "if we disobeyed one command we were guilty of all." Was Paul mistaken? I trow not. But my opponent will say I must allow every man to enjoy his own opinion about the Sabbath. Very well. Why not allow every man to enjoy his own opinion about the mode of baptism? Consistency is a rare jewel. Can Br. B. spare one? But Br. Bailey will say, let us go together as far as we agree. Well, how far do you and your candidate for baptism agree? Only to the second verse of the second chapter of Genesis. For third there says that the seventh day is the Sabbath, while you and he begins there to disagree. Why not begin to agree here before you come to baptism? If you cannot agree upon the meaning of such a plain passage as that, how can you agree to go down into the water together? This reminds me of the boy who began at the back end of the arithmetic to learn to cypher ere he understood Addition. I am well aware that in reading Hebrew we begin at the back side, but I was taught in reading English books to commence on the first page. This reading the bible backwards is the great cause of disagreement among Protestants. Would my Br. baptize one who denied the facts contained in the first chapter of Genesis? Certainly not. Why, then, one who disbelieves a plain important fact narrated in the second? I pause for a reply. I say, then, let us go together as far as we agree, even if it be to the first verse of the first chapter of Genesis, "for how can two walk together except they be agreed," and what kind of agreement is that when two go down into the water disagreeing whether seventh day is not first day, unless it be agreed while in the water to bury all former disagreeings between them.

I now wish to ask, how much better is it to baptize a Sabbath breaker than to sprinkle a Sabbath keeper? No fog Br. about this "string of queries" is there? If you grant to one the right of opinion, why not the other? Why reject the sprinkled Sabbath keeper and admit the baptized Sabbath breaker in our creed? Which, think you, is the greatest sin of the two, to violate God's Sabbath where we have a plain and positive command, or to change the mode of baptism? Shall I ever hear any more from my opponent about Sunday folks deciding upon the comparative magnitude of creation and redemption, while he sits umpire upon a question of perhaps greater importance?

I, therefore, am of the opinion that it is inconsistent for a believer in the Sabbath to perform so solemn an act as baptism upon one who habitually violates it. It lowers down the Sabbath to a mere nothing, one of the non-essentials, and goes far to lead the people to suppose that our regard for the Sabbath is a mere superstitious tradition of Jewish extraction, and of but little consequence in the sight of God, and that our blessed Redeemer makes no difference between those who keep and those who do not keep his commandment. Thus we destroy one of the best evidences of our adoption, for Christ says, "if ye love me, keep my commandments"; but we say by our practice "only a part of them," that will answer well enough for baptism; keep the rest when "you get ready." That we may all be guided into truth is the prayer of SHERMAN S. GRISWOLD.

THE LIBERTINE'S CODE OF MORALS.

NO. II.

4. The Seducer must be treated with the utmost tenderness, especially by the most virtuous part of society, lest he become reckless of his character and hopelessly corrupt.

It is, I well know, a fearful thing to lose one's character, and the conscious self-respect which pertains to it; worse yet to deserve the loss. It is a horrible evil to a young man; why is it less so to a young woman? Let justice look on both sides.

Again, if it is horrible to be expelled from public confidence, it is ten-fold more horrible to retain that confidence, and constantly use it for the seduction and ruin of unsuspecting innocence!

We come then to the only just and wise conclusion—treat well those who will repent and reform. Let tenderness be freely bestowed upon those who will cease to lay desolate the fairest hopes and the purest bliss of virtuous families. Here let mercy "know its appointed bound." The infinite compassion of Jehovah goes no farther.

The plea "lest he become hopelessly corrupt," is sometimes, perhaps often, urged in behalf of those whose hearts are already rotten to the very core. Sincerely, therefore, as I should love to restore the truly penitent, I should not love to warm the stiffened viper into life in my bosom. How many bosoms have bled incurably from wounds thus given.

Reclaimed rakes, say some mothers to their daughters, make good husbands.—Those daughters become weeping wives, and mothers of broken families. Not always so perhaps, but often, quite too often for the trustworthiness of the libertine maxim which the short-sighted mother took up.

5. The code in question maintains that the seducer proves himself worthy of the first society of either sex; but that the seduced are unworthy of even the lowest.

That young man who makes conquests (so runs the doctrine) is no clown or fool. He is accomplished and winning; looks benevolent. What better proof of his high claims than his success in captivating and vanquishing in spite of almost any resistance?

Wherever the sentiment will carry, you will find it put forward; badges of victory are the index of his noble qualities—the ensigns of his glory. Who should stand first in refined society if not he?

But where are those once virtuous ladies who stood on his level in public esteem?—No longer to be named in the circle where he moved. His own hand seized them and hurled them down ten thousand fathoms deep, never to rise again. This act, according to the code, is not his guilt but his glory.

And this is a doctrine in morals for the good government of Christian society in a Christian land!

6. Filthy prints, licentious tales, and indecent scenic exhibitions, are every way tolerable, and worthy of covert, if not of open patronage; but moral reform papers, expositions of the evils of licentiousness, and especially a fearless intelligible exhibition of God's truth on this subject from the pulpit, are horribly and insufferably polluting.

Here we have another principle which emanates from that most benevolent regard which the libertine feels for the good of society! No men so sensitive to the touch of moral pollution as they! No ears are so refined and so quick to detect and repel an improper allusion as theirs! Men who live day and night in the atmosphere of pollution, and whose imaginations are saturated with its effluvia, should doubtless be the conservators of the public purity.

That they should be thrown into sore trouble by any intelligible and righteous discussion of this subject is no matter of wonder. The remark long since fell from the lips of consummate wisdom; 'Every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved.' Rebuke is scorching where conscience seconds all its stern appeals.

A still more prevalent reason may be given; for unfortunately the libertine's course rarely leaves him much conscience. His code of morals is in danger. It would not be safe to let this be exposed to the light. The touch of divine truth upon it, or even of unperverted reason, would wither it, like the east wind on Jonah's gourd. Once withered, and the rising sun of a just public indignation would scorch them till they might well say,—'let me die, for it is better for me to die than to live.'

I pity the man whose imagination is so active and prolific in impure associations than even if now virtuously inclined, he cannot safely hear a decent allusion to the seventh commandment. There may be such, and from them may emanate some of the opposition which the advocates of moral reform experience. They deserve our pity. Let them have it. Yet we hope they do not constitute the majority in any respectable society. Therefore they ought not to control the desired action in behalf of virtue. We must not forbear to warn the pure-minded and pour light on their path, because there are some eyes too weak to bear the light.

We now have the leading points of the libertine's code of morals before us. It has been in active operation throughout extensive portions of our land for many years. It has yielded prolific and rapidly recurring harvests of legitimate results.—Blasted innocence; wrecked character; ruined peace; unavailing tears, and "woe too wide to see beyond"—these have been ever accruing to attest the legitimate influence of this code. Success too for the libertine; allurements for young men to enter that career, so strong as to sweep into the current no small portion of the flower of our cities and chief villages; these things combine to show what we may expect from such a code of morals.

Shall it become universal, and sway the sentiment of this nation? This is now the practical question. Shall the pulpit, the Christian press, and the legislators of a Christian land give it their tacit assent?—Then the measure is carried, the code becomes universal law, and the sexton may dig the grave of our country's virtue. He may toll the knell of her rising hopes.—That society whose social maxims are imposed by libertines is morally dead already; physically its population is destined soon to rot, and (thank heaven) leave no posterity behind them. A few years more (as says the voice of recent history)—a few years more with the libertine's practical code and without the gospel, and the Sandwich Islands had been depopulated. If in this Union the country population were as vicious as a portion of the city population are, and if all together were to throw off the divine code and take the libertine's, the coming generations of this race were easily numbered.

And this physical ruin is only a shadow of that substantial, solid desolation which this code must bring over our social and moral well-being.

What shall be done? This evil, let alone by true moralists and Christians, has not cured itself nor shown any tendency towards a cure.

Every symptom under this treatment has waxed worse. So it ever will. While we sleep the enemy sows tares. Let the pulpit and the Christian press consent to be muzzled on this subject, and no power will arrest the onward career of licentiousness. It has entrenched itself in the high places of our land; the great centres of social influence are falling under its power; the public sentiment of a portion of the ostensibly virtuous community is adapting itself to the libertine's code; a thousand tendencies are ripening towards a general consummation, which, unarrested, must be the moral pollution of a whole people.

THE FICKLE GIRL.

'Well, I do love Ann Nichols, that I do!' cried little Fanny West to her mother, 'she is such a good tempered girl; I'm sure I like her better than any body in the world, except you. Yes, and I shall always love her, always, as long as I live.'

'I am glad to hear it,' said her mother; 'Ann is a good girl, and I hope you may indeed continue to love her, and never give her pain by slighting her.'

Fanny colored. 'I am sure I shall always feel for her what I do now, quite sure,' returned she, 'and I am certain that I shall never give her pain. I know what you mean; but I never had such a nice, kind friend before, as Ann. No, I am positive that I shall never change.'

Her mother made no reply, she looked indeed as if she could have said something, but she continued to pursue her work in silence, and Fanny, though much nettled at the hint which had been thrown out, and longing to repeat her assurance of never changing her sentiments, had no other resource than to follow her example. No sooner, however, did she see Ann, than she repeated the conversation which had passed between herself and her mother.

'And will you change?' asked Ann. 'If I thought you would, I should be so unhappy.'

'Dear, no,' said Fanny; 'I'm sure I never shall, you are such a darling, nice girl, and those others that mother meant, were such queer ones, they were not worth keeping; and besides, I never loved them.'

'Then why did you ever choose them?' asked Ann.

Fanny was puzzled how to answer this question. Oh! because—because I, that is, they—but what does it signify why?' said she, 'they chose me, and you know one can't help people choosing us for friends, can we?'

'No,' replied Ann, and she sighed. 'But it is not pleasant to be thrown off, and for a new friend too. When I love any body, I like to love them always the same.'

'Oh! so do I,' cried Fanny, 'and I always should have done, if every body was like you; but that they are not, and never will be; and if others change, you know one must change too. But don't let us talk of this. You never will be any thing but what you are now, and I shall always love you just as I do now.'

About a month after this, Fanny's aunt, who was a respectable tradesman's wife in a neighboring town, came with her daughter, who was a little older than herself, on a visit to her mother. As she was unwilling to be at more expense to her sister than she could avoid, and was yet unwilling to wound her by any seeming superiority, she brought with her a very pretty new frock, exactly like her own child's, as a present to Fanny. Sunday came, and oh! who was so delighted as Fanny? who had such a kind, good aunt as she, or such a pretty, agreeable cousin as herself? The two sisters walked first to church; the two little girls followed. Fanny saw not the ground on which she trod, so high did she hold her head, but she contrived, nevertheless, to notice every one whom she passed, and she secretly hoped that she too was seen. Her cousin had a smarter appearance altogether than herself, and she was not a little flattered at walking by her side, or at its being known that she possessed such a relation.

As they turned the corner of a street, she unexpectedly saw Ann Nichols standing at the door of her grandmother's cottage, waiting to walk with her to church. Ann nodded to her, and smiled brightly and affectionately, but strange to say, Fanny's memory seemed suddenly to have received an injury, for she scarcely recognized her, and barely returning her salutation, she began a fresh conversation with her cousin, then holding her head still more erect, she walked on without staying to take any further notice of her.

The whole of the day she was full of her frock and of her cousin's agreeable qualities; she thought no more of Ann, or of the look of mortified affection that followed the slight she had shown her. Perhaps, indeed, this had escaped her, so fully was she occupied with her own appearance and with her cousin; be that as it may, there was no remembrance left of the circumstance in her own mind, and Fanny had thought for no one till the departure of her cousin two days after.

'How dull I am,' exclaimed she on the evening of that day. 'I shall go and look for Ann,' and off she set with all speed.—Ann was at home, but how altered, she showed no pleasure at seeing her, nor once attempted to interrupt Fanny's continued prattle, or to reply to her repeated expressions of pleasure at seeing her. 'Why, what's the matter?' said Fanny, at last, 'what's come to you, Ann?'

'The truth,' replied the little girl, 'and a painful truth it is. O Fanny! how I loved you, and how truly would I have loved you always! but you love a new frock and a new friend better than me, and you must keep them, for my friend must be like myself, one who will not be ashamed of me in any company, nor desert me for another who has no other merit than being known the last.'

From the Boston Quarterly Review.

NOVEL READING AND REALITY.

It is never good to excite the mind or the head overmuch, save when it can find immediate vent in actions which concern real life. A confirmed novel reader is always morbid; on some sides preternaturally sensitive, on others preternaturally callous; capable, it may be, of talking much fine sentiment, but wanting in that spiritual strength, in that moral robustness, which is equal to the performance of a useful but difficult part in real life. The less fine sentiment we have on our lips, the more genuine feelings shall we have in our hearts; and the more noble and generous actions shall we perform. He who stoops to sentimentalize about poverty, will be the last to throw his cloak over the tattered garbidine of the beggar.

This is no doubt all very antiquated, and all together old-fashioned. But we hope our young friends, seated on rich ottomans, or reclining on soft couches, with the last new novel still moist from the press, will forgive this our antediluvianism. It is with no vinegar visage, nor pietistic cant, that we tell them to throw that novel aside, to rouse themselves from their indolence, and go forth and devote the sensibilities of their hearts, the richness of their fancies, and the creativeness of their imaginations, to the great and noble work of revealing actual distress, and of up-building the cause of truth and righteousness on earth. O, my young friends, there is not such an overplus of generous sentiment, of warm and noble feeling, in this cold wintry world of ours, that you have any to waste over a Paul Clifford, or a Jack Sheppard. No; go forth into real life, and let your sensibilities flow out for the actually poor and wretched; let the tear, so lovely in the eye of beauty, start at no fictitious woe. That poor mother, by her dying boy in that poor hovel, needs it; those poor children, ragged, incrusted with filth, growing up to fill your penitentiaries, need it; the wrongs and outrages man is every where inflicting upon man, should call it forth. Throw away the last new novel; go with me through the dark lanes, blind courts, into these damp cellars unfinished garrets, where poverty, vice, and crime are crowded together, layer upon layer, where breeds the corruption that pollutes our whole atmosphere. Here my friends is a volume that may excite you; here is a work that you may read. Forget your luxury; forget your luxurious ease; blush for your repinings, your sentimental whimperings, your vapors and indigestion; and remember that you are men and women, and that it is your business to make this earth a paradise, and every human heart a meet temple for the living God. Decidedly my young friends, you have no occasion to seek excitement in Jack Sheppard, or in Ernest Maltravers; decidedly you have no time to kill between dinner and the hour to dress for the evening lecture, the evening meeting, the theatre, or the assembly. No; you have duties, high and solemn duties, and no fine sentiment, no ability to talk sweetly and pathetically of the last new novel, will weigh one feather in your favor, if you are not true to duty in earnest to silence the groans of this nether world, and to deliver the whole creation into the glorious "liberty of the sons of God."

Religious Department.

REVERENCE THE SCRIPTURES.—It is always painful to us to hear allusions of levity to the word of God, although they may not amount to coarse profanity. Such allusions are dishonoring to God and dangerous to the souls of men. Luther said, 'Whom God would destroy, he permits to trifle with Scripture.' Indeed such things very dreadfully harden the heart. A good practical writer says:

"It is of the greatest importance that we should resist the temptation, frequently so strong, of [illegible] idea to a scriptural usage, a scriptural expression, a scriptural text, or a scriptural name. Nor should we hold ourselves guiltless, though we have been misled by mere negligence. Every person of good taste will avoid reading a parody of a beautiful poem, because the recollection of the degraded likeness will always obtrude itself upon our memories, when we wish to derive pleasure from the contemplation of the elegance of the original. But how much more urgent is the duty by which we are bound to keep the pages of the Bible clear of any impression tending to diminish the blessing of habitual respect and reverence to our Maker's law."

THE CHRISTIAN'S WORK.—The proper work of Christians is the extension of Christianity; the adding to the cloud witnesses; the diminution of the sons of darkness; the accession of gems to the Redeemer's Crown. It is to be imbued with holy, untiring anxieties to rescue beings like themselves from going down to the pit; and, because time is short, to devote every power, to consecrate every talent, devise every means, employ every resource, to "save souls from death,"—constantly to remember, that men are always perishing; that, therefore, we should be always laboring; that the season for activity is circumscribed—and that, ere long, the night will come—it is coming—when our tongues shall be silent, our hands motionless, and our hearts pulseless:—'For there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest."
—John Adey.

THOUGHTS FOR THE AFFLICTED.—My afflictions are fewer than my sins, and lighter than my deserts.

My afflictions are as much the fruit of God's love as any of the bounties of his providence.

It gives no pleasure to God to see me suffer. "He doth not afflict willingly." If I am in heaviness there is a need for it.

Better people than I have had as sore trials, yet uttered no complaint.

Some things in the work of sanctification cannot ordinarily be obtained without sorrow.

If I know nothing of the pains of earth, I shall hardly be well prepared for the joys of heaven.

No one now in heaven regrets having gone there through great tribulation.

"That temper and conduct which is called "spirited," in asserting our rights, and maintaining our consequence, is as unwise and unpolitic as it is unchristian like.—Nothing forms so truly great and dignified a character as the meekness and gentleness of Christ."

Never trifle with a child or speak beseechingly to it, when it is doing an improper thing, or when watching an opportunity to do so.

"Open rebuke is better than secret love."

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, February 23, 1843.

Close of the Volume.

The present No. closes the 3d Vol. of the Register, and with it our labor is sealed for the Judgment. We are not ignorant of the fact, that those labors have been very imperfect; and it is very possible that we have gone through the year with accomplishing less good than might be expected from the station we hold, and we cannot let this opportunity pass without asking that we may not be regarded as altogether culpable for all the defects that may have appeared.—A retrospect of the year suggests to us, that had we been more untiring and diligent, much more might have been accomplished; and while we ask the indulgence of our readers on this account, we also hope that some good has been accomplished, and most ardently desire that whatever has been sown in weakness may be raised in power. Our aim has been to elevate the standard of piety, and create a greater relish for the truth on the part of christians, and vindicate the neglected and down trodden law of God. We have not been insensible to the necessity of imparting right instruction to youthful minds.

During the year we have had the happiness of recording the wonderful dealings of God, in the conversion of many from sin, and several from the errors that have come into the church in the dark ages. Among whom have been more than half-a-dozen ministers of the gospel. The Sabbath has occupied an unusual share of attention, and more has been accomplished in a reform on this subject than during any previous year. There remains yet much to be done, and we trust the coming year will tell more for this subject than has yet been told. We shall have an eye to this labor; and more especially because there is no other paper that advocates the Sabbath of the Lord God. Neither is there an Editor to be found who is willing that his paper should be the medium of shedding forth the whole light of the Sabbath. The charge is hard, but true, and we pray God to give Editors, as all other men, such love for him and his truth that they will be willing to receive and practice it themselves while they teach it to others.

We trust we shall be pardoned for alluding to our pecuniary affairs, as this more than all other causes has embarrassed our operations. At the commencement of the year we fixed the terms of the paper at $2 in advance, hoping that as the sum was so small that all of our subscribers would meet it promptly, it being less than the average price of religious papers of the same size. On the two former vols. there was due about $1,500. On the present vol. only about one third have paid; so that now we have about $3,000 due on subscription for the Register. Any one can see that we must necessarily be somewhat straitened to meet our engagements. Owing to the small proportion paid, our bills have grown quite too large with printers and paper makers. It is not hard therefore to see that the embarrassment in pecuniary matters must of necessity in a great measure unfit us for Editorial labors. We anticipate for the year to come to devote more of our own time to editing, or obtain the services of some other one. Promptness on the part of our patrons will so relieve us as to render our labor pleasant to us, and profitable to them.

We have during the last two years issued 1,200 papers, and our subscription list has not been less than about 1,100. We now have about the latter number of subscribers. We also distribute some 50 papers weekly gratuitously.

We shall immediately proceed with the fourth volume, trusting that those who have given us their patronage will still continue it. We also expect that those who are in arrears will remember that we do not discontinue papers till arrearages are paid.—We have, we think, been so lenient that no one can complain. A great proportion of publishers have repeatedly called upon their patrons to "pay up," but we have not, and do not now see it our duty to call upon our subscribers thus publicly, because many who have paid promptly dislike to be greeted with such a message. Those who are in arrears to us probably know the fact as well as we. We expect that all who take and read a religious newspaper have sufficient understanding of what is right. We have therefore expected that all who intended ever to pay would do so when their circumstances would admit, without a special public invitation.

Our terms for vol. 4th will be $2 in advance. This we shall consider due on the reception of the first number, and shall make no extra charge for a delay in payment. Most of our subscribers can meet this at once. There are probably some who cannot be so prompt. If we allow such a few weeks to make payment, we do not anticipate to grant indulgences to any who could as well meet the demand at one time as another. Our subscribers where we have Agents will please make remittances through them. Others may get the Post Master at whose office they receive their papers to forward the money to us. If our agents and other friends of the press will take the trouble to call upon subscribers for settlement, and obtain other subscribers, we will amply reward them for the labor.—Sometime during the coming year we hope to visit our subscribers generally and make settlement, and confer with them relative to the interests of the press.

To those who have contributed to render the Register interesting and profitable by their communications, we most cordially tender our grateful acknowledgments while we request a continuance of the same.—We would be glad if our writers would be more free and general, in making themselves useful by this means. "A word fitly spoken, how good it is?" "In the morning sow thy seed, in the evening withhold not thy hand." May we not for the coming year look for more help from those who are able to impart instruction?

Attention to the Sabbath.

We had the pleasure of spending the last Sabbath in Hamilton, with a small company of believers in the obligation of all men to remember the Sabbath of the commandment, to keep it holy. A lecture was delivered there last fall on the subject of the Sabbath by Eld. E. S. Bailey. Since that time there has been considerable excitement on the subject. Several have expressed themselves convinced that the Sabbath of the commandment should be kept; but as yet only one family has come to its observance. Some four or five of our members have lived in the place two or three years. They now are so much encouraged by the addition to their numbers, and by the excitement on many minds, that they have commenced Sabbath meetings, which they hope to continue until it may be deemed expedient to organize a Seventh-day Baptist Church in this most desirable of all locations. They will be supplied with preaching most of the time from Brookfield and this place. May the Lord bless his truth there, and build up a church that shall be zealous to do his whole will.

The Enquirer No. 2.

We have received No. 2 of the Enquirer, published by E. C. Delavan. It contains correspondence and discussion relative to the proper kind of wine to be used at the communion, and the wine question generally, with an Appendix. It is a large quarto, of about 50 pages. It may be obtained of O. Scovil, Albany, Gen. Ag't, at 25 cents the single copy, $1 for five copies. As we have just received the 2d No. we are not able to speak of its merits. The reputation of the Publisher, however, is a sufficient guaranty that the work is valuable. Both sides of the question are discussed in this No.

INDIAN MISSION CONVENTION.—We have received the proceedings of the Indian Mission Convention held in Cincinnati, Ohio. The object of the Convention was to form a western organization for the promotion of Indian Missions. This object was accomplished, and a Society formed under the title of the American Indian Mission Association. The object is, the promotion of the spiritual and temporal interests of the Aborigines of America, by the preaching of the Gospel and other religious institutions, by the establishment of schools both male and female, from primary schools to those of the highest order, and to promote industry and civilization.—It is a Baptist organization exclusively.

We wish the enterprise much success.

Revival in Clarence.

CLARENCE, February 6, 1843.

DEAR BRO. BAILEY—It may be interesting to yourself, and the friends of Zion in general, to be informed of the special grace of God towards the church in Clarence. It has indeed been a time of refreshing of late from the presence of our God. Its appearance was on this wise: Four weeks since the brethren concluded to hold a meeting for one week day and night.—Accordingly the meeting commenced, but the traveling became so bad many of the brethren who lived at the distance of a few miles could not attend except by dint of effort; consequently our congregation was small, and prospects dark; however, we soon felt and saw tokens of DIVINE and immediate help. "We thanked God, and took courage." Soon the mercy-drops fell upon us. The love of God in the hearts of his children, was no longer like "fire shut up in their bones," but it broke forth like an "overflowing stream." The week was spent; the brethren resolved to continue the meeting. The work increased, and thus for four weeks, night and day without intermission, I was helped to preach once, twice, and sometimes thrice a day, having no one to assist so much as to preach one sermon. The brethren, however, were faithful—discharging their duties with energy and promptness. During the course of the meeting, 31 were added to the church, of which number 19 embraced the Sabbath of the Lord our God, having hitherto been in the observance of the first day of the week. Connected with this subject, were a number of very interesting circumstances. A number of individuals came forward as backsliders, confessing the reason of their backsliding, that in time past they had come to the knowledge of the Sabbath, and were unwilling to keep it, and hence they backslid from God. Others, having become awakened during the meeting to a sense of their "lost condition," when inquiring of God the way that "leads to Zion's hill," have come to a knowledge of the Sabbath, and instead of "going forward," they have "conferred with the flesh," having turned aside from the "holy commandment" unto "old wives' fables," choosing rather to enjoy their own ease, than to "deny themselves," and thereby have right to the tree of life through obedience to the commandments of God, Rev. xxii. 14. We received no other opposition during the meeting except a little from some of our pious neighbors who seem to be far more concerned about the "bad influence" of "Jewish Laws," than the damning consequence or character of Gentile sins! But while our Christian neighbors, having a holy dread of legal defilement, chose to absent themselves from the "synagogue," it gave the "common people" an admirable opportunity, and they heard us "gladly." We however regretted very much the smallness of our house, which is only 30 by 40, for upon one occasion it was thought there were at least one hundred people that could not get within hearing distance.

Yours, in gospel bonds,

N. V. HULL.

The Second Advent Nigh!

BY BENJAMIN CLARK.

In three Chapters.

(Concluded from page 178)

CHAPTER III.

An inquiry concerning the time spoken of by Daniel the prophet.

Mr. Miller contends that the "two thousand and three hundred days," (interpreted years,) in the 8th chapter of Daniel, is to be the time of the second coming of Christ. But this text expressly refers to the time when the "sanctuary" was to be cleansed, and notwithstanding there are a number of dates and times expressly given in the book of Daniel, and in the Revelations, yet, we find no express time given in any part of the scriptures as referring to the second Advent of our Savior. The apostles asked him, saying, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel? And he said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power.'—Acts i. 6. Again, if neither men, nor the angels of heaven, neither the Son, but the Father only, knew the "day or hour" or "the time," of his second coming; (Mark xiii. 32, 33,) then, we ask, how the angel Gabriel could reveal the time to Daniel? I repeat this question, and respectfully ask Mr. Miller, or any of his friends, that if the "angels of heaven" did not know the day or the hour, how Gabriel could reveal the time to Daniel?

The answer may be, the year, and not the day, or hour. But is not the day and hour given when the Messiah would be cut off? (Dan. ix. 24 to 27.) And did he not say before he was crucified, "My hour is come"? Thus, if we go back "seventy weeks," or seventy times seven years from the death of Christ, we shall come precisely to the time that the decree went forth to Ezra to restore and build Jerusalem. (Ezra viii. ch.)

But the time to the cleansing of the sanctuary 2,300 days, the time to the crucifixion of Christ, "seventy weeks," the time that Ezra and Nehemiah would be rebuilding Jerusalem seven weeks, (49 years,) the time the gospel would be confirmed or preached "one week" (7 years by John the Baptist, and by Christ,) and the time "to the end of those wonders" noted in the 10, 11, 12 chapters of Daniel, seem to be given to Daniel, even to the time that he would "rest and stand in his lot at the end of the days." Now we will look at these three last chapters of Daniel, as only one chapter, containing only one subject; only one vision and its explanation. That is, the kings that would reign, and the rulers down to the time that Michael would stand up and the resurrection, first, "some to everlasting life" and second, "some to shame and everlasting contempt." And to the time that the wise shall shine forth as "the stars" or "as the Sun in the kingdom of their Father." Now all these things were to be finished: but the second coming of Christ which would be some where in the course of this vision, but not expressly defined at what time, only after the reign of a certain king,* or ruler, which would do such and such things: "and at that time shall Michael stand up the great prince," &c.

Christ foretold his disciples of certain signs which would proceed his coming; such as wars, famines, pestilence, earthquakes, false prophets, and many saying, lo here! and lo there! iniquity abounding, and the love of many waxing cold; and as it was in the time before the flood, and also in the time of Lot, the people were going on with all manner of worldly business, and worldly expectation, when the flood came, and when the fire and brimstone came upon Sodom: "even thus shall it be when the Son of Man is revealed." But the gospel was first to be preached among all nations, (which is said to be now accomplished in some measure.)

Mr. Miller has some twenty-five signs, such as—The increase of knowledge, Dan. xii. 4. The increase of riches, James v. 1, 3. The unwillingness of men to hear sound doctrine. Scoffers, saying, Where is the promise of his coming. Perilous times. Departing from the faith. False teachers making merchandize of the people. Mockers in the last time. The falling away of the church. The church in the wilderness forty-two months. The papal power forty-two months, &c., all of which signs appearing to have been fulfilled. And indeed I know not why all the signs given are not fulfilled, unless it be that the sun and moon shall be darkened, and the stars fall from heaven, which would immediately proceed his coming.

As it respects the fulfillment of the prophecies, such as "The nations shall not learn war any more"—"The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of God, as the waters cover the sea," and "All shall know the Lord" &c., I understand will be after, and not before his second coming; because this "mountain of the Lord's house," is first to be "established" upon the top of the mountains, and exalted above the hills" before the nations en masse "shall flow unto it." Isa. ii. 2. See also Dan. vii. 13, 14, which show the dominion and glory and the government of the nations to be given to him, after he comes "with the clouds of heaven."

For one, the writer of this does rejoice at the late attention given to this subject, so far as respects the fulfillment of the "signs" given by Christ, Matt. xxiv. 32. "When ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." But, at the same time, I do not believe it is wisdom for christians, nor that the best good of christianity requires that any christian should pretend to give particular dates for this important event. But I would endeavor, through his grace, to unite with all those who sincerely pray, "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, as in heaven, so in earth." And when he says—"Behold I come quickly," may we all anxiously respond—"Amen. Even so, come Lord Jesus.

Correspondence of the Tribune.

Seduction in Philadelphia—Deliberate Murder of the Seducer by the brother of the Seduced—Great Excitement.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 12—P. M.

In one of my regular letters a few days since, I briefly alluded to the alleged seduction, or rather abduction as it was then called—of a young lady residing in Southwark, and stated at the time that something serious was likely to grow out of the affair. That prediction has been most sadly realized, and I will now state, as briefly and truly as possible all the circumstances connected with the dreadful affair, which has thrown our whole community into a state of the greatest excitement.

On Tuesday and Wednesday last, considerable talk was produced by the sudden disappearance of a young and handsome girl, aged about 16, named Sarah Mercer, the daughter of Thomas Mercer, 33 Queen street, one of the most wealthy and respectable inhabitants of Southwark. A young man of this city, named Hutchinson Heberton, was arrested on suspicion of being concerned in her abduction, and taken before Alderman Mitchell, at the instance of the girl's brother, who threatened him then with instant death if he refused, but was discharged in consequence of the girl's return to her parents on Wednesday evening. It was ascertained, however, that Heberton had seduced the young girl, and that she had gone to a house of ill fame, in the neighborhood of Pine and Twelfth streets, kept by Louis O'Neil, where he had been in the habit of meeting her.

Miss Mercer's absence, as well as her return, according to all statements, was voluntary. The anguish of the family at the knowledge of the dishonor that had fallen upon the daughter, no tongue can tell nor pen describe. To wipe out the stain so far as it was possible so to do, a marriage was proposed to the seducer. This was declined on his part, and the brother of the seduced then challenged him. This was also declined. The infuriate brother, stung almost to madness, determined not to be baulked in his revenge. He watched the movements of Heberton, and having ascertained that he was to leave the city on Friday afternoon or evening in a carriage, by way of Camden, he managed to discover the same in the street, when he employed one of Vanseiver's vehicles, driven by a young man, to whom Mercer gave instructions, pointing out the carriage, to lose sight of it on no condition, but keep close to it, and wherever it went to follow after it.

In this carriage, in company with Heberton, was seated his legal friend and adviser, Jas. C. Vandyke, Esq., from whose office the deceased had left with the avowed object of preventing a meeting with the misguided and excited Mercer. After having driven through several streets, the carriage entered the ferry-boat John Fitch, then lying at Market-st. wharf. Mercer followed after, leaped from his vehicle unobserved, and concealed himself behind a box on board the boat, armed with one of Colt's six-barreled pistols.

Shortly after the carriage was driven on board with the blinds drawn up, and when within a few yards of the Jersey shore Mr. Vandyke got out of the same, walked around, it is presumed, to see that all was safe, when Mercer approached the carriage and fired four balls into it in quick succession. One of them proved fatal, taking effect under the left shoulder blade, and penetrated the heart. Heberton was conveyed to Cake's tavern in Camden, where he expired in a few minutes.

The murderer was immediately arrested, and upon his person was found the pistol, two barrels of which still retained their charge. His conduct during the remainder of the evening is represented as having been wild and frantic, evidently laboring under the most intense excitement.

Thus has the imprudent conduct of a once fond and doating daughter, hurled into misery the peace and happiness of aged and venerable parents! When Miss Sarah Mercer entered her parents residence, after leaving the abode of infamy in Pine street, she avowed her determination not to remain—expressed her attachment for the deceased—and it was only by force that she was compelled to. It is also said that her brother had sworn that she, too, who had disgraced her family, should fall the instant he laid eyes on her; but fortunately he was not permitted to stain his hands with a double murder.

The parties in the above lamentable drama are of the most wealthy and respectable character. Of the Mercers I have partly spoken; and will only add, that the name of the murderer is Singleton Mercer, for the past two or three years a clerk in the store of Carson & Newbold, South Wharves, not yet twenty years of age, fond of society and the world. The murdered, Hutchinson Heberton, was the son of the late Dr. Heberton, an estimable man, and who died possessed of great wealth. He is also related to the Messrs. Hebertons merchants, Matthew Newkirk and numerous other wealthy and respectable citizens. He was about 26 years of age, 5 feet ten inches, and considered one of the handsomest young men in Philadelphia. He formerly wore a mustache, but had it shaved off on Wednesday last. He resided with his widowed mother, Ann Heberson, Ninth street, near Arch, where his lifeless body was conveyed on Saturday afternoon about 1 o'clock.

Young Mercer was taken by the Sheriff of Gloucester county to the Woodbury jail, to await his trial for the dreadful deed he has committed, about 1 o'clock yesterday, accompanied by two cousins and an attorney. He appeared perfectly calm and collected.

There are various rumors afloat in connection with this tragic occurrence, and the reputation of the dead Heberton; but I think I have narrated all that can be of interest, and which I believe is strictly correct. No exertion, on my part, has been spared to ferret out the whole affair; and where such universal excitement exists, as does both in this city where the parties all belong, as in Camden, whose shore was the scene of the unfortunate event, it is impossible to derive a more authentic statement. The verdict of the Coroner's Jury has not yet been made public.

Heberton's funeral will take place tomorrow (Monday) at 2 o'clock P. M. from his mother's residence.

It has been said that the above occurrence was one of 'awful retribution;' and that it is such, all who know the parties will readily admit. Heberton has been proclaimed the seducer of a young and virtuous girl, blasting her fair fame, and destroying the peace and happiness of a hitherto respectable family. This, true though it be, did not justify the shedding of his blood. But the whole affair is one of 'awful retribution' throughout.

The period has not been long since the very offense for which Heberton has been violently sent into eternity was actually committed by his murderer, Singleton Hall Mercer, upon the person of a poor friendless servant girl in the family of his aged and respected parents, but which, for the consideration of some three hundred dollars, was quietly hushed up. 'Awful retribution,' indeed! No outraged brother appeared upon the stage in this case, to avenge the wrongs of a poor and unprotected servant girl. No sympathy was excited, no cry of 'satisfaction' was raised, and the money usual exacted by the Guardians of the Poor for the maintenance of illegitimate children, was freely paid in the case alluded to.

Thus you have the character of the parties plainly stated, and if ever there was an 'awful retribution,' it has been most fearfully realized. As I have before said, the parties are wealthy—move in the highest circles—and altogether it is one of the strangest and boldest transactions that has been recorded for years. In making the above expose, I do nothing but what is publicly known and talked of; far be it from me to inflict any farther wound upon the feelings of the already agonized relations of the two parties; but I do most earnestly invoke that justice be done to all. Let not any mawkish and mistaken sympathy be enlisted on either side.

The verdict of the Coroner's Jury was 'Wilful murder,' and Singleton Hall Mercer was accordingly committed by Justice Harrison, of Camden, to answer the charge of murder in the first degree. During the examination of the prisoner, Ferdinand W. Hubbell, Esq., of this city acted as his counsel.

BRUTUS.

Epidemic in Vermont.—We learn from the Montpelier (Vt.) Watchman that a very dangerous epidemic is prevailing in the northern part of that town, in Charleston, Newark, Burke, and various other sections of the state. In some districts it is said the number of those who are well, is scarcely sufficient to take care of the sick and bury the dead. The same disease prevailed, to a dreadful extent, last season, at Burlington, and in its vicinity, where many of the most valuable citizens fell victims to its violence. It is a disease until recently unknown in that section of the country, and it is thought to be a species of erysipelas.—Boston Bee.

Millerism.—A curious case of partial insanity, resulting, we understand, from belief in these doctrines, has lately occurred at North East, Pa., the statements relative to which are furnished us by a friend. The subject is a young man named Putnam, who imbibed the notion that he should die on the last day of the year just expired. For some length of time he has been laboring under this delusion, which he strenuously declared was made known to him by revelation. So infatuated was he with this idea that he gave up his business, employed his time in drawing devices on the tomb stones at the grave yard, and occupied nine days in hewing out a sepulchre in which to die—a grave six feet deep in rock. Accordingly, having made all the preparations, he proceeded to his tomb, which was situated in a secluded spot, accompanied by some two hundred persons, present by invite, and deliberately laid himself down in his grave to die. He remained there for the space of an hour and a half, the assembled multitude, no doubt waiting with anxious suspense to see him give up the ghost; but, to use a vulgar phrase, "he couldn't come it." The miserable man crept out of his hole and departed thence, strongly impressed that he shouldn't die that day.—Fredonia Censor.

A Result of the Exploring Expedition.—In the January number of the Horticultural Magazine, in an article entitled "A Retrospective View of Horticulture for the year 1842," we find the following interesting paragraph:—

"An important addition has been, or ultimately will be made on our collections, by the labors of the exploring expedition. The number of live plants brought home amounts to between 200 and 300 species, among them several new fruit trees from the East Indies. The collection of seeds embraces many hundred kinds, from all the various places where the exploring expedition touched: among them many of the ericas, from the Cape of Good Hope, and the splendid Pinus Lambertiana and others, from the Columbia River. The seeds were placed under the direction of the National Institute at Washington, and have been liberally distributed by Dr. Pickering, the curator.

For the growth of the live plants a greenhouse 50 feet long, has been erected on the vacant ground in the rear of the patent office. Part of this has been partitioned off, as a stove or hothouse for the tropical plants and fruits. These, when increased, will probably be distributed among the nurserymen of the country. The whole of the plants are kept under the charge of our correspondent, Mr. Breckenridge, from whom we hope to receive a list of their names, as well as some extracts from his original notes and remarks on the many beautiful and grand productions of Flora, examined by him in their native habitants. This the Government will not allow him to do; but as soon as the injunction is removed, we may promise our readers some interesting articles from Mr. Breckenridge's pen."

SECOND ADVENT.

Dear Brother Himes:—At the request of numerous friends, I herein transmit to them, through you, a brief statement of facts relative to the many stories with which the public are humbugged, by the pulpit, press, and bar-room declamations, concerning the principles I advocate, and management of my worldly concerns.

My principles, in brief, are, that Jesus Christ will come again to this earth—cleanse, purify, and take possession of the same, with all His Saints, sometime between March 21, 1843, and March 21, 1844. I have never, to the space of more than 23 years, had any other time preached or published by me. I have never fixed on any month day or hour, between that time. I have never found any mistake in reckoning, summing up, or miscalculation. I have made no provisions for any other time. I am perfectly satisfied that the Bible is true, and is the Word of God; and I am confident, I rely wholly on that blessed book for my faith in this matter. I am not a Prophet; I am not sent to prophesy, but to read, believe and publish, what God has inspired the ancient prophets to administer unto us, in the prophecies of the Old and New Testaments. These have been, and now are, my principles; and I hope I shall never be ashamed of them.

As to worldly cares, I have had but a very few for twelve years past. I have a wife and eight children; I have great reason to believe that they are all the children of God, and believers in the same doctrine with myself. I own a small farm in Low Hampton N. Y. My family support themselves upon it, and I believe they are esteemed frugal, temperate and industrious. They use hospitality without grudging, and never turn a pilgrim from the house nor the needy from their door. I bless God my family are benevolent and kind to all men who need their sympathy or aid. I have no cares to manage, except my own individual wants. I have no funds or debts due me of any amount. "I owe no man any thing." I have expended more than 2,000 dollars of my property in twelve years, besides what God has given me through the dear friends in this cause.

Yours, respectfully.

WM. MILLER.

Philadelphia, Feb. 4, 1843.

From the Lansingburgh Gazette, Feb 10

Mysterious Disappearance.—Mrs. Ann La Cross, the wife of F. A. La Cross of this village left her home on Thursday morning last, as will be seen by an advertisement in this paper, and has not been heard of since. Her friends have been unable to ascertain even what direction she took upon leaving her own door. The account which her husband gives of the affair, is, that she left about seven o'clock in the morning taking with her only one plain calico dress besides what she had on, and leaving all her clothing of any valne, with her rings and other jewelry; and taking no money.

It seems very strange, as she left at seven, or between seven and eight in the morning, her residence being on our Main street, and situated in the heart of the village, that she was not seen by any one of our citizens. Moreover she has left all her clothing of any value, and her jewelry, &c., which, together with her protracted absence, are calculated to excite the most unpleasant apprehensions.

Mrs. La Cross, was a mere girl of 17, of comely appearance, and was very recently married. She was rather below the medium size, light complexion, and very light brown hair, and rather handsome features. She had on when she left, a dark calico dress, black mantle, a large cape and fringe around the collar, a black hood, with flowers, green veil, gaiter boots, and light moccasins. Any information respecting her will be gratefully received, by the subscriber, at Lansingburgh.

JOHN BRUCE.

A Disgraceful Millerite Scene!—A preacher belonging to this strangely infatuated body, came to this town the early part of last week, and held forth to an astonished audience in Smith's billiard room, giving utterance to some of the wildest rhapsodies imaginable. The burden of his song was that the world was to come to an end some time this year. By some under means he got possession of the Canadian Methodist chapel on Tuesday last, where he commenced what is called a religious service. Shortly after he opened the business of the evening, an attack was made on the chapel by a large mob, for we cannot call them by any other more appropriate name. The windows and stove were shamefully demolished or torn down, ladies dresses suffered considerably in the general melee. The misguided preacher escaped by the rear building, and thus saved himself from further violence. We have heard that he has since left town to practice on the minds of the credulous in more congenial places.

We understand that he is the same individual who prophesied the destruction of Bytown some year or two ago.—Hamilton Gazette.

Decease of Comodore Hull.—We regret to be called upon to note the decease of this distinguished officer, which took place after a short illness, at his residence in this city, at an early hour this morning. The name and fame of Hull are alike familiar and dear to his countrymen. On the long roll of our naval heroes, is inscribed no brighter name. He first taught the world that the arrogant title of "Mistress of the Seas," assumed by Great Britain, was but an empty name when she encountered the Yankee seaman with any thing approaching to an even force.

The gallant hero now sleeps in death, but the record of his patriotic services survives him in the hearts and memories of his admiring countrymen.—Philadelphia Gazette.

Communication with the Pacific.—We are pleased to learn that this subject has, for some time past, engaged the attention of the Secretary of the Navy. We are just informed that he is preparing certain of the small vessels of the navy, such as are unfit for distant cruising, for service in the Gulf of Mexico. He proposes that one of these vessels shall leave Pensacola on or about a particular day in each month, and sail direct to Chagres; and, in like manner, one of them shall leave Chagres on or about a particular day in each month, and sail direct to Pensacola. The intermediate time will be employed in cruising in the Gulf and Carribbean sea in the usual course of their duty. Thus the ordinary service of these vessels will not be materially interrupted, while an opportunity will be afforded for the transmission of public despatches and private letters, with certainty, and in one-fourth the time now usually required. It is ascertained, as we are informed, that arrangements will be made for the speedy transmission of all letters, &c. between Chagres and Panama, as soon as it shall be known that a proper communication is established between the former place and the United States. It is probable that a similar arrangement will be made for a more certain and direct intercourse between Pensacola and Vera Cruz.—Madisonian.

The "Broadaxes."—Some extraordinary trials are now in progress in Chester co., Pa. It seems that several persons have been arrested for violating the laws of decency and morality, under the principles of fanaticism of a sect called "the Broadaxe" persuasion. They are now in prison, or are out on bail, and their trials have excited some attention among the curious. One or two persons, heretofore of a respectable character, and possessing considerable property, have gone mad under this delusion, although upon other topics they are perfectly sane.—Some of the Broadaxe doctrines are revolting in the extreme.

The French Legion of Honor.—The French Legion of Honor consist of 49,678 members, of whom 21,522 enjoy pensions. The population of France is about thirty-five million. It follows that one in every seven hundred and four of the whole number—men, women and children—enjoys the decoration of the Legion. Nearly 6,000 crosses were distributed during the year 1842.

The Pope in England.—A London paper contains the following which is probably nothing more than a rumor:

"It is rumored, that within a few days, a letter has been received by Her Majesty from the King of the French, strongly recommending the recognition of the Pope as the head of the Church, stating, as a reason for such extraordinary counsel, the universal peace at present prevailing throughout the world. As might have been expected, it is said to have created a great sensation in the Palace. We have also heard that the Pope is expected to consecrate in person, of course with unusual splendor, the Romish Cathedral now erecting in the neighborhood of Westminster Abbey!"

Real Estate in New York.—The three stores in Exchange street, on the site of the old South Dutch Church on Washington Square, were sold yesterday by auction at an average of about $28,000 each. The prices obtained were rather better than were generally anticipated, though only about half the cost—taking the sale of the same lots, which took place soon after the great fire, as the basis of calculation. The lots brought then about $40,000 each, and the erection of the stores must have severally cost some eight thousand dollars.

The little negroes were greatly astonished last Wednesday morning by a fall of snow. It is the first we have ever known in Florida, and we fear the cold which attended it will injure the orange and other fruit trees.—Tallahasse Sentinel.

Earthquake at Sea.—Captain Tecklenberg, of the Bremen ship Emma, arrived this morning, reports that on the 61th of January three distinct vibrations were felt on board the ship at 10 A. M. Each lasted about twenty seconds. The sensation was like that caused by an earthquake. Weather fine, sea calm. Latitude 35, 44. longitude 31, 5. Barometer 30 degrees 10.

Roman Catholics in the United States.—The number of Roman Catholics in the United States has been lately estimated at 1,500,000, an increase of 200,000 since the beginning of the year 1842. Of churches and chapels there are 674, and 82 in process of construction, making a total of 656. Of officiating priests the number is 572, of whom nineteen have been made in the year 1842, fourteen of which are in the diocese of New York.—N. Y. Evangelist.

The Last Hour of the False Prophet.—The signs of the speedy fulfillment of the predictions against Mohamedanism, are multiplying every day. At the present time, anarchy and confusion prevail throughout the Turkish empire, and the attempts of the European powers to support her, have hastened her ruin. An intelligent traveler thus writes of this country: "Turkey is in the agonies of dissolution, and will soon be a mere corpse. One of the provinces under her protection, Servia, has been lately revolutionized, and its reigning prince dethroned. The Government at Constantinople acquiesces, because it is too feeble to oppose the revolution. In Syria is the same anarchy. The Druses and Christians of Mount Lebanon, are a prey to perpetual wars, and obey no superior authority. No Law, no safety, no security for property in this unhappy country. What does the Sultan do? He promises to act against the rebels, but he does not. Is it not a sign that the last hour is come for the followers of Mohamed?"—N. Y. Evangelist.

Gov. General of Canada.—The Kingston Herald, of the 7th inst., states that the Governor General's health has again taken an unfaverable turn. It appears that dropsy has supervened, and that there is a little or no hope of his recovery. Two eminent physicians of Toronto has been sent for, one of whom remained in constant attendance. Parliament was farther prorogued on the 4th to the 18th of March, but the summons for that day is not for the despatch of business.

A Nice but Just Distinction.—The Supreme Court of Ohio has decided that persons of mixed blood, who are more than half white, are not subject to the Constitutional exclusion of negroes from the right of suffrage, but are entitled to vote.

The Somers.—We are informed that Wilson, one of the prisoners confined for a supposed participation in the alleged conspiracy to create a mutiny on board the Somers, will be tried immediately after the case of Commander Mackenzie shall be disposed of. We farther learn that the father of Wilson has engaged B. F. Butler, and Charles O'Conner, Esqs., to defend him.

Great Oaks from little Acorns Grow.—Rome was once saved by the cackling of a goose, why should not Pennsylvania be rescued from dishonor by the suggestion of the nobest of creatures—a woman? The men of this degenerate state seem lost to all sense of propriety, and their efforts to throw off the incubus, the state debt, are feeble and unavailing. The gentler sex have often come to the rescue of their lords and masters, when dispirited and wearied they were about to abandon exertion, and lie down supinely on their backs, the slaves of circumstance. A lady of Lancaster, willing to prove that these days can also furnish feminine patriots, propose to the sex throughout the state, that they turn their whole stock of jewelry into coin, buy up the state stock, and make a present of it to the state. She estimates the value of all the trinkets in the possession of the ladies of Pennsylvania at eighteen and a half millions of dollars,—just enough, by buying the stock at fifty per cent discount, to pay off the whole state debt. "Our lords," she wisely observes, "will never pay the debt in the world—and it will certainly be no very great hardship for us to dispense with our jewelry for a short time. And when we pay off this great debt for them, our chivalrous beaux will be both able and willing to buy us a new supply."

Truly, this lady might be a worthy descendant of the noble mother of the Gracchi, whose only jewels were her children, whom she had imbued with great and good sentiments.—Phil. North American.

Another Attempted Mutiny.—Under our marine head, a few days ago, we published the arrival of the brig Ganza, at Havanna, where she put in owing to the mutinous state of the crew. A letter from Captain Soule to a friend in Bath, Me., gives the following particulars of the affair.

"The Ganza sailed from Saco, Me., for Mobile, the latter end of October last; on arriving at Mobile, Capt. S. procured a new crew principally, and after leaving the bar—which was on the 7th of January—and before getting outside, he found himself surrounded by a set of desperate villains, fully bent upon rising against him and taking the vessel. At first he made every effort in his power to bring the villains under by mild measures, but all to no purpose. Things kept assuming a more serious aspect—the ruffians making the most horrid threats, that unless Capt. S. would do as they wished, they would serve him as they had served others.

On the evening of the 12th, the captain was informed by the mate that the mutineers had sharpened their knives, and that one Thomas Blake, (half Indian,) said he had helped take one vessel and killed the Captain, and they would serve him [Captain Soule] the same way. At 8 P. M., the said Blake being at the helm, the captain went below to get the time, and looking up he saw Blake returning to the helm, with his knife in his hand—the other two being on deck at the same time, when it was their watch below.

The Captain says, "I then meant to confine him, but learning that they had made up their minds to be all confined if any, and knowing it was impossible to work the brig without them, and being satisfied they were determined to take the brig if they could—and the mate and cook being much alarmed—I concluded to keep away for Havanna, which I did, they not discovering the change of direction, but presuming we were still on our course for Boston, according to our original intention."

The captain states farther: "The next morning, Blake being at the helm, the mate went forward to find the keys of the galley which Blake had stolen while there. I went on deck and stood near Blake, and asked him very pleasantly if he had seen those keys. I received a very saucy answer, but said nothing more. But looking at him, he says, "Who in h—ll are you looking at?—go away!"—and he then advanced towards me, drawing his knife. I put my hands in my pockets for my pistols, but he said, "d——n you, it's too late, you haven't got them!"

I then sprang down below, to get clear of him, where I found my pistols, which I had left on the table at breakfast, and which he had observed through the scuttle, and had taken that time to stab me, as he said on going forward—and was sorry he had not "fixed me then,' as he was afraid he should not have another so good a chance.

Many other traps were laid, which, through the coolness and intrepidity of the Captain, was successfully thwarted, and finally, very much to the surprise of the villains, he carried his brig safe into Havanna, and lodged the bloodthirsty ruffians safe in prison, where they await farther orders.—N. Y. Com. Adv.

Congressional News.

Correspondence of the Jour. of Com.

WASHINGTON, Monday, Feb. 6.

The rumors which have prevailed, for some days, of a forthcoming plan for increasing the revenue, have at length assumed a different shape; and it is now stated that a proposition is to be made to modify the tariff act of the late session, by establishing a uniform ad valorem ratio of duty on all articles of 20 per cent. Iron and sugar alone excepted. The sugar duty, according to this plan, is to remain the same, and the specific duty on iron to be somewhat reduced. Whether tea and coffee are to be embraced in the dutiable articles, does not appear. It is further stated that many members of the House have been consulted as to a plan, and that there will probably be a majority for it.

Oregon Occupation Bill again.—Mr. Archer moved a reconsideration of the vote of the Senate, by which the Oregon occupation bill was passed. He voted for the passage of the bill with a view to its reconsideration. Mr. Sevier expressed some surprise whether the bill was still in possession of the body. Mr. Archer, it seems, having informed the Secretary of his intention to make this motion, the bill had been retained till the time for reconsideration, under the rule, should elapse.

The Exchequer.—Mr. Tallmadge then followed in remarks upon the Exchequer bill.

Relief of Amos Kendall.—Mr. Cowen, from the Committee on claims, reported a bill for the relief of Amos Kendall, in consequence of judgment rendered against him in the Circuit Court of this District, growing out of his withholding certain money from Stockton and Stokes for alleged mail services rendered to the Government; and discharged him from the custody of the marshal.

The bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Washington, Tuesday, Feb. 7.

The Senate to-day, refused to reconsider the Oregon occupation bill, by a vote, yeas 24 nays 21. The bill, therefore, goes to the House for concurrence. But it is doubtful whether the House will pass it.

Private Expresses.—The Senate has ordered to a third reading Mr. Merrick's bill to prohibit the employment of private expresses on rail-roads and other, and for the prevention of frauds on the post-office department. The bill was amended so as to define what it means by "mailable matter," the transportation of which "out of the mail" is prohibited. It excepts packages of money, but includes letters and packets, newspapers when unaccompanied by letters, and other written or printed matter, of and under the weight of one pound.

Washington, Wednesday, Feb 8.

The Supreme Court has recently made a decision which settles the validity of the existing bankrupt act. They have given an opinion that the act having been passed by Congress in the exercise of what they deemed their constitutional power, the Supreme Court can not controvert the constitutionality of the act or annul it. I state the decision from mere heresay, but this is the amount of it. It is highly important if correct. It has always been doubted whether the Supreme Court has the power to pronounce an act of Congress unconstitutional, but the question was never before settled.

An interesting financial eclaircisment took place, incidentally in the House to-day.

Some blame was thrown on the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, for not being prepared to inform the House how the appropriations for the fiscal year, ending on the 20th of June, 1844, was to be met.

Mr. Fillmore took occasion to state in explanation, that he had addressed inquiries to the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject—asking for estimates of the amount of revenue, and expenditures, &c., but has received no reply.

The important resolutions submitted by Mr. McDuffie on this subject deserve attention. They are as follows:—

1. Resolved, That it is the solemn and urgent duty of the present Congress to adopt without delay efficient measures to revive the crippled and decaying commerce, replenish the impoverished exchequer, and avert the alarming accumulation of the public debt of the United States.

2. Resolved, That a modification of the existing tariff on foreign imports, such as will render it strictly and in good faith a mere revenue measure, is indispensable to the accomplishment of these objects; and that the recent measures of the British Parliament partially adopting the principles of free-trade; the public indications of a disposition on the part of the present ministry to extend these principles still farther; and the probability of the speedy organization of an extensive system of smuggling on the long line of the frontier, furnish pressing motives to Congress for acting on the subject during the present session.

3. Resolved, That a rigid system of retrenchment, economy, and accountability, such as will bring the annual expenditures within the annual income of the Government, is not less indispensable; and that while this is rendered necessary by the deplorable state of the public finances, it is rendered just and not injurious to the public service by the great reduction of the currency and consequent appreciation of the value of money.

The Senate, to-day, was chiefly occupied with the ceremony of receiving the sword of Washington and the staff of Franklin, which was yesterday presented in the House.

In the House this morning, on motion of Mr. Taliaferro, twenty thousand copies of the Journal of yesterday, containing the proceedings in relation to the presentation of the sword of Washington and the cane of Franklin, were ordered to be printed for distribution by the members.

Yesterday was the day set apart for the consideration of a joint resolution in relation to commercial reciprocity with foreign nations; but in consequence of the interesting ceremony above referred to, it was lost sight of. In consequence, the resolution was to-day made the special order for Saturday next.

No Hoax.

THE SUBSCRIBER would respectfully inform the public generally, that he is manufacturing Cabinet Ware of all descriptions, wanted by the inhabitants in this section of the country, although he cannot boast of his great EXPERIENCE, he having carried on the business only 10 years; yet in that time he has learned that basswood, does not make as good and durable posts and draw fronts for Bureaus, as well seasoned cherry does; although there is in this section, pine and basswood in abundance, thrown together something in the shape of a Bureau, but it is not, and cannot be done in his shop, nor under his superintendence. The Subscriber intends that all Cabinet Wares sold by him, shall be made in a good workmanlike manner, and of thoroughly seasoned lumber, and will be sold on as good terms, as can be had at any well established shop in this, or any of the neighboring villages. His shop is in the east corner of LaFayette block, No. 3, Cortland street.

Ready Made Coffins.

THE Natural, Intellectual and Moral Sciences, are taught by the different Instructors, as best suits the circumstances accompanying the formation of classes, except those mentioned above, which are always taught by the same Teacher.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter, thirteen miles south of Cazenovia, twenty-four miles west of Hamilton, and about eighteen east of Homer. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, stoves, and rented to gentlemen and ladies at one shilling a week each; each room being large enough for the accommodation of two students.

The ladies occupy the rooms on the south, and the gentlemen those in the north of the building.

The Institution is furnished with a good philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a good education, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

The year is divided into three terms of fourteen weeks each the first term commenced on the 16th of Sept., followed by a vacation of one week, the second term will commence on the 30th of Dec. followed by a vacation of three weeks, the third term will commence on the last Friday in April 1843, followed also, by a vacation of four weeks.

POETRY.

The Man of Sorrow.

BY REV. J. D. TYLER.

"The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head."

The gorgeous skies of Palestine
In evening splendor glow,
And twilight's lingering rays recline
On Carmel's verdant brow;
And Jordan's plains and Elah's vale
In gathering darkness lie,
And famish'd wild beasts fiercely hail
Night's gloomy canopy.

The birds of day, from field and air,
To chosen covert fly,
And forth from burrowed hole and lair
The roaming foxes hie;
The flocks to fold, the herds to stall,
On plain and mountain side,
And men in cottage, tent, and hall,
From deadly night-dews hide.

O'er Kedron's breast, with fainting tread,
The "Man of Sorrows" went—
No roof to hide his care-worn head,
In deeds of mercy spent;
The Son of Man no dwelling hath,
As unto others given—
For him there lies no homeward path,
Save to his native heaven!

And up the shady Olivet
His languid footsteps trod—
No couch to rest his weary feet,
Save the sere mountain sod!
And there he slept—the skies above—
The cold hard earth beneath—
And such the suffering Savior's love,
While traveling unto death.

UNKNOWN EUROPEAN STATES.

A tolerable knowledge of geography is reasonably common in this country, especially in those portions of it where common or district schools are established.—From the course of study pursued in these, and from the thousand and one newspapers which every body reads, a general knowledge, more or less accurate, is obtained, of the Earth's principle divisions; and with regard to Europe in particular, no decently informed American is, or at all events ought to be, wholly ignorant of the names, location, extent and manner of government of the principal kingdoms and empires.—But we question much whether there are not, in the very heart of Europe, a large number of distinct and independent national existences, and unknown, even by their uncouth names, to a very great majority of our countrymen. Most of these petty states are situated within the territory to which we, in common parlance, give the names of Germany and Austria, but, though in some form and to some extent, properly regarded as portions of those empires, they are in fact separate sovereignties, and they enjoy—if there is any enjoyment about it—a specific national existence.

We doubt not that some of our readers will be amused, if not edified by a partial enumeration of these unknown states, with some account of their population, extent, government, &c.

We begin with Anhalt. There are three states having this name; Anhalt Bernburg, Anhalt Cothen and Anhalt Dessau. Each is governed by a Duke; Bernburg by Duke Alexis, Cothen by Duke Henry, and Dessau by duke Leopold. The government is limited. The population of the three is 139,500. The extent, 983 square miles.

There are also three Hesses; Hesse Cassel, Hesse Darmstadt and Hesse Homburg. The first governed by an elector, William II., the second by a grand Duke, Louis II., and the third by a Landgrave, Philip Augustus. The population of the three 1,488,060, of which Hesse Homburg has but 24,060. The extent in square miles is 7738; Hesse Homburg has only 1554. The Langrave of this little farm, however, is an absolute sovereign, while the other two Hesses have constitutions and a limited monarchy.

The Duchy of Brunswick is not exactly a terraincognitia among us Yankees, its name at least, having been known to us by the misfortunes and gallantry of that Duke, who fell at Waterloo, at the head of his black hussars, and more recently by the mad freaks of his successor, Charles, who was kicked out, one fine day, by his subjects. The population is 250,000; extent, 1225 square miles; government, limited monarchy. William is the name of the present Duke.

Of Hohenzollern, there are two; Hohenzollern Henhingen and Hohenzollern Simarigen. The first contains 136 square miles, with a population of 21,000; the second 383 square miles, and 42,800 people. Government, a limited sovereignty. The rulers wear the title of Prince and are named Frederick William and Charles.

Lichtenstein is also governed by a Prince—named John Joseph. Its extent is 52 square miles, and its population 5,800. Limited sovereignty.

Lippe-Detmold is another principality. Ruler's name Leopold; extent, 432 square miles, and its population, 79,000. Limited sovereignty. There is also another Lippe, which has the affix of Schauenburg; extent, 205 square miles, population, 26,000. Ruler's name George William.

There are also two Mechlenburg; Schweren and Strelitz. Title of the Rulers, Grand Duke; their names, Paul Frederick and George V. Population of Schweren, 472,000; extent, 4700 square miles. Population of Strelitz, 85,000; extent, 1091 square miles. The government is a limited monarchy.

The smallest absolute sovereign is the Prince of Monaco, who rules, unchecked, over 50 square miles, and 6,700 people.

The sovereign of this petty principality rejoices in the Romantic name of Florestan the First. He succeeded to the throne, such as it is, about two years ago on the death of his elder brother without issue. Previous to that time he had been for many years, extremely poor, having by some means or other incurred the displeasure of his family, and especially of his mother, the Duchess of Valentinois, whose control of the family purse was absolute, as is now his sway over the six thousand Monacans who own him for their lord, and who obdurately refused to draw the strings thereof in his favor.

He gained his living as a third or fourth rate actor at one of the small theatres in Paris, and now passes most of his time, we believe, in that city, frequenting the coffee houses and theatres, and aspiring to no higher fame than that of a theatrical critic. He is no longer young, in fact, he is quite elderly, and seems to be a standing butt for the jokes and witticism of the Parisian journalists. These, every now and then, put forth laughable items at his expense, describing his army rank and file, his meagre revenues, and withal, the complacency of his royal remarks on the characters and policy of his brother sovereigns.

The Grand Duke of Oldenburg is absolute, but he has 2740 square miles of territory and 260,000 subjects.

The Grand Duchess at Parma, Napoleon's widow, is also absolute over 2184 square miles, and 440,000 people.

Reuss. There are two principalities of this name, whose united extent is 588 miles, and population 83,400. The sovereigns, Henry XIX., and Henry LXII. are absolute.

Of Saxes there are no less than four.—The Duchy of Saxe Altenburg contains 491 square miles, and 114,700 inhabitants. The Duke's name is Joseph, and his sovereignty is limited. Saxe Coburg and Gotha, 790 miles and 132,000 inhabitants.—Duke's name, Ernest. Saxe Meingen Hildburg has 880 miles, and a population of 146,400 people Saxe Weimar Eisenach has 1403 miles and a population of 243,000. Grand Duke's name, Charles Frederick. Sovereignty of all limited.

Frederick Gunther and Gunther II., Princes of Schwartzburg Rudolstadt and Schwartzburg Sonderingen, rule over 746 square miles and 138,500 people. Their sovereignty is limited.

The Prince of Waldeck, George, sways a territory of 455 square miles and 56,000 subjects.

There are four republics on the the continent of Europe. Of these, Switzerland is well enough known, but three are seldom mentioned. They are:

1. Cracow, governed by a Senate and Chamber of Representatives, under the protection, however, of Austria, Russia, Prussia, and Great Britain. Extent, 490 square miles; population, 124,300.

2. Andora, in the Pyrenese, 190 miles and 15,300 inhabitants. Governed by two Syndics and a Council.

3. San Marino—21 square miles and 7,500 people. Governed by a Senate and Council of Ancients.

From the Liberty Bell.

A DAY IN KENTUCKY.

BY WILLIAM F. CHANNING.

A tap with a riding-whip on the door roused me from my book, and, opening it, I saw before me an elderly man, of some sixty years, tall in stature, erect as an Indian, with a cheek where the brown and red were blended in perfect health, and whose long, white hair floated over his shoulders.

"Allow me," said he, with an air of sweeping and graceful courtesy, "to announce myself as John Kemp. I heard from my friend S. that you were here; and propose to you to take a ride to my farm. The morning is glorious; the horses at the door; the road good; my boy will bring your portmanteau; the ladies will be glad to see you; my sons are noble fellows; I promise you a pleasant time; and will take no refusal." And, shaking me by the hand, with the warm, yet dignified welcome, he seated himself till I should be ready.

The morning was glorious, as he said; bright and soft as October everywhere is, in the western valley. A blue haze hung round the horizon; the woods were glowing with golden and crimson; on sandy slopes the frost still glittered on the grass; the birds, with chirping notes of song, and twinkling wings, flew in and out of the bushes; the lizard and the adder were sunning themselves; and the squirrel overheard rustling the leaves as he sprung on on the cracking boughs; the smoke curled steadily up from the brush-fires; long silvery lines of gossamer floated on the air; and the tilting leaves twirled circling down upon our path. The air and scene unloosed our tongues and hearts; and, as we passed along, with the swinging trot of the Kentucky horses, we talked with the openness of old friends.

Slavery, of course, was one of the topics; and I found, on this occasion, as, I invariably have, that a southern man could unhesitatingly say a hundred things of the evils of this relation which many a northern man would blush and stammer over, and apologize for, and explain about. Amongst other things, the judge said:—"Young B. of Boston, was here somewhile ago, and sought to ingratiate himself with me, by speaking of slavery as favorable to free-mindedness in the masters.—Shame on such sycophants!" cried he, rising in his stirrups as he spoke, and dashing with his whip a burr from a chestnut tree under which we were passing, as if in uncontrollable impatience. "Shame on the sycophants! when we are sick at heart with this social cancer, to force this nauseous flattery down our throats, as you would give opium to a dying man. If he had not been my guest, I would have horsewhipped him for a mean spririted fool, as he was."

I shall not soon forget that day; the quiet luxury, and yet simplicity of the style of living; the frank courtesy, the confident self-respecting, and respectful, bold, and gay air of the men; the somewhat haughty, yet gentle, and easy manner of the women, above all, the overflowing affectionateness of each other, and the hospitality, without reserve or an effort, to me, a stranger. But, on this point, I cannot dwell;—I wish to relate what was told me in the afternoon, by one of the daughters, as we walked over the estate.

"It all looks bright, and peaceful, and happy, does it not?" said she, as, standing on a little knoll under a group of hickory trees, she pointed over the wide fields to the family mansion, and the cluster of slave huts, at whose doors the chidren, in swarms, were playing with the noisy glee of the African. "But," she continued, after a gloomy pause, "to us, who know what slavery is, this peace is the green corruption of a stagnant pool—the peace of death. Oh! worse, far worse! It is the yawning grave of humanity. Do you see that spreading beech yonder, just on the edge of the hemp-field, where the ditch runs? It was there that my brother Frank received the blow on the forehead, of which you observed, perhaps, the scar. I will tell you about it. It was his duty, at that time, to keep the nightly watch.—For you know," said she turning to me, with a smile of bitter irony, "that we have to be guardians to these poor friends, who love us so as never to leave us. Well, Frank kept the nightly watch. Armed to the teeth, (with a dark lantern,) he passed once or twice, or oftener, round the plantation. One stormy night, some two years since, he had reached that spot, when suddenly, he heard a crackling sound through the hemp stalks. He cloaked his lantern, drew a pistol, and stepped behind the tree In a moment, a man, with stealthy tread, approached the ditch, which is the boundary of the farm on that side. Frank flashed the light upon him. It was his own favorite slave, Ned;—of the same age with himself—almost a foster brother, for his mother was Frank's nurse; his fellow-rambler in the woods, his playfellow through early years. Hunting, fishing, swimming, nutting, taming horses, every sport had been shared by them. Frank loved that man, and Ned, I believe in my heart, loved him. He was high-spirited and manly, though a negro; strong, bold, and somewhat passionate; and as we found out afterwards, had been struck ~~that day~~ by the overseer. It was a dreadful meeting. 'Ned,' said my brother, 'turn back! I cannot in honor let you go. I am my father's watchman. You pass that ditch only over my body. Come! turn back.—You know that I am your friend. We all are your friends.' 'Master Frank,' answered the noble fellow—for he was so, though he almost killed my brother—'Master Frank! God knows I would die for you, but I forewarn you I will not be taken. That wretch shall never lay his hand on me again. Let me pass, I beseech you! let me pass.' Frank stood firm. Again Ned besought him in vain. He then turned to leap aside. Frank cried, 'Beware! I shall fire;' and quick as thought Ned struck him a stunning blow. He fell utterly insensible. And what did that man do? Did he leap the ditch, and fly? No! he took my bleeding brother on his shoulders; he carried him to the nearest slave hut; roused the inmates; set him erect by the door; and, then, and not till then, made his escape. Time enough had elapsed before Frank could come to himself, and he carried to the house, and my father waked, for Ned to get clear off; the darkness, too, and the storm favored him. He was gone. And I do believe we were all glad. Frank never blamed him. How could he? In the same case would he not have done the same? Well two months passed away, when, early one morning, the overseer found Ned asleep under some bushes, and brought him to the house. I will tell you where he had been, afterwards; but see the cunning of the creature; a cunning and deceit that we sow in all slaves, and therefore ought to reap. He knelt to my father, and said 'Pardon, master! pardon! I have tried free bread, and it is not good. No friends for the poor slave among the free white folks, over the the river, and so I have come back to you, master. My father did not have him punished; but ordered him to be bound with ropes, and left in an empty room. The day passed,—two or three days, indeed—and Ned was still bound. Meanwhile, the overseer threatened him with being sent down the river. You know what that means, don't you? It means to sweat and starve, and die by inches in the sugar-fields of Louisiana. Ned caught the alarm. By connivance of some one, he got a knife; and, when all was still, cut his ropes, and cautiously made his way out of the house. It was a stormy night—his tracks were plain; but he could not help it. He ran to the neighboring plantation yonder, where his wife lived, and gave his peculiar whistle under her window. She was awake, and heard him. Poor soul! I dare say, she had hardly slept, from anxiety, for the two months after he ran away. She raised the window. 'Jump down!' whispered Ned. 'Jump down, just as you are. Wait not a second.' She jumped; and, catching her in his arms, they escaped together.

"Next morning, pursuit was made from both plantations; not that my father wished Ned to be taken, but our neighbor was not willing to lose the woman, who was a house servant, and very valuable. The pursuers, however, were deceived by the tracks, which were half buried up, and chilled and blinded by the storm, which was uncommonly severe, for this part of the world; and at night, gave up the hunt. We heard no more of them till last summer; when, traveling through Canada, whom should we find, as a servant at the hotel in Prescott, but this rascal Ned. At first, he was shy and grave, and affected perfect ignorance. But it was always a saying of my father's, 'If a nigger has sense enough to run off, and get safely out of the States, he must be a smart fellow, and has sense enough to take care of himself, and he shall be free and welcome; and Ned soon saw that there we were his friends, and told us his adventures. It seems, that when he first escaped, he made his way good to Canada; but, no sooner did he feel himself safe, than he thought of his wife, in slavery, so overcame him, that he instantly resolved to return, at all risks and free her, too. Night and day he traveled back, till he reached our plantation; when, utterly overcome with fatigue and hunger, he fell asleep and was taken.—Then, as I have told you, he 'played 'possom,' as the negroes say, till he he caught the hint of being sent away; when he again escaped. And now see how a kind Providence aided those poor creatures. Would you believe it? The men who pursued them came to the very barn, into which they had crept for concealment when the day broke; they trod, over and over again, upon their bodies, which were covered by the heaps of straw and hay; they cursed and swore, and vowed to take them, at the very ears of the victims; and yet they were kept safe. As soon as it was night, they set off again through the snow, and hid themselves a second time in the wood, half frozen and half famished. The third night, they reached the Ohio, by good fortune found a boat, paddled themselves over, and were safe. Friends forwarded them to Canada; and, when we saw them they were as happy as people could be, with every prospect of success. And now," said the beautiful girl, drawing herself up to her full height, and folding her arms, "I know not what you may think, for some of you northerners seem to me, with all deference, to have the spirit of slaves yourselves; but, Kentuckian as I am, and on this slave soil, I dare to say it, Ned is a hero—a hero, who, if he had lived in the good old days of Greece, would have had his deeds immortalized in the strains of some Homer."

The conversation of this spirited woman gave rise to some thoughts, which I will briefly state, for the benefit of those dull folks, who are too lazy to crack a nut and pick out the kernel.

1. All slaveholders are not insensible to the great outrages daily committed by slavery upon justice and affection; nor indifferent to the welfare of those whom they know to be brethren. There are pure-hearted men and women at the South, deserving our respect, our sympathy, counsel, aid, and prayers.

2. If a northern man relishes contempt and insult, he can find it, in any quantity and intensity, by professing to be an admirer of their "peculiar domestic institutions" at the South. Southerners rarely believe such professions, and are apt to think him who makes them, a hypocrite; or, if they suppose him a sincere, to despise him for a mean-spirited stupid booby.

3. If, even under slavery, the African race exhibits such heroic and lovely traits, would they not be noble men, if bound to their white fellow-freemen by the triple bond of gratitude, and mutual confidence, and generous emulation?

THE SUNNY SIDE.—How much more pleasant is it to the pure heart to do good—to kindle the more gentle and noble feelings of our nature, than by misrepresentations, hints of dark innuendos, to break in upon long-established friendship, and disturb the good feelings of years of intimacy. In all our associations, commend us to him who ever presents the sunny side of life's picture to our gaze; he who has always a "pleasant word to speak," and ever disposed to throw the mantle of oblivion over the foibles of erring man. Such a man would wear in our 'heart's core—aye, in our heart of hearts.' But from the mischief-maker, whose bosom is filled with a canker-worm which knows no pleasure except in that which torments others, "good Lord deliver us."

VALUE OF THE NEWSPAPER.—A newspaper is a school in a family worth ten dollars a year. Even the most barren paper brings something new. Children read or hear the contents, intelligence of the affairs of the world, and acquire useful knowledge of more importance to them in life than a present of fifty acres of land. Parents are not aware of the vast importance of a newspaper in a family of Children. We have made the remark before, and we repeat it, that take two families of children equally smart, and both going to the same school; let one of them have the free use of a newspaper, and let the other be deprived of the use of it, and it would excite astonishment to mark the difference between them. Full one-half, and an important half, of education, as it respects the business of the world, and the ability to rise and make one's self respectable in it—is derived from the newspapers. What parent would not wish his children respectable? Who would be willing to have his neighbor's children more intelligent than his own? and yet how trifling is the sum a paper costs! It is even in these hard times absolutely contemptible in amount, and no man ever felt it, except in its beneficial consequence, who paid the subscription regularly once a year.—Exchange Paper.
